A decree according to the explanation of the term in S. 2, Civil P. C., may be final as well as preliminary, and a decree is preliminary when further proceedings have to be taken before the suit can be completely disposed of; it is final when the adjudication completely disposes of the suit. The next provision is that a decree may be partly preliminary and partly final. Now a suit for possession as well as mesne profits, may be taken to be a suit for two claims joined together for which two separate suits may be brought. O. 11, R. 4, Civil P. C., entitles the plaintiff to join two claims for possession and mesne profits in one suit. When a decree is made for possession, that portion of the decree is final; and when a decree is made for mesne profits in that suit it is only preliminary, because the final decree for mesne profits cannot be made unless the amount due is found upon further enquiry. Therefore, further proceedings have to be taken for ascertaining the amount due for mesne profits, before the claim for mesne profits can be completely disposed of. In such a suit, although one decree is made, it is partly preliminary and partly final. The final part of the decree can be executed apart from the preliminary part, and it falls within the provisions of Art. 182, Lim. Act. Time for execution of the decree for possession, therefore, runs at the latest from the date of the final decree, of the appellate Court. The judgment and order of the Court below so far as it holds that the application for execution of the decree for possession is not barred by limitation must be set aside and we hold that that part of the application must stand dismissed with costs.

There is no appeal with regard to the execution about the decree for mesne profits. The application for execution of the decree for that amount is within time and the decree-holder will be entitled to proceed with the execution of that portion of the decree.

The appellant is entitled to his costs of this appeal which we assess at two gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 922 of 1927, Decided on 7th March 1929, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, 2nd Court, Faridpur, D/- 15th December 1926.

Specific Relief Act, S. 9—Interference by trespassers, with the holder of an invalid under-raiyati lease, is not permissible.

It is unreasonable to permit an under-raiyat to be interfered with by a trespasser apart altogether from S. 9 merely because the lease from his landlord is for a longer term than the law permits. The fact that a person is in possession paying rent to his landlords is a sufficient interest in the property to enable him to recover it against the defendants, the defendants showing no title whatever, still less a better title: 20 C. Rupendra Coomar Mitter and Hira Lal Ganguli—for Appellant.

Gunada Charan Sen and Jatis Chandra Guha—for Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff took an under-raiyati lease from the pro forma defendants 5 and 6 whose title is not in dispute. The lease he took purported to be unregistered and therefore it is made invalid by S. 85, Ben. Ten. Act. Nevertheless the plaintiff went into possession under it, paid rents to his landlords, made no objection, and in that condition of things in or about 1924 he was dispossessed, according to the findings of fact, by defendants 1 to 4, the defendants 1 to 4 having no shred or pretence of title whatever, they being merely trespassers. The question is whether the plaintiff can recover in ejectment, his suit not being brought under S. 9, Specific Relief Act. It is said that as he cannot prove his title from his landlords by reason of the permanent lease being invalid and not evidence he is liable to be ejected without any remedy by any trespasser apart from S. 9, Specific Relief Act. That seems to me to be an erroneous proposition of law though I quite agree that the theory of this matter is somewhat difficult to reconcile in some of the decided cases. But the case of Kartik Mandal v. Bama Churn Mandal (1) relied upon by the appellant is a different case. That is a case where a person sought for the first time to get possession of lands granted to him by an invalid lease and was resisted by the defendant when he went to obtain possession. There are however, cases in this Court which show that the Court is not so unreasonable as to permit an under-raiyat to interfere with by a trespasser apart altogether from S. 9, Specific Relief Act, merely because the lease from his landlord is for a longer term than the law permits. This matter has been decided in the case of Beni Malhab v. Raj Chandra Pal (2) and again in the case of Gour Mandal v. Peari Majhi (3). We have also been referred to the cases Adhar Chandra Pal v. Dibarkar Bhuyan (4) and Shama Charan Roy v. Surja Kanta (5). It appears to me that these cases are right on principle and that the fact that a person is in possession paying rent to his landlords is a sufficient interest in the property to enable him to recover it against the defendants, the defendants showing no title whatever, still less a better title. In my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Plaintiff sued to recover possession of a tank with its banks on declaration of his title therein alleging that it was not the niskar property of the defendant but part of his mal property. The tank and its banks were recorded in the Record-of-Rights as held by defendant 1 in niskar right. The plaintiff had prior to this suit instituted a suit under S. 106 for correction of the entry alleging that it was his mal property but failed therein.

Judgment.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit to recover possession of a tank with its banks on declaration of the plaintiff's title therein. The suit has been dismissed by both the Courts below.

The tank and its banks were recorded in the Record-of-Rights, eight annas, as held by defendant 1 in Niskar right and the remaining eight annas, as held by defendants 2 to 50 in different tenure rights under the plaintiff. The plaintiff instituted a suit under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act for correction of the entry in so far as it related to the former eight annas, alleging that it was his mal property but failed therein. He then instituted the present suit alleging as regards the former half that it is not the niskar property of defendant 1 but is part of his own mal property, and as regards the latter half that defendants 2 to 50 have no concern with or rights to the same.

The Courts below have held that the decision in the suit under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act operates as a bar to the present suit. This view is challenged and it is said that as the Revenue Officer had no jurisdiction to go into the question of title and could not make a decree for recovery of possession the decision cannot bar the present suit.

From the decree in the suit under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act which is on the record it appears that the plaintiff prayed therein that the entry in the khatian might be corrected by recording that defendant 1, had no niskar right and that the land was held by the defendant under the plaintiff and was liable to assessment of rent. It is quite true that the prayer for possession was not and could not be included in the suit under S. 106. This is a proposition for which no authority is needed; but as this relief will not be available to the plaintiff until he can get some sort of title established, what has to be seen is whether the declaration of the title that he seeks for, is barred by reason of the decision in the suit under S. 106. In support of the proposition that the Revenue Officer had no authority to determine the question, reliance has been placed upon certain decisions, which, as well as those in which a contrary view has been taken, will now be noticed.

In the case of Mohunt Padmalav Ramanuj Das v. Lukmi Rani (1) there is a passage in the judgment of Woodroffe, J., which would seem to indicate that the question of possession alone should be considered in a suit under S. 106; but Coxe, J., observed that "it is evident that in proceedings under the Bengal Tenancy Act no disputes of title between rival proprietors, considered merely as proprietors, can legitimately arise" (p. 13) and again that suits under S. 106 are "suits between tenant and tenant or between landlord and tenant in which questions other than those of possession may legitimately arise" (p. 15).

The observations of Woodroffe, J., should, therefore, be taken as limited to the peculiar facts of the case, namely that the dispute concerned two rival proprietors without any question arising between any of them and the tenants. The case of Ram Chandra v. Nandananda (2) in which Mohunt Padmalav's case (1) was referred to, does not help the appellant because there the question of possession had not at all been investigated, and while remanding the case for an investigation of that question it was observed that the Bengal Tenancy Act deals with relations of landlords and tenants and it is not part of its purpose to regulate disputes between rival proprietors except in so far as such disputes affect their relation with their tenants, and the view of Coxe, J., in Mohunt Padmalav's case (1) was adopted and affirmed by the learned Judges. The view of Coxe, J., in Mohunt Padmalav's case (1) was agreed in by Carnduff, J., in Ensar Ali v. Yakub Ali (3). Another case on which considerable reliance has been placed on behalf of the appellant is that of Aswini Kumar v. Sarada Charan (4). In that case there was an observation to the effect that "these matters (meaning prayer for declaration of title and recovery of possession) are entirely foreign to the jurisdiction of the Revenue Officer under S. 106."

The suit, in that case, as far as may be gathered from the report, was a suit between two rival proprietors, but whatever that may be, not much weight was attached to this observation in the latter decision in the case of Apurba Krishna v. Atarmani (5) in which all these cases were reviewed and it was said that in a suit under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act, for correction of the Record-of-Rights, when the Revenue Officer proceeds to decide the dispute, he has to determine not merely whether certain words should or should not remain unchanged in the records but also whether the facts described by these words are correct. In the case last mentioned the contention that the scope of the suit should not extend to questions of title was overruled. There are a few other cases upon which reliance was placed on behalf of the appellant and so they deserve specific mention. One is Kali Sundari v. Girija Sankar (6). That case decided that where a plaintiff not only seeks for correction of entry in the Record-of-Rights which is in favour of the defendant but also asks for recovery of possession from the latter, whom he concedes, has been in possession from before the date of final publication, those reliefs could not properly be secured by a suit under S. 106 and the proper course for the plaintiff was to bring a civil suit, because as between landlords of neighbouring estates the only question that can be raised in a proceeding under S. 106 is as to possession at the date of the final publication. Another case is Pran Krishna Saha v. Trailakya Nath Choudhuri (7) where it is held that a person who is not in possession of land which is claimed as rent-free at the date of the Record-of-Rights, cannot have the mere question of his title to hold the land rent-free tried in a suit under S. 106 and as the Revenue Officer cannot give him possession he can get only complete remedy in a civil suit. These two decisions were passed in appeals in suits under S. 106, and if in the present case the plaintiff had alleged in his suit under S. 106 that he was out of possession and merely asked for declaration of his mal right, it might on the authority of these decisions have been held that the suits were incompetent.

We are not, however, concerned with any such question in the present case: it should be noted that in the suit under S. 106 the plaintiff never admitted that he was out of possession but on the other hand he proceeded there on the footing that the land was held under him by defendant 1. Another case relied upon on behalf of the appellant is that of Asrafannessa v. Hem Chandra Chaudhury (8). That was a case in which the dispute raised in the suit under S. 106 was one between rival co-owners only and was a dispute with which the Bengal Tenancy Act had little to do. Lastly was cited the case of Ram Narayan Singh v. Sukhdeo Teli (9); but beyond the fact that it approves of the decision in Aswini Kumar Aich v. Saroda Charan Basu (4) it has no relevancy. That a question of title of the present character may be gone into by a Revenue Officer and if decided by him concludes the parties under S. 107 has been held in Apurba Krishna v. Shyama Ch. Pramanik (10). It is not possible, in view of the pleadings so far as may be gathered from the decree under S. 106 and the pleadings in the present suit, to say that the dispute was between two rival proprietors.

The decisions of the Courts below, so far as the first contention of the appellant is concerned, appears to us to be correct.

As regards the other eight annas share it has been urged that the onus of proof has been wrongly placed. We are of opinion that the Settlement khatian is against the plaintiff, the plaintiff has to rebut the presumption of its correctness; and although apart from that presumption it would be for the defendants to establish the limits of their tenures which lie within the zamindari of the plaintiff, still where, as here, that presumption exists the point of view from which the Subordinate Judge dealt with the matter cannot be said to be incorrect. It has also been urged that the question of the plaintiff's title by purchase of one anna share should have been gone into, but the Subordinate Judge in our opinion has given sufficient reason for declining to accede to the appellant's prayer in this respect.

We accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal No. 80 of 1928, Decided on 10th December 1928, from original decree of Lord-Williams, J., D/- 13th July 1928.

(c) Civil P. C., O. 34, R. 6—Personal remedy is not available till security exhausted.

When a mortgagee brings a suit to enforce his mortgage, the Court will not allow him to enforce it by a personal judgment against the borrower until he has exhausted his remedies against the security. [P 389 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C., O. 34, R. 6—Court has independent power to grant personal judgment.

The power of the Court to give relief by granting a personal decree does not depend upon O. 34, R. 6, which is a provision giving direction to the Court as to the time and manner at and in which the relief is to be given. It is open to the Court on motion in a consent decree to give a personal judgment against the mortgagors. [P 389 C 1, 2]

(c) Civil P. C., O. 34, R. 6—Consent decree silent about personal judgment—Silence does not mean right is foregone.

The mere fact that the terms of a consent decree about the grant of a personal judgment are silent is not a reason for holding that the lender was to forego his right to recover his money back from the borrower, if the security is found to be deficient. [P 389 C 2]

Langford James and S. C. Bose—for Appellants.

N. N. Sarkar, S. M. Bose and R. C. Ghosh—for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from an order made by Lord Williams, J., upon a motion brought pursuant to a notice dated the fifth day of June 1928 in the course of a suit to enforce a mortgage. It appears that the mortgage security was created in or about 1919 and that a sum of 12 lacs was advanced upon the security.

The suit in the course of which the order complained of is made was brought by the mortgagee Mr. Galstaun in June 1921 and that, as originally framed, was a suit against defendants 1 and 2—the parties who had entered into the transaction with him. Defendant 3 was a puisne encumbrancer and at some stage of the suit certain other persons, some of whom were minors were made parties to the proceeding on the theory that they might claim that they were interested in the mortgaged property being joint members of a Hindu Mitakshara family along with defendants 1 and 2.

The suit did not come on in the ordinary way for trial because it appears that on 25th March 1925 it was settled on the basis of certain terms scheduled to the consent decree of that date. It was declared with the consent of the parties appearing through their respective counsel that the said terms of adjustment ought to be carried out and the same were ordered and decreed accordingly. The whole of the arrangement is given not in the body of the decree but in the schedule, that is to say, the language of the parties themselves is in the schedule. Broadly speaking, the arrangement was this that these alleged Mitakshara co-sharers agreed that they had no interest in the mortgaged property, agreed to its being treated as a property which defendants 1 and 2 were entitled to pledge.

As regards defendant 3 he was not in a position to object to the enforcement of the mortgage. Defendants 1 and 2, in these circumstances, proceeded to deal with the matter in this way that the arrears of interest upon the loan calculated up to the end of January 1925 were to be liquidated by the delivery of certain goods. That left to be dealt with a net sum of twelve lacs (Rs. 12,00,000) principal due upon the mortgage as from 1st February 1925 and with reference to this sum it was not necessary to make any calculation because there was a clean sum of twelve lacs (Rs. 12,00,000) that was going to be dealt with by the arrangement. Now, the terms make defendants 1 and 2 admit that the sum of twelve lacs is due for principal. They then made them consent to a "decree absolute for sale" for the said amount carrying interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from 1st February 1925 until payment in full. So the agreement is an agreement to an immediate decree absolute. The terms go on to provide for stay of execution of that decree:

"the decree will not be executed by the sale of the mortgaged properties or otherwise for a period of 5 years on certain conditions."

The conditions of the stay were that defendants 1 and 2 would pay off one lac in each year and that they would pay interest by equal monthly instalments on the amount due from time to time by the 15th of each month. There is a clause which says that in the event of default in making those payments the whole of the balance of the decretal amount, interest and costs then due and unpaid will at once "become due" and the plaintiff will be at liberty:

"to execute the decree by sale of the mortgaged properties in suit through Court in the usual way."

I am not of opinion that any light is thrown upon the present controversy by any other terms in this consent decree. A certain sum became the decretal amount, and order absolute for sale was made. It was stayed for a period of 5 years upon certain terms. It was provided that if these terms were not complied with, the plaintiff was to be at liberty to execute the decree by sale of the mortgaged properties in suit through Court in the usual way. It appears that default was made and on 27th January 1926 the plaintiff made an application to enforce his decree. By that time it is obvious that it was necessary to make a calculation to find out how much had been paid of this sum of twelve lacs with interest at 7 per cent per annum from 1st February 1927. Accordingly there was a reference to the Registrar and he did report on the matter. Ultimately a final order for sale under this consent decree was made on 9th August 1926. On that date there was really for the first time a final order for sale:

"It is ordered and decreed that the premises comprised in the mortgage in the said decree mentioned or a sufficient part thereof be sold with the approbation of the said Registrar to the best purchaser or purchasers." and so forth.

Thereafter last year and in the present year the properties were sold but they failed to produce sufficient to cover the amount. The order complained of, has been made by the learned Judge on the application of the plaintiff for a personal decree for the balance against defendants 1 and 2. It is to be pointed out that there is an order in the rules of the original side which gives a direction to this effect that when an ordinary preliminary decree is being drawn up it shall always include a clause to say that leave is reserved to the plaintiff to make an application for personal judgment after a sale has been carried out. In the present case the terms of the decree were not drawn up by the Court's office at all. The decree in this case so far as the Court was concerned was a decree that certain parties having agreed to certain things in the schedule it is ordered that it should be carried out. The learned Judge has rightly, in my judgment, come to the conclusion, that in this case there was a clear personal liability resting upon the borrowers in respect of the money lent and two contentions have been advanced before us.

The first is the contention as a matter of procedure and of an examination of the terms of O. 34, Civil P. C., to the effect that R. 6 does not in terms apply to this case and that it is not possible to get a personal decree in this suit whether or not any personal liability remains upon defendants 1 and 2.

The second contention is that upon a true construction of this consent decree the bargain between the parties was a bargain that the mortgage should be enforced in a certain way that it meant and intends that it was not to be enforced in any other way in particular, not to be enforced by a personal judgment. In my opinion both of these contentions fail. It has been pointed out, on the strength of the case reported in

Bechu Singh v. Bicharam Sahu (1) that when you read the rules in O. 34 the provisions for a preliminary decree and a final decree have to be read together. According to the strict interpretation the provisions as to a final decree apply only where there has been a preliminary decree of the kind contemplated by the previous rule. In the same way when we come to R. 6 it is contended that the words :

"where the net proceeds of any such sale are found to be insufficient to pay the amount due to the plaintiff if the balance is legally recoverable from the defendant otherwise than out of the property sold, the Court may pass a decree for such amount," that this rule operates only where the previous proceeding has been in exact compliance with Rr. 4 and 5. It is said that because in this case the consent decree was not a preliminary decree in complete accordance with R. 4 and because there has not been a final decree in complete accordance with R. 5, therefore, the operation of R. 6 cannot be tolerated in these proceedings and that there is no provision whereby judgment can be had against the defendants personally even supposing that there was no bargain to the effect that the defendants should be relieved of their personal liability. I reject that argument entirely. It is well settled in Indian law that when a mortgagee brings a suit to enforce his mortgage the Court will not allow him to enforce it by a personal judgment against the borrower until he has exhausted his remedies against the security. According to the view taken by many Indian Courts it is wrong at the time of making a final order for sale to order that if the proceeds are insufficient there will be a personal decree. The usual practice is certainly that the personal decree is not even granted until the sale has been carried out and the deficiency ascertained. It is a form of relief which, in the ordinary way, will not be given to a mortgagee unless and until this stage has been reached. I need not say that the power of the Court to give that form of relief does not depend upon R. 6, O. 34, which is a provision giving direction to the Court as to the time and manner at and in which the relief is to be given. In the present case if there was a departure by consent from the strict form of order for sale it is to my mind, nonetheless erroneous to contend that there must needs be a substantial departure in principle and in substance from the provision of R. 6. As regards the power of the Court in the mortgage suit to make the order, I am not of opinion, that the inclusion of the clause reserving leave to the plaintiff operates any magic in this matter. I have no doubt at all that it was open to the Court on motion in this case to give a personal judgment against the mortgagors for the balance.

I come now to the only contention that appears to me to have any relation to the merits the contention, namely whether there is enough in this consent decree to show that the plaintiff gave up his right to a judgment for the balance against these mortgagors. The fact that in the terms of settlement nothing was said about a personal judgment, seems to me to have no such meaning as is contended for. In the ordinary way a decree such for example as might be passed by any mofussil Court under or by an analogy to the terms of the Code of Civil Procedure would contain no reference to the right to a personal judgment. An order of the kind contemplated by the Code would be made in due course. In this case the parties had not got to the stage at which, in law, the right to get a personal decree had accrued to them. I do not think that the mere fact that the consent terms are silent is any good reason for supposing the parties to intend the very extraordinary consequence to be operated by the mere silence that the lender was to forego his right to recover his money back from the borrower if the security be deficient. I agree with the learned Judge on an examination of the terms of the document that there is something in this document pointing to the contrary. I do not think it can be put higher than that. I do not say that it amounts to an impossibility but there is something in the document which points against the idea that it was any part of this bargain that the plaintiff should give up his right to a personal judgment. An ordinary decree absolute for sale is, strictly speaking, a decree that may only be executed by sale. But when a declaration is made that a certain sum of money is due upon a security one may and often does talk of executing the decree by sale and then afterwards by getting a personal judgment and enforcing that. In this case the decree absolute was to be stayed for 5 years. It was only stayed and the terms of the stay were :

"will not be executed by sale of the mortgaged properties or otherwise for a period of 5 years."

In my judgment those words would ordinarily point to the obtaining of a personal judgment for the balance unrealized by the sale. Then :

"to execute the decree by sale of the mortgaged properties in suit through Court in the usual way," must mean, in my opinion, that the ordinary process will apply because the conditions of the stay have not been fulfilled. If it had been intended that there should be an exception of so important a character as to deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of a personal covenant I can only say that I do not think that either of those clauses would have been used.

In my opinion, the order made by the learned Judge is right for the reasons which he has given and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Suhrawardy, J.—This rule was issued on three grounds. The first is that the conviction is not sustainable in view of the fact that the evidence in respect of which the petitioner was prosecuted was not read over to him according to law. The facts are that the petitioner was a witness in a case and was examined-in-chief on 18th November 1927 and his deposition was read over to him by the Peshkar of the Sub-Deputy Magistrate before whom he gave his evidence while another witness was in the box. He was cross-examined on 9th December 1927 and the Magistrate read over the whole of the deposition including his examination-in-chief on that day. There is a note recorded under the deposition of both days that it was read over to the petitioner and admitted by him. The petitioner was charged with making contradictory statements in examination-in-chief and in cross-examination. The objection on the ground that the examination-in-chief of the petitioner was read over to him by the Peshkar on 18th November while another witness was being examined is now set at rest by the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Abdul Rahman v. Emperor (1). It is not necessary to consider the cases previous to that decision which held that absence of strict compliance with the words of S. 360, Criminal P. C. made the statements inadmissible in evidence. Their Lordships further held that non-compliance with the provisions of S. 360 is curable under S. 537, Criminal P. C., that is, it will not vitiate the trial unless it is proved that it has caused failure of justice. The learned advocate for the petitioner rightly contends that it cannot be said in the present case where the petitioner has been prosecuted and convicted for making two contradictory statements that the non-compliance with the letter of the law has not caused failure of justice in this case. It is unnecessary to enquire whether this irregularity has really caused failure of justice in this case because whatever irregularity there was it was cured by the subsequent reading over of the whole of the evidence by the Magistrate himself at the end of his cross examination. It is urged that the reading of the examination-in-chief at a subsequent date was not strict compliance with the words of S. 360 and reliance has been placed on the ratio of the case of Shamserali Hazi v. Emperor (2). I do not think that this contention should prevail. S. 360 says that as the evidence of each witness is completed it shall be read over to him. The evidence of a witness is ordinarily completed when he has been examined-in-chief, cross-examined, and if necessary, re-examined. By the completion of the evidence in that section is not meant what the witness's deposition was on a particular day. The case relied upon was decided upon a totally different set of facts. There the witnesses were examined one after another for some time and then the depositions of these witnesses were read over to them altogether. In that case, therefore, the evidence of each witness was not read over to him after its completion. Even if there has been in this case any irregularity, it is according to the view of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee curable under S. 537; and there is nothing to show that the reading of the examination-in-chief on a subsequent day caused failure of justice because the defence of the petitioner is not that he did not make the statement but that the first statement that he made was on hearsay. This ground must be overruled.

The second ground is that the petitioner was not given an opportunity of explaining the discrepancies in his alleged statements before the prosecution was started; and the third is that the contradictory statement not being apparently irreconcilable the petitioner ought not to have been convicted at all. These two grounds may be considered together. There is no provision in the law that it is the binding duty of the Magistrate to give an opportunity to a witness to explain the contradictory statements. But in this case the Magistrate has considered the explanation which the petitioner then gave and which he has given in the present trial. Whether the complaint made by the Court under S. 476, Criminal P. C. before an opportunity was given to the accused to offer sufficient explanation of his contradictory statements has vitiated the trial is a question which cannot be argued after conviction. As to the statements being reconcilable it appears to me that on a reading of the whole of the deposition of the witness no doubt is left in one's mind that the accused apparently made a statement in his examination-in-chief from which he resiled in his cross-examination. His contention is that what he stated in his examination-in-chief was on hearsay and the statement made in his cross-examination was the true statement, namely, that he had not seen the occurrence at all. In his examination-in-chief he said:

"I went there and saw Mahendra was being beaten by Jyotish, Rebati and Karuna with cane and lathi. Mahendra was tied with a rope to a post."

In his cross-examination he said:

"In my presence no body assaulted Mahendra. I saw Mahendra sitting in the yard. I did not notice whether his hands were tied. No man was found near him. Nemai got bail at the time of the occurrence. He took his seat inside the house."

Apparently the two statements cannot be reconciled. But the learned advocate for the petitioner argues that the first statement may be explained away by saying that what he said there was the information he had got from others. Our attention has been drawn to the record of the deposition of the petitioner in which the word "saw" was written over some other word which, it suggested was "heard." This cannot be because the word "heard" does not fit in the sentence and is inconsistent with the words following namely that Mahendra was being beaten. It cannot also be maintained that that statement was made on hearsay because the accused distinctly said that Mahendra was being beaten by some persons with cane and lathis. He went on to say:

"I asked Nemai why they were beating the complainant in the way. Nemai said he is very wicked. Nemai was then sitting on the Daili giving the order to beat the complainant. I left the place."

All these statements cannot be explained away by saying that they were what the accused heard from other persons. This ground that the statements can be reconciled must fail.

But it has been submitted that in every case of contradictory statements it is not desirable to prosecute a witness and reference has been made to Keramat Ali v. Emperor (3). Where the learned Chief Justice has observed that a prosecution in these circumstances should be undertaken when it appears to Court that it is expedient in the interest of justice that a complaint should be made under S. 476, Criminal P. C. This is quite true. This observation was made on an appeal from an order under S. 476 and the Court impressed upon the Sessions Judge who had passed the order under that section to find if it was expedient in the interest of justice to prosecute the witness as in that case it appeared to their Lordships that the appellant had given some explanation which might have been in the circumstances accepted. A passage has been quoted to us from Lewin's Crown Cases p. 270 where Holroyd, J. is said to have expressed himself as follows:

"Although you may believe that on one or other occasion she swore that which was not true it is not a necessary consequence that she committed perjury: for there are cases in which a person might very honestly and conscientiously swear to a particular fact from the best of his recollection and belief and from other circumstances at a subsequent time be convinced that he was wrong and swear to the reverse without meaning to swear falsely either time."

These observations are very wise and should always be kept in mind in dealing with cases of this character. In the present case, however, I think no such explanation can be given of the different statements made by the petitioner. It also seems to me that it is a case in which it is in the interest of justice that the offender should be prosecuted and punished. It is not uncommon in the Courts of this country to notice witnesses intentionally giving false evidence with no sense of responsibility and even going to the length of giving inconsistent evidence. Detection of such offences is not always possible but when they came to the notice of the Court they should be adequately dealt with. In my opinion this rule fails and should be discharged. The accused must surrender to his bail and serve out the remainder of the sentence.

Graham, J.—I agree that the rule fails upon each of the three grounds on which it was issued. As to the first point, I am of opinion that there was a substantial compliance with the provision of S. 360, Criminal P. C. and that if there was any irregularity it is cured by S. 537 of the Code. No objection was taken at the time of the trial nor has it been shown that the accused was prejudiced in any way: Abdul Rahaman v. Emperor (1). As regards the second ground there is no provision of law which requires that a witness should be given an opportunity to explain discrepancies in his evidence. But it is open to a witness if he wishes to do so to explain at the time when the deposition is read out to him. Finally as to the third ground, there seems to be no doubt whatever on the merits that the petitioner did commit perjury; and upon that point I have nothing to add to the judgment which my learned brother has just delivered. I agree that this rule should be discharged.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff to enforce a simple mortgage-bond executed by defendant 1 in favour of plaintiff's father since deceased for a sum of Rs. 100 on the 25th Kartic 1385 B. S. To understand the case properly as also the arguments that were advanced before us it would be necessary to state the facts of the case in some detail. Defendant 1 the mortgagor, executed a first mortgage in favour of defendant 3's father in July 1909. On 11th November 1911 he executed in favour of the plaintiff's father a second mortgage, the suit for enforcement of which has given rise to the present appeal. On 7th August 1915, the property was sold in execution of a rent-decree and purchased by defendant 2. In 1917 the plaintiff brought a suit to have this rent sale set aside on the ground of fraud as also on the allegation that defendant 2 was a benamidar for defendant 1.

This suit, however, was dismissed on 3rd September 1919. Thereafter on 7th July 1920 defendant 1, the mortgagor, sold the property to defendant 3 in satisfaction of the first mortgage for Rs. 290 and after the sale by defendant 1 to defendant 3 they dispossessed defendant 2 from the property in suit. Thereafter defendant 2 brought a suit for recovery of possession from defendant 3 and defendant 1 and this suit was decreed on 8th May 1923. Plaintiff's suit for enforcement of the mortgage-bond was contested by defendant 2, on, amongst others, the allegation that as defendant 2 had purchased the lands in execution of a decree for arrears of rent the plaintiff could not follow the property in suit for the satisfaction of his mortgage-debt. The Court of first instance gave a decree to the plaintiff and in the decree it was directed that the balance of the sale proceeds after the sale, if any, should be paid to defendant 2. On appeal the lower appellate Court found among other things that defendant 2 was only a benamidar for defendant 1, the mortgagor, and the Court of appeal below dismissed the appeal and confirmed the decree that had been made by the Court of first instance. Defendant 2 has appealed to this Court.

A number of points were taken on behalf of the appellant before us and I will take them up seriatim. It was first of all contended that the finding of the lower appellate Court on the question of benami was unnecessary inasmuch as the decree of the first Court which was confirmed by the lower appellate Court was based on the fact that defendant 2 is the real owner of the property and not a benamidar of defendant 1. The decree of the lower appellate Court as it stands whereby the decree of the Court of first instance was affirmed in its entirety is not strictly in accordance with the finding arrived at by the lower appellate Court on the question of benami. But the decree which the lower appellate Court made was made after the lower appellate Court had arrived at its finding on the question of benami and at the time when the lower appellate Court arrived at that finding there was nothing to prevent it from taking up and determining the question whether defendant 2 was the real owner or benamidar of defendant 1.

The lower appellate Court has found the question of benami in favour of the plaintiff on two grounds, first, because in a previous litigation between the parties the question that defendant 2 was a benamidar of defendant 1 was raised and in that litigation it was found that defendant 2 was a benamidar of defendant 1. It was said that the Court of appeal below in the previous litigation had not come to any clear finding on the point. But the judgment of the appellate Court in that litigation clearly shows that the appellate Court there upheld the finding of the first Court in that litigation to the effect that defendant 2 was a benamidar of defendant 1. The learned Subordinate Judge in the present litigation has also arrived at the same conclusion on the question of benami independent of the determination of the question in the previous litigation. It was contended before us that this finding of the lower appellate Court on the question of benami is wrong in law inasmuch as the learned Subordinate Judge does not fully set out in his judgment the evidence and circumstances to lead to the conclusion that he came to on the point. There is in the judgment of the lower appellate Court, however, a statement that the learned Subordinate Judge had come to his finding on that point on a consideration of the circumstances disclosed in the evidence. The learned advocate for the appellants could not say that there was absolutely no evidence in the case in support of the finding.

The next point taken before us was that the plaintiff was under the provisions of S. 73, T. P. Act, precluded from proceeding against the property and that his only remedy was to proceed against the surplus sale-proceeds under S. 73. There is nothing in the wording of S. 73, T. P. Act, which would, in my opinion, indicate that a mortgagee in a case where the mortgaged property is sold for arrears of rent must be confined to the surplus sale-proceeds and cannot follow the mortgaged-property. In support of his contention the learned advocate for the appellant placed reliance on the observations of their Lordships in the case of Hem Chandra v. Tafazzel Hossein Khan (1). The observation that is to be found at p. 336 runs thus :

"The effect of this section is, as we understand it, that the mortgagee has no charge upon the property sold for rent, such charge being taken to be extinguished, and transferred, as it were, to the surplus sale proceeds."

But the case of Hem Chandra v. Tafazzel Hossein Khan (1) can in my opinion be distinguished from the facts of the present case. In Hem Chandra v. Tafazzel Hossein Khan (1) only one of the properties mortgaged was sold and the purchaser at the sale was no other than the mortgagee himself. That being so, there remained nothing in the property sold which could be followed by the mortgagee, the mortgagee himself having purchased the property. On the other hand, the case of Beni Prosad Sinha v. Rewat Lall (2) is in my opinion, a clear authority against the contention of the learned advocate for the appellant. In this case Beni Prosad Sinha v. Rewat Lal (2), (at p. 749) their Lordships observed :

"The object of S. 73 in our opinion is to relieve the mortgagee of the effect of the injury which he would suffer by the property which was a security for his money being sold, and to give him a right over the residue of the sale proceeds. It is not intended in any way to enlarge the interests of persons purchasing at a sale for arrears of revenue or rent. If that had been the intention any subsequent provision of law providing that a sale for arrears of revenue or rent could get rid of an incumbrance would be unnecessary. It is, in our opinion, intended to refer to cases where the law has otherwise provided that the effect of a sale for arrears of revenue or rent should nullify a mortgage."

Somewhat to the same effect is the decision in Prem Chand Pal v. Purnimadas (3). In the present case the purchase which defendant 2 made at the sale for arrears of rent was subject to the mortgage of the plaintiff which was an incumbrance and which was never annulled. I am therefore of opinion that S. 73, T. P. Act was no bar to the plaintiff's following the mortgaged property to satisfy his mortgage debt.

The learned advocate for the appellant next contended that even if S. 73 does not prevent the plaintiff from proceeding against the property, the plaintiff was by his conduct estopped from enforcing his mortgage claimed against the property which was in the hand of defendant 2 and the conduct of the plaintiff which according to the learned advocate for the appellant estopped the plaintiff enforcing the mortgage claim against the property was the fact that the plaintiff had instituted a suit in 1917 to have the sale set aside at which defendant 2 had purchased the property. I am unable to appreciate the force of this contention of the learned advocate. The plaintiff might have brought a suit to have the sale set aside but I do not understand how it can be contended that he was thereby estopped from instituting a suit to enforce his mortgage claim against the property in suit.

Another point that was taken by the learned advocate was that the incumbrance that was on the property at the time when defendant 2 purchased it was annulled under the provisions of S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act. It appears that defendant 2 after his purchase made an application to the Collector for service of notice under S. 167 but it appears also that that notice was not properly served. The contention on behalf of the appellant was that de-defendant 2's (the purchaser's) duty ended when he made the application to the Collector and that although there might not have been a proper service of the notice, notice of the purchase was in some other way conveyed to the mortgagee. It was urged that in these circumstances it ought to have been held that the incumbrance had been annulled. I do not think this contention is well founded. It has been held in the case of Radhay Koer v. Ajodhya Das (4) that until the notice has been properly served under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act upon the incumbrancer, the incumbrance subsists and it is obligatory on the purchaser to show that the notice has been served in the manner prescribed. The finding in the present case is that no notice under S. 167 had been served in the prescribed way.

(3) [1888] 15 Cal. 546.

The next point that was taken before us was that as the plaintiff's mortgage was subject to the first mortgage in favour of defendant 3's father and as defendant 2 got rid of that first mortgage by the suit which he (defendant 2) brought in the year 1920, the plaintiff's claim against the property should be diminished by the amount of the first mortgage. I do not think that there is much substance in this contention. Defendant 2, it is true, brought a suit against defendants 1 and 3 in the year 1920, but that was a suit for recovery of possession and there is nothing to show that the result of that suit was a satisfaction of the mortgage-debt due to defendant 3's father.

The last contention advanced before us was in connexion with the question of interest. It was said that the mortgaged property cannot be proceeded against for realization of interest inasmuch as so far as the interest was concerned the covenant was only a personal one. We fail to appreciate the force of this contention. The mortgage-bond would show that the stipulation was that the interest was to be added to the principal at the end of the year. All the contentions that were raised before us therefore fail and the appeal must be dismissed with costs with this little modification only that the balance of the proceeds, if any, which has been directed to be paid to defendant 2 will not be paid to defendant 2 who is only a benamidar.

Page, J.—The two suits out of which these two appeals arise were brought by the plaintiffs who are now appellants to recover rent for the years 1319-1322, 1322-1325 in respect of land let out by them to the defendants under a kabuliyat of 22nd Magh, 1278. There had been a previous suit between the parties to recover arrears of rent for the years 1309-1312, and in that suit an issue was raised and decided whether the rent was not wholly suspended by reason of the landlords having deliberately evicted the tenants from three plots which were parcels of the land demised. In that suit it was determined that by reason of the deliberate interference by the landlords with the tenant's enjoyment of the demised premises the tenants were entitled to a total suspension of the rent until the landlords restored them to possession of the plots from which they had been evicted. In the present suits the proceedings eventually came before the High Court, and the question which the High Court had to determine was whether the decision in the previous suit was res judicata in the present suits. For the reasons which are set out in that judgment their Lordships held that the decision in the previous suit was not res judicata. But from a perusal of the decision of the lower appellate Court their Lordships came to the conclusion that the learned Judge had not paid sufficient attention to the decision in the earlier rent suit, and that if he had had regard to it his conclusion might have been different. The case accordingly was remanded to the lower appellate Court in order that the appeal should be re-considered in the light of the observations of the High Court. After remand the learned District Judge came to a conclusion adverse to the landlord. He held that "the plaintiffs' officer dispossessed the defendants of these plots and caused them to be ploughed up."

The learned Judge further held that the conduct of the landlords throughout these proceedings had been mala fide. Indeed, in the present suits which were for rent in respect of the premises demised under this kabuliyat the landlords had omitted in their plaint to insert those three plots, and it was only at a later stage of the proceedings that these three plots were mentioned in the plaint as being part of the demised property. That omission to mention these three plots for which the plaintiffs were receiving rents from the tenants of an adjoining mouja was regarded by the learned District Judge as mala fide conduct on the part of the plaintiffs, because at that time the plaintiffs were well aware of the proceedings which had taken place in the earlier rent suit. We are of opinion that there was ample evidence to justify the finding of the lower appellate Court that the plaintiffs had interfered deliberately with the enjoyment of the demised premises by their tenants, and that the enjoyment of the tenancy by their tenants had materially been diminished. Upon that finding the question which arises is whether the plaintiffs were entitled to obtain rent in respect of any portion of the demised premises, or whether the tenants under the law were entitled to claim a suspension of the whole of the rent due under the kabuliyat. In my opinion, the law is quite clear. Where there is a tenancy and that tenancy is an indivisible one in which a lump sum for rent is to be paid in respect of the whole of the demised premises if the landlord interferes with the due enjoyment of the premises or any part thereof by his tenants, as in this case by evicting them therefrom it is not open to the landlord to assert that any portion of the rent is payable in respect of any portion of the premises, for in law in such circumstances every pice of the rent is payable out of every portion of the premises demised. There is a doctrine for which authority can be found, however, that in a mourashi mokarari kabuliyat such as the one in suit where it can be proved that certain portions of the rent are specifically assessed and appropriated to certain parcels of the demised land, and in respect of a distinct parcel of which the rent is specified there is an eviction by the landlord the landlord is entitled to receive, notwithstanding the eviction, his rent in respect of the other portions of the land which are separately and specifically assessed for rent. It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to the soundness of that doctrine in this case for our decision will turn upon the provisions of the kabuliyat of 1278. The learned advocate for the appellants has urged that from a perusal of the kabuliyat it is apparent that this is a case in which distinct rents are payable in respect of two distinct mouzas, Satbaria and Jadabpur. We are unable to assent to that contention.

It is true and obvious that at the top of the kabuliyat there is to be found a record of the jamas which had been payable in respect of the two mouzas Satbaria and Jadabpur. But there has been previous tenures in respect of those moujas, and it is apparent from the terms of the kabuliyat that it was intended by the parties that in respect of the properties which were the subject-matter of the moujas there should be one indivisible tenancy in respect of which one sum for rent should be payable in specified and periodical kists. Why then refer to the two separate moujas at all? For this reason it appears from the kabuliyat itself that there were arrears of rent payable in respect of the previous tenures, and for the purpose of considering what the consolidated rent should be in respect of the new tenure to be created the details of the earlier jamas were inserted in the kabuliyat. To my mind it is clear beyond doubt or controversy from the kabuliyat itself that one indivisible tenancy was created in respect of which one lump sum should be paid for rent. In the kabuliyat certain exceptions and deductions from the rent payable are set out, but there is no allocation of these deductions or any of them either to the one mouja or to the other. Yet if there were two distinct rents payable in respect of two distinct properties such a discrimination certainly would have been made. Again, the total rent is payable without reference to the properties contained in the one jama or in the other, and moreover, it is stated that for any breach of any condition set out in the lease the landlords should be entitled to re-enter upon the demised premises as a whole. For instance, if there was a breach with respect to the boundaries of Satbaria not only would the landlord be entitled under the kabuliyat to re-enter upon Satbaria, but also upon Jadabpur. That in my opinion, is entirely inconsistent with the theory that this was a kabuliyat under which there were distinct rents specified in respect of distinct parcels of the demised property. In my opinion, for the reasons that I have given, amongst others, under this kabuliyat there was created one entire tenure in respect of all the demised properties. Under those circumstances in my opinion, the ordinary rule will prevail, and there will be a total suspension of rent until that portion of the demised property from which the defendants had been evicted is restored to them. The learned advocate for the appellants further urged that in this case it was not open to the tenants to plead that they were entitled to any apportionment of suspension of rent because from 1907 onwards they had taken no steps to regain possession of the land from which they were evicted. It is enough to state that this contention finds no place in the grounds of appeal to this Court, and we are not disposed to allow the appellants to raise it at this stage of the proceedings.

The result is that the decision of the learned District Judge is correct, and both the appeals are dismissed with costs.

The suit was based on a kabuliyat executed by the defendants in favour of the plaintiffs. We have been taken through the terms of this document. Having regard to the terms of this kabuliyat, we are of opinion that the case is governed by the principles laid down in the cases of Gobind Chandra Pal v. Hamidulla Bhuian (1), *Darik Dhakai v. on his behalf it was contended that the lower appellate Court was wrong in giving to the plaintiff a decree at the rate of the talab jama after deducting the hajat of Rs. 40 instead of giving a decree at the full rate. It appears that in the kabuliyat in para. 1 of the document the annual rent was stated to be Rs. 62 odd and after deduction of Rs. 40 as hajat on the ground of some lands being patit, the talab jama was put down as Rs. 22 odd. It was urged on behalf of the plaintiff respondent that it was within the rights of the landlord to withdraw this hajat at any time he liked. In view, however, of the terms as embodied in para 1 of the kabuliyat, we are unable to give effect to this contention. The provision about hajat was made on the ground of patit lands and that being so, it is, in my judgment, pretty clear that this hajat concession was meant to continue so long as the lands which were found to be patit at the time of the lease would remain patit and that the landlord would not be entitled to withdraw this hajat concession unless and until he could show that the land which was found to be patit at the time of the lease or any portion thereof had, since the execution of the document, come under cultivation. In the present case there is nothing to show that any portion of the land which was found to be patit at the time of the lease have been brought under cultivation since the execution of that document. That being so, we are of opinion that the tenant defendant was entitled to this hajat remission and in this view of the matter, the cross-objection must fail and is dismissed.

Appeal No. 2114 of 1926 Decided on 15th August 1928, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Faridpur, D/- 3rd May 1926.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 51—Lessee granted remission of rent under certain circumstances — Lessor can claim full rent on change of circumstances.

Under a kabuliyat it was agreed that the lessee should have some remission of rent under the circumstances existing at the time the tenancy was created, and that this remission was not to continue for ever under all circumstances.

Held: that the landlord was entitled to claim rent including the amount of remission which he had the right to withdraw when the circumstances had changed.

Ramgati Sircar—for Respondent.

Mallik, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for arrears of rent and also for enhancement of rent under S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, under S. 30 of the same Act. The plaintiff claimed rent at the rate of Rs. 40 odd including Rs. 11 odd which had been kept in the kabuliyat as hajat. The Courts below gave a decree to the plaintiff for arrears of rent and also for enhancement under S. 52 but refused the plaintiff's claim for an enhancement under S. 30 and also his claim for rent including the amount of hajat. The two points which have been urged before us by the plaintiff-appellant are first, that the plaintiff was entitled to claim rent including the amount of hajat inasmuch as he had the right to withdraw the hajat portion of the rent; and secondly, that the plaintiff was entitled to an enhancement under S. 30, inasmuch as the defendants are occupancy raiyats and not tenureholders as found by the Courts below.

As regards the hajat point, we are of opinion that the plaintiff landlord was, in the circumstances of the case, entitled to withdraw the remission. The hajat in the kabuliyat was described as hal hajat indicating that the intention of the parties to the document was that the defendants should have the remission for the time being or, in other words, under the circumstances existing at the time the tenancy was created and that this remission or hajat arrangement was not to continue for ever under all circumstances. It appears that at the time the tenancy was created there were some lands which were not quite fit for cultivation and it appears also that at present all the lands within the jama have become fit for cultivation and are under cultivation. The intention of the parties evidently being that the hajat was allowed for the time being and only under the circumstances obtaining at the time the tenancy was created, the tenant defendant could not resist the plaintiffs' claim for withdrawal of the hajat unless he could show that there had been no change whatsoever in the circumstances that obtained at that time. As there had been a change in the circumstances, the landlord, in our opinion, was justified in withdrawing that remission or hajat.

As regards the second point which depends on the question whether the defendants were tenure-holders or occupancy raiyats, we are unable to disagree with the lower Courts in the view which they have taken of the matter. Our attention has been drawn by the learned advocate for the plaintiff-appellant to one or two passages in the kabuliyat which, according to him, indicated that the tenancy was an agricultural holding. But there was the Record-of-Rights which was clearly against the plaintiff-appellant. In the Record-of-Rights the defendants were shown as tenure-holders and the lower appellate Court has come to a finding that the defendants actually settled the land comprised in the jama with a large number of sub-tenants who again, have been recorded in the Record-of-Rights as occupancy raiyats. There was nothing in the case which, in our opinion, could be said to rebut the presumption arising in favour of the defendants from the finally published Record-of-Rights, remembering especially the finding arrived at by the lower appellate Court to the effect that the defendants had actually settled the land with a number of a sub-tenants. We agree with the lower appellate Court that the defendants are tenure-holders and not occupancy raiyats and that being so, the plaintiff was not entitled to an enhancement of rent under S. 30, Ben. Ten. Act.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal is allowed in part. The plaintiff will have a decree for the arrears of rent at the rate of Rs. 40 odd including the hajat portion and he will also get an enhancement under S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, his claim for enhancement under S. 30 being refused. We make no order as to costs.

The cross-objection which was not passed before us is dismissed.

Mani Ram Agarwalla and another—Defendants.

Civil Suit No. 2211 of 1927, Decided on 26th April 1928.

Limitation Act, Art. 75—Instalment bond—Period of limitation depends on construction of contract—Contract conferring option to sue on default—Art. 75 does not apply.

In an instalment bond with a condition of exigibility on one default the question as to when time begins to run really depends upon the construction of the document and the contract between the parties. When the contract confers on the creditor an option to treat or not to treat the default as enabling him to sue for the whole amount, Art. 75 has no application; (Case Law Considered).

Sudhir Das—for Plaintiff.

S. K. Basu and J. K. Ghosh—for Defendants.

Judgment.—The only question is that of limitation. The suit is on an adjustment of accounts on a commission agency which took place on 15th April 1921. The effect of the adjustment was that Rs. 4,000 was found due by the defendant firm to the plaintiff firm. The document signed by the defendant firm embodied an undertaking to pay the amount by instalments of Rs. 500 and Rs. 200 alternatively, eleven in all, running from 13th Aswin Sudhi 1978 until 13th Aswin Sudhi 1983. The first named date corresponds with 14th October 1921. There was also a provision in the document which, as translated, is as follows:

"If we fail to pay the instalments we shall pay interest on all the instalments at 12 annas (twelve annas) per cent per month. If we fail to pay one instalment you will be competent to realize all the instalments in a lump sum by filing a suit."

In these circumstances it is argued on behalf of the first defendant that the suit is barred by limitation on the ground that the very first instalment of all payable on 14th October 1921 was never paid and that there was therefore a breach of the agreement enabling the plaintiff then and there to bring his suit for the recovery of the full amount and the period of limitation commenced to run from that date. It is admitted that at the time of the filing of this suit the first six instalments were in fact barred by limitation and the suit only covers the amount of the last five which are within the period of three years before the institution of the suit.

The difficulty upon the point which is raised arises mainly from the conflict of authorities in this Court and from the fact that the trend of the later authorities in this Court differs from that of some of the other High Courts. The most recent case to which I have been referred is Basanta Kumar v. Nabin Chandra (1) which proceeds on the same lines as two previous Jadav Chandra v. Bhairab Chandra (2) and Hurry Pershad v. Nasib Singh (3). The effect of that decision is that no distinction can be drawn between a case where the proviso is that on non-payment of an instalment the whole amount shall become due and one in which it is provided that on non-payment of an instalment the whole amount may be sued for. The cases to which I have been referred which take the opposite view, favouring the plaintiff in this case, are Rupnarain v. Gopinath (4) and Chunder Komal Das v. Bisassurree Dassia (5), the decisions in Ajudhia v. Kunjal (6); Mohanlal v. Tika Ram (7) and Karunakaran v. Krishna Menon (8), which take the same line.

The question is I think really dependent upon the construction of the document and the contract between the parties. Upon the language which has been employed in the present case it appears to me to be clear that what is conferred upon the plaintiff is an option which he may or may not exercise upon default in payment of one instalment. I do not think it can be said as has been argued that the only evidence of definite election not to treat the default as enabling the plaintiff to sue for the whole amount is to be found in a subsequent acceptance of payment of the instalment in default. The plaintiff has this option conferred upon him by the contract between the parties, and by that agreement payment of the instalments has been postponed to certain dates. I do not think it is open to the defendant to force upon the plaintiff an acceleration of his remedy in respect of those subsequent instalments by committing a breach in respect of one of the earlier instalments. In the present case what has happened is that, as I read the facts the plaintiff has elected not to proceed upon his remedy for the recovery of the full amount immediately upon the breach. When he filed his plaint in this suit he had a subsisting right of action upon the agreement to pay by instalments and was entitled to sue for such instalments as were at that time within the period of three years. I think a point relevant to the consideration of this matter is that pointed out by Mr. Das that if Art. 75, Lim. Act applies to the present case, then it is material to notice that the language in Cl. 3 has been altered from "when the first default is made" to "when the default is made;" and I think also the language in the first column may be material when it refers to a provision that if default be made in payment of one or more instalments the whole shall be due. In my view the option which the plaintiff had in this case was on default to say whether the whole shall be due or whether only the instalment shall be due. If he likes to treat the instalment as being due and not the whole that is his concern.

I think, therefore, there should be a decree for the amount claimed viz., Rs. 2136-2-0 with costs of the suit on scale No. 2 against defendant 1 and on scale No. 1 against defendant 2. Interest on decree at 6 per cent.

Criminal Revn. No. 975 of 1928, Decided on 8th February 1929.

(a) Calcutta Police Act, S. 54-A—S. 54-A is revolutionary in its provision of casting the entire burden of proof on the accused.

The provision contained in S. 54-A is revolutionary in its character, as it relieves the prosecution of its ordinary burden of proof in a criminal case, beyond what is necessary to create a reasonable suspicion, and throw the entire onus on the accused of removing that suspicion. A penal provision of this character should be strictly construed. [P 402 C2]

(b) Calcutta Police Act, S. 54—To uphold conviction actual physical and not potential possession of the 'thing' in some shape or form is necessary—Meaning of the terms, 'possession' and 'thing' explained.

Per Mukerji, J.—The word 'possession' should be understood in a sense ejusdem generis with the words 'conveys' and 'offers and etc.' and in the sense of actual physical possession. The word 'thing' appears in the section, in sub-S. (1) as "anything" and in sub-S. (2) as "the thing" and must necessarily mean tangible moveable property having a corporeal existence and capable of being handled. It is the suspected thing itself in some shape or form that can form the subject-matter of a case under S. 54. If a man was in possession of stolen gold ornaments and had got it melted or converted into gold, the gold is still the thing itself in a different shape or form. If instead of having the gold in his hand he keeps it in his house or with a friend or a goldsmith the gold is still in his possession. To such a case the section will apply. If a man deposits money in a bank, or purchases a cash certificate with it, the money loses all its identity and it cannot be said that he is still in actual physical possession of the money as a tangible piece of moveable property. The cash certificate or the fixed deposit receipt may represent the money for certain purposes but it is not the money itself as a 'thing' in another shape or form of such thing. (*Graham, J. (c) Criminal P. C., S. 242—Charge—Calcutta Police Act, S. 54-A.

When an accused has been tried under Ss. 381 and 411, I. P. C. he may be convicted of an offence under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, though not separately charged with it. A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 596, Foll. but not Appr. 29 Cal. 481, Ref. [P 402 C 2]

Probodh Chatterjee and Bireswar Chatterjee—for Petitioner.B. C. Chatterjee, Satindranath Mukerji and Amarendra Narayan Bagchi—for Opposite Party.A. S. M. Akram—for the Crown.

Mukerji, J.—The petitioner Radha Krishna Gupta alias Radha Krishna Byas was tried by the 3rd Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta along with another person for offences under Ss. 381 and 411, I. P. C. The learned Magistrate acquitted him of the said offences but convicted him under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act 4 (B. C.) of 1866 and sentenced him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for three months. He has also made an order that a fixed deposit receipt and a cash certificate which were found in the possession of the petitioner be made over to the complainant. The prosecution case was that the petitioner was a writer of accounts in the complainant's firm, that the petitioner had abstracted a blank but signed cheque form from the cheque book of the firm, filled it up for Rs. 9,500 and cashed it and misappropriated the money. The charges framed against the petitioner were the following:

First, a charge under S. 381, I. P. C., in respect of a blank signed cheque form No. Cx 350718, and 2nd, a charge under S. 411, I. P. C., in respect of Rs. 800 and Rs. 4,000 covered respectively by a postal certificate and a fixed deposit receipt. The learned Magistrate held as regards the first charge that all that had been proved was that the petitioner had an opportunity to abstract the cheque form but that there was no legal evidence on which it could be held that he did so, and that although there was a confession made by the petitioner, it could not be taken into consideration as it had not been voluntarily made. The first charge, therefore, in the opinion of the learned Magistrate failed.

As regards the second charge the learned Magistrate was of opinion that it had not been established that the moneys covered by the postal cash certificate and the fixed deposit receipt were the proceeds of the cheque. He held therefore that the second charge was not proved. Being of opinion however, that the purchase of a cash certificate for Rs. 800 and the deposit of Rs. 4,000 in the bank on 6th February 1928, "the eventful day" was highly suspicious the learned Magistrate proceeded to convict the petitioner under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, and sentenced him and made the order of disposal in complainant's favour as above-mentioned.

For one thing, the judgment of the learned Magistrate is highly inconsistent. If he was unable to convict the petitioner under S. 411, I. P. C. on the ground that no connexion had been established between the moneys covered by the postal certificate and the fixed deposit receipt it is difficult to see on what footing the said documents were to be made over to the complainant. In the view of the case can this order of the learned Magistrate be supported?

As regards the conviction under S. 54-A the learned Magistrate was not satisfied with the explanation which the petitioner had given as to how he came by such a large sum of money as he had put into the bank and for which he had purchased the cash certificate. But the question is, is S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, applicable to a case of this nature and is the conviction a proper one?

In challenging the validity of the conviction it has been urged on behalf of the petitioner that inasmuch as there had been no charge framed for an offence under S. 54-A, the conviction is bad in law. Now it is true that S. 54-A is an offence triable as a summons case and for a trial of this offence no charge is necessary: vide S. 242, Criminal P. C., but if it was intended that the petitioner was to stand his trial for this offence along with offence under Ss. 381 and 411, I. P. C., which are triable as a warrant case it was necessary to give the petitioner notice of that fact, and consequently a charge was also necessary to be framed for the offence under S. 54-A: Hossein Sardar v. Kalu Sardar (1). It is true that the petitioner has, in fact, adduced some evidence in support of the explanation that he gave for transactions of the day, but it cannot be said that he was not misled or that it may be assumed that he had no further defence to make. Omission to frame the charge was in my opinion, a serious irregularity which must be held to have vitiated the trial much more serious than a mere omission to frame a charge in a warrant case in which the petitioner knows what he is being tried for. But it has been held by this Court in the case of Tulsi Tolini v. Emperor (2) that when an accused has been tried on a charge under S. 379, I. P. C., he may be convicted of an offence under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, though not separately charged with it. Whether I agree with the principle of that decision or not I feel bound by it and I must hold that this contention should be overruled.

But a more serious illegality in this conviction in my opinion is the application of S. 54-A to the case. The judgment of the learned Magistrate is not very clear on the question as to what it was that formed the subject matter of this charge. Learned advocate appearing on behalf of the Crown seemed to argue that it was the two sums of Rs. 800 and Rs. 4,000 which was the subject-matter while learned advocate for the complainant while not disapproving of that contention urged that it was the postal cash certificate and the fixed deposit receipt which were the subject-matter. In my opinion neither of these two acts could possibly form the subject-matter of a case under S. 54-A.

As regards the postal cash certificate and the fixed deposit receipt they are property belonging to the petitioner himself and standing in his own name, and the contention that they were fraudulently obtained from the Post Office and the bank by the fraudulent concealment of the fact that the money was not the accused's money need not be seriously considered.

The sums of money Rs. 800 and Rs. 4,000 had already been parted with by the petitioner, even if at one time they were in his possession. The first part of S. 54-A is drawn almost word per word from the Metropolitan Police Courts Act 2 and 3 Vic. Ch. 71, S. 24. The limited meaning which the words of that section of the statute have been held to bear, has not been adopted in this country. It is noticeable nevertheless that the provision contained in S. 54-A is revolutionary in its character, relieving as it does the prosecution of its ordinary burden of proof in a criminal case, beyond what is necessary to create a reasonable suspicion, and throwing the entire onus on the accused of removing that suspicion. A penal provision of this character should, in my opinion, be strictly construed.

The section is divided into two subsections. In sub-S. (1) the word used is "has" contradistinguished from the word "had" in sub-S. (2) and the said word used with reference to "had" in sub-S. (2) and the said word used with reference to "possession" implies present possession. While therefore a person may be proceeded against under sub-S. (1) if he is in possession at the time when the proceedings are taken, proceedings may be taken under sub-S. (2) against a person who had possession in the past and from whom the former may have received the thing. The word "possession" should be understood in a sense ejusdem generis with the words "conveys" and "offers, etc." and in the sense of actual physical possession; the object of the sub-S. (1) being to oblige a person to explain how he came by some articles which he has with him. There is a difference between the two subsections in this way that under sub-S. (1) it is the failure to explain which attracts that subsection, while for a conviction under sub-S. (2) it must be shown that the person had reasonable cause to believe that the thing was stolen or fraudulently obtained; but this is a matter which need not be considered here.

(2) A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 596=50 Cal. 564.

The word 'thing' appears in the section, in sub-S. (1), as 'anything' and in sub-S. (2) as "the thing" and must necessarily mean tangible moveable property having a corporeal existence and capable of being handled. In my opinion it is the suspected thing itself in some shape or form that can form the subject-matter of a case under this section. If a man was in possession of stolen gold ornaments and had got it melted or converted into gold, the gold is still the thing itself in a different shape or form. If instead of having the gold in his hand he keeps it in his house or with a friend or a goldsmith the gold is still in his possession. To such a case the section will apply, as was the case in Tulsi Tolini v. Emperor (2). If a man deposits money in a bank, or purchases a cash certificate with it, the money loses all its identity and I cannot conceive how it can be said that he is still in actual physical possession of the money as a tangible piece of moveable property. The cash certificate or the fixed deposit receipt may represent the money for certain purposes but it is not the money itself as a "thing" in another shape or form of such thing. I am therefore of opinion that this conviction is entirely misconceived. S. 54-A has already been extended to cases to which in my opinion, it was never intended to apply, but to extend it to a case like this and to authorize a Magistrate to call upon a person to explain his wealth or prosperity would be far too dangerous.

I would accordingly make the rule absolute and set aside the conviction of the petitioner under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act and the sentences passed on him under that section. The order of delivery of the postal cash certificate and the fixed deposit receipt cannot stand and must also be set aside. If the above orders are passed it will be necessary to pass some order for the disposal of the said two documents. I may say without hesitation that I am somewhat doubtful about the correctness of the acquittal of the petitioner on the charge under S. 411, I. P. C. I would therefore order that the said documents should be detained in Court for a period of three months from today within which time the complainant may, if he be so advised, take measures to get his rights declared to the documents or obtain such other or further orders in his favour which would entitle him to them or would justify their further detention, and in the event of his failing to do so within that time the said documents should be returned to the petitioner from whose possession they were taken.

Graham, J.—I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brother in this case. The facts out of which this rule has arisen are shortly as follows :

The petitioner Radha Krishna Gupta alias Radha Kissen Byas was put on his trial along with another person before the 3rd Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta, the charges framed against the petitioner being :

First, that on or about 15th February 1928 he committed theft of a blank cheque on the Central Bank of India from a cheque book belonging to the complainant Jamuna Das Fatepuria already signed by him, and thereby committed an offence under S. 381, I. P. C. and secondly, that on or about 6th February 1928 he dishonestly received or retained stolen property to wit Rs. 800 covered by a postal cash certificate and Rs. 4,000 covered by a fixed deposit receipt of the P. and O. Banking Corporation knowing or having reason to believe the same to be stolen property being a portion of the money obtained by cashing a cheque filled up for Rs. 9,500 and that he thereby committed an offence under S. 411, I. P. C.

The Magistrate found that the charge under S. 381, I. P. C., failed as the evidence fell short of actual proof that the accused stole the cheque form, though there was evidence that he had the opportunity to do so. It was further held that the charge under S. 411, I. P. C., also failed inasmuch as there was nothing to show that the moneys found with the accused were the actual proceeds of the cheque in question.

Having recorded these findings the Magistrate then went on to hold that the accused was guilty of an offence under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, in respect of the said moneys, and sentenced him to three months rigorous imprisonment, directing at the same time that the fixed deposit receipt for Rs. 4,000 and the cash certificate of Rs. 1,000 found with the accused should be made over to the complainant.

The legality of the conviction has been assailed mainly on two grounds :

Firstly, that the elements necessary to constitute an offence under S. 54-A Calcutta Police Act, were not made out against the accused and that that section has no application in a case like the present, and secondly that no charge having been framed against the accused under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, the conviction is bad in law and cannot be sustained. The first of these seems to be a point of some importance. S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, reads as follows :

"Whoever has in his possession or conveys in any manner anything which there is reason to believe to have been stolen or fraudulently obtained shall, if he fails to account for such possession, or act to the satisfaction of the Magistrate, be liable to fine, which may extend to one hundred rupees, or with imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term which may extend to three months."

The language of the section is in the widest terms and the question, so far as this case is concerned, is whether on 6th February the accused had in his possession the sums of Rs. 800 and Rs. 4,000 which there was reason to believe to have been stolen or fraudulently obtained.

It has been argued on behalf of the petitioner that the section applies only in the case of a person who is in possession of properties actually stolen, or reasonably believed to be stolen, and has no application where an accused is found in possession merely of documents entitling him to possession of sums of money as in this case. The argument appears to be that in such circumstance it cannot be definitely concluded that the money so deposited is the money stolen, or suspected to be stolen or fraudulently obtained. This contention seems to me to be without any real substance. The word "possession" in the section cannot, I think, be limited or restricted to actual physical possession but must include what may be termed potential possession such as arises when money is deposited in a bank or post office. In this instance the accused, though not in actual physical possession of the cash, was to all intents and purposes in possession within the ordinary meaning of the word by reason of the fact that he had in his possession the cash certificate and deposit receipt entitling him to the moneys. Such possession it seems to me is just as much possession as if the money were in the person of the accused or in his house.

It has been urged that S. 54-A was never meant to apply to a case of this description and that it is applicable only in the case of persons found in the streets, or at the jetties or such places in possession of properties suspected to be stolen. It may be that the Act was not designed to meet cases of this description. But I can find nothing in the language of the section which as I have said is as wide as it can be, to limit or restrict its operation to cases of actual physical possession, nor does there seem to be any reason why it should not apply in a case like the present where it is alleged that the accused was found in possession, albeit potential possession of considerable sums of money suspected to be stolen for which he was unable to give any satisfactory explanation.

The prosecution relied upon the circumstances taken as a whole for the purpose of establishing that the accused was in possession of these stolen moneys, or a part thereof and those circumstances are without doubt very strong. The blank signed cheque was found to be missing on 6th February and is said to have been stolen either on that day or the previous day. On the same date 6th February, the accused deposited

Rs. 4,000 at the P. and O. Bank and brought the cash certificate for Rs. 800. It was not disputed at the trial that these deposits were made by the accused and the onus being under S. 54-A upon him to account for his possession, he adduced evidence to prove that they were made with a sum of Rs. 5,000 received by him on 6th February from a firm styled Nayasook Das Gopi Kissen. A witness named Ganga Das said to be cashier of the firm in question was examined for the defence. But the Magistrate rejected his testimony for reasons which he has given. The Magistrate finally held that the circumstances as a whole established that the accused who was a servant of the complainant on a small salary was guilty of being in possession of the moneys in question and convicted him as already stated.

We have not been referred to any decided case in which it has been held that the section is applicable only in the case of actual physical possession of property as distinguished from potential possession derived from the possession of documents entitling the holder to possession. To my mind the distinction sought to be drawn is a distinction without any real difference, for a person may surely be just as much in possession by holding a deposit receipt on a cash certificate, as if he had the money deposited in his safe in his house. He merely keeps it in a bank for greater security, and, it seems to me that it would be adopting a dangerous principle to hold that moneys suspected or proved to be stolen cease to be in possession of the thief so soon as he has been able to deposit them in a bank or post office.

As regards the second contention that the conviction is illegal because no charge was framed under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, it may be observed that the offence under S. 54, Calcutta Police Act, being summarily triable the framing of a formal charge is not necessary: vide 242, Criminal P. C. Apart from this under S. 362 (4), Criminal P. C., the case not being one in which an appeal lies the Magistrate was not bound to frame a charge. The point also seems to be covered by S. 237, Criminal P. C. Tulsi Teloni v. Emperor (2).

For the reasons stated I am of opinion that the rule in this case should be discharged. (On difference of the two Judges the case was put before Buckland, J.)

Buckland, J.—The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgments of my learned brothers Mukerji and Graham, JJ., who have had the misfortune to differ so that the case has been laid before me under S. 429, Criminal P. C.

The learned advocate who has appeared for the complainant whose argument has been adopted by the learned advocate for the Crown, has informed me that his case is that the property the subject matter of the conviction is the sum of Rs. 4,000 deposited in the bank and the sum of Rs. 800 paid by the accused for the postal cash certificate. I will take that to be correct though the judgment of the Magistrate is anything but clear as to this. The point to be decided is whether these sums of money are in the possession of the petitioner within the meaning of S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act.

The cash postal certificate and the fixed deposit receipt were found on 7th February 1928 in the possession of the petitioner. If he is to be held as being in possession of the money which those documents represent and is now in the bank and with the Postal Department such possession must have begun at the time when he paid in the money and received the documents in exchange. Whatever may have since become of the documents there must have been a period of time long or short, it makes no difference, when if the view urged is correct he must have been in possession of both the documents and the money. Such a result to my mind proves the fallacy of the argument advanced, which appears to involve a confusion between actual possession and such right to possession as these documents may confer. Such right may, I conceive be or become qualified, and, in the case of the bank, must depend upon the terms of the contract under which the deposit was made. These cannot be matters to be considered under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, in determining the meaning of possession. Substantially the same considerations apply to the money represented by the cash postal certificate.

Without attempting to lay down any general rule as to the meaning of the word possession in the section, it is sufficient to say that in my judgment the petitioner cannot be held to be in possession of the money represented by the documents in question and the rule must be made absolute.

As regards the cash postal certificate and fixed deposit receipt, I set aside the order of the Magistrate directing that they be made over to the complainant and direct that they be detained in Court for three months from to-day and held meantime subject to any order that may be made by this Court in its original civil jurisdiction. If no such order shall have been made within the period stated they may be returned to the petitioner.

P.R./R.K. Conviction set aside.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 1234 of 1928, Decided on 5th February 1929.

Criminal P. C., S. 370(F)—Entry "denies" made in column provided for making record of plea and examination of accused in form prescribed under S. 370, is sufficient if accused simply denied having committed offence.

While the column provided for making a record of the plea and examination of the accused in the form prescribed under S. 370 must be filled, there is no rule as to how that should be done. So the entry "denies" made in that column is sufficient if when the plea was taken and when the accused was examined he merely denied having committed the offence.

Mritunjoy Chattopadhyaya and Sachindra Nath Banerjee—for Petitioner.

Debendra Narain Bhattacharjee—for the Crown.

Judgment.—The petitioner has been convicted under S. 65, Port Rules framed under the Calcutta Port Act 3 (B. C.) of 1890 and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 5 or in default to undergo simple imprisonment for 7 days.

The grounds on which this Rule has been pressed are that the petitioner was not examined by the Magistrate after the examination of the prosecution witnesses and no memorandum of the examination of the petitioner was kept by the Magistrate. The records have been destroyed, but the learned Magistrate has stated in his explanation that he did examine the petitioner under S. 342, Criminal P. C. This explanation must be accepted and the only question is whether the failure to keep a memorandum of the statement of the petitioner can be held to have vitiated the trial. The entry in the column of the form provided for making a record of the plea and the examination of the accused is "Denies."

Now S. 370, Criminal P. C., itself does not say how the particulars are to be recorded, but there are two other sections in the Code from which light has to be gathered on this matter, namely Ss. 362 and 364. The last words of Sub-S (4), S. 364.

"Or in the course of a trial held by a Presidency Magistrate"

were inserted by the Amending Act 1923, thus making the other subsections of that section inapplicable to a record made by a Presidency Magistrate of an examination of an accused person in the course of a trial held by him. The same amending Act introduced two subsections in S. 362, namely 2-A and 4. Sub-S. 4 dispensed with the recording of evidence and the framing of a charge in non-appealable cases in trials held by Presidency Magistrate, but said nothing about the record of the accused's examination. Sub-S. 2-A expressly provided for a memorandum of the substance of the examination of an accused being kept by the Presidency Magistrate, signed by the Magistrate with his own hand, in appealable cases only. The result is that non-appealable cases are now left severely alone, confined to the protection that S. 370 by its own terms would afford. It is idle to imagine that the legislature while expressly taking away the necessity to record the evidence and to frame a charge, as it has done by enacting sub-S. (4), S. 362 in non-appealable cases, thought of a record in full or of the substance of the examination of the accused in such cases. The result in my opinion, is that it should be held that while the column provided for this purpose in the form prescribed by S. 370 must be filled up, no hard and fast rule was contemplated as to how that should be done. In the present case the word "denies" has been written in the column. It may be that when the plea was taken and again when the petitioner was examined as I must hold that he was examined—he merely denied having committed the offence. If that was the fact the entry was sufficient. The rule should therefore be discharged and I order accordingly.

Appeal No. 1832 of 1926, Decided on 10th August 1928, against appellate Decree of Sub-Judge, 2nd Court, Alipur, D/- 25th May 1926.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease providing “on expiration of term written in patta you will take new settlement”—Tenant not exercising his option when term expired or within reasonable time—He cannot resist landlord’s suit for ejectment—Lease—Construction.

A lease provided that “on the expiration of the term written in this patta you will take a new settlement.” The tenant, however, did not exercise his option of taking a new settlement when the term expired nor did he exercise that option within a reasonable time.

Held: that the tenant was not entitled to resist the suit for ejectment by landlord.

D. N. Chuckerbutty, Ajendra Nath Dutt and Rabindra Nath Ghose—for Appellant.

Panna Lal Chatterjea—for Respondent.

Mallik, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for ejectment on the ground of expiration of the term of a written lease. The plaintiff’s claim was resisted on the allegation that in the lease under which the defendant held the land, there was a covenant for renewal on the old terms. This defence found favour with the Courts below and the Courts below dismissed the plaintiff’s suit. The plaintiff has appealed to this Court.

The passage in the lease on the strength of which the defendant wanted to resist the plaintiff’s claim runs thus:

“On the expiration of the term written in this patta you will take a new settlement; but if for any reason a new settlement be not possible, you shall at your own expense remove the rooms etc. etc.”

This clause in the document may show that if the defendant had any right to take a new settlement of the land, he was to take a new settlement on the expiration of the term written in the patta which term expired on 16th January 1922. The defendant, however, did not exercise his option of taking a new settlement when this term expired nor did he exercise that option within a reasonable time because it appears that he did not offer to take a new settlement for ten long months after the lease had expired and until the action for ejectment had actually begun. The defendant not having exercised his option to take a new settlement of the land either on the expiration of the term of the lease or within a reasonable time after expiration thereof was not, in our judgment, entitled to resist the plaintiff’s claim for khas possession. In that view of the matter, the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Page, J.—I agree. It must not be taken, however, that we should hold, in the circumstances obtaining in this case, that the clause in dispute would create an option for the defendant to renew the lease for two years or seven years or ten years or twelve years or any term. It is, however, unnecessary to construe the clause, having regard to what has fallen from my learned brother. The case will be returned to the trial Court for the issues as to the amount of mesne profits and of the compensation (if any) for fixtures to be determined according to law. The defendant-respondent must vacate the premises within three weeks from to-day, subject to such further extension (if any) as may be granted in the discretion of the trial Court on application duly made to such Court within the three weeks.

Bhim Sankar Dutta Tewari and others—Opposite Parties.

Civil Rule No. 1056 of 1928, Decided on 14th January 1929, against order of 2nd Addl. Sub-Judge, Noakhali, D/- 8th May 1928.

* Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 90—Application dismissed in default of both parties—Order confirming sale not passed—Order of dismissal is appealable under O. 43, R. 1 (j).

When no formal order has been recorded confirming the sale and the application under O. 21, R. 90 has been dismissed for default for non-appearance of both parties to the proceeding, the order of dismissal passed under those circumstances is open to appeal. There is no distinction in principle between an order passed on an application under O. 21, R. 90, dismissing it for default either for non-appearance of one or for non-appearance of both the parties. It is the disallowing of the application made under O. 21, R. 90 which corresponds to the order refusing to set aside a sale within the meaning of O. 43, R. 1, Cl. (j). The fact that a distinct order has not been recorded confirming the sale does not alter the character of the order disallowing an application under O. 21, R. 90 which is appealable by reason of the provisions of O. 43, R. 1, Cl. (j) : A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 773, not Foll. ; A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 510 Rel. on. [P 409 C 2]

Jotindra Nath Sanyal for Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta—for Petitioner.

Mukerji, J.—This Rule has been issued to show cause why the order of the Subordinate Judge of Noakhali, dated 8th May 1928, refusing to entertain an appeal should not be set aside, or why such other or further order should not be made as to this Court may seem fit and proper.

The facts necessary to be stated are these. There was an application under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., filed by the petitioner in the Court of Munsif at Sudhara. On the day fixed for the hearing of this application neither of the parties appeared before the Court with the result that the said application was dismissed for default. Against that order the petitioner preferred an appeal which came up before the Subordinate Judge of Noakhali, and he on 8th May 1928 dismissed the appeal holding that from the order passed by the Munsif no appeal lay under the law. It is against this order of the learned Subordinate Judge that the present rule is directed.

The question as to whether an order dismissing an application under O. 21, R. 90 for default is appealable or not has come up for consideration before this Court in a very large number of cases and it has been held that such an order falls under O. 21, R. 92, Civil P. C., and as such an appeal lies from it under O. 43, R. 1 (j) of the Code : see e. g. Brojo Sundar Roy v. Moti Lal (1), Kumud Kumar v. Hari Mohan Samaddar (2), and Kali Kanta v. Shyam Lal (3). In one of the more recent decisions of this Court a doubt was expressed by my learned brother Page, J., as regards the correctness of these decisions. This was the case of Basaratulla Mian v. Reazuddin Khan (4). In that case none of the parties to the proceedings appeared and upon that the application under O. 21, R. 90 was dismissed by the Court. On an application for revision being preferred to this Court. Page, J., was of opinion that the order of dismissal for default passed on an application under O. 21, R. 90 of the Code is not an order which is appealable unless it also confirms the sale within the meaning of O. 21, R. 92 of the Code. He, however, distinguished the earlier decisions of this Court to some of which I have already referred upon the ground that in those cases the application had been dismissed for default of the applicant and they were not cases in which both parties were absent. He was able to distinguish those cases upon the ground aforesaid and he held that when both parties are absent and the application under O. 21, R. 90 is dismissed under circumstances which would correspond to O. 9, R. 4, Civil P. C., an appeal can under no circumstances lie from such an order of dismissal. The learned Subordinate Judge appears to have followed this decision of Page, J.

The petitioner's contention is that even in a case when the order of dismissal was passed on account of default of appearance on the part of both the parties to the proceeding, an appeal is maintainable under O. 43, R. 1 (j), in view of the fact that such an order comes within the per-view of O. 21, R. 92 of the Code. There is a decision of this Court, though not reported, passed in appeal from order No. 285 of 1922 and rule No. 659-M of 1922 in which it appears that it was held that an appeal does lie from such an order. There is also another decision of this Court in the case of Narendra Nath v. Rakhal Das (5), which was a case in which the Court disallowed the prayer of an application in a proceeding under O. 21, R. 90 for time and when neither of the parties to the proceeding was present dismissed the application and confirmed the sale, and it was held that such an order was appealable under O. 43, R. 1 (j) of the Code. The last mentioned

(1) [1910] 14 C. W. N. 573=5 I. C. 493=13 C. L. J. 153.

(2) [1915] 21 C. L. J. 628=30 I. C. 45.

(3) [1917] 25 C. L. J. 163=38 I. C. 598.

case no doubt is distinguishable from the case now before us, because here it does not appear that although the application was dismissed for default there was any formal order recorded confirming the sale.

The question therefore is whether when no such formal order has been recorded confirming the sale and the application under O. 21, R. 90 has been dismissed for default for non-appearance of both the parties to the proceeding, the order of dismissal passed under those circumstances is open to appeal. It appears that in the Code of 1882, S. 312 which corresponds to O. 21, R. 92 of the Code of 1908 ran in these words:

"If no such application as is mentioned in the last preceding section be made, or if such application be made and the objection be disallowed the Court shall pass an order confirming the sale as regards the parties to the suit and the purchaser."

Section 588 of that Code which corresponds to O. 43 of the present Code and provided for appeals from orders in its Cl. (16) enacted that:

"orders under S. 294 and orders under S. 312 and orders under S. 313 for confirming or setting aside or refusing to set aside a sale or immovable property etc."

In the present Code O. 43, R. 1 (j) speaks of an order under R. 72 (with which we are not concerned) or R. 92, O. 21, setting aside or refusing to set aside a sale. It appears therefore that the words "for confirming" which were to be found in S. 588, Cl. 16 have been dropped out. The obvious intention of the legislature was not to treat an order confirming a sale as one distinct in its essence from an order disallowing an application under O. 21, R. 90. This intention appears to be further clear from the fact that O. 21, R. 92 says that where no application is made under R. 89, R. 90 or R. 91 or where such an application is made and disallowed the Court shall make an order confirming the sale and thereupon the sale shall become absolute. It is the disallowing of the application made under O. 21, R. 90 which corresponds to the order refusing to set aside a sale within the meaning of O. 43, R. 1 Cl. (j). The fact that a distinct order has not been recorded confirming the sale does not alter the character of the order disallowing an application under O. 21, R. 90 and it is this last mentioned order that is appealable by reason of the provisions of

O. 43, R. 1, Cl. (j). My learned brother Page, J., was prepared to make a distinction between orders passed for default of appearance on the part of both the parties and orders passed for default of appearance of one of the parties only, and he observed that in dismissing an application for default when neither party appears on the case being called on for hearing the Court does not refuse to set aside the sale, but in the absence of the parties refuses to consider whether the sale should be set aside or not. With all respect I should say that this distinction, in my judgment, really makes no difference in the result because the statutory consequence of the disallowing of the application is the confirmation of the sale at least to the extent covered by the application. In my opinion it is not correct to draw any conclusion from the analogy furnished by the provisions of O. 9, R. 4 and O. 9, R. 9 because the provisions of O. 9 have got no application to a case under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C. I am of opinion that there is no distinction in principle between an order passed on an application under O. 21, R. 90 dismissing it for default either for non-appearance of one of for non-appearance of both the parties, and the principle upon which the other decisions to which I have referred above proceed, is in my opinion, equally applicable to a case of the present nature.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this Rule should be made absolute. The order against which it is directed is accordingly set aside and it is ordered that the learned Subordinate Judge should proceed to entertain the appeal and deal with it in accordance with law.

As there is no appearance for the opposite party in this rule there will be no order for costs.

Krishna Kamal Moitra—for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for declaration of title to and recovery of khas possession of 4.66 acres of land described in the plaint. The plaintiffs are the purchasers at a sale held on 11th April 1921 under the Public Demands Recovery Act for arrears of rent, due to the Bhowal Raj Estate under the Court of Wards. The sale was confirmed on 14th June 1921, and it is alleged that delivery of possession of the land sold was given to the plaintiffs by the Collector on 26th July of the same year. The plaintiffs' case was that the defendants had not parted with possession of the land and hence they instituted the present suit on 19th September 1923.

Both the Courts below have given effect to the defendants' plea that the processes under the Public Demands Recovery Act had not been regularly served. They have held that it has not been proved that the notice or a copy of the certificate was served on defendant 1, the tenant as required by S. 7 of the said Act. There are also findings to the effect that the processes relating to the sale of the property were not served on the defendant and the story of the delivery of possession to the plaintiffs in pursuance of the sale is false. On these grounds the lower Courts have dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. The plaintiffs have thereupon preferred this appeal.

It has been contended before us on behalf of the plaintiffs-appellants that the Courts below are not right in allowing the defendant to raise the plea as regards the non-service and the invalidity of the processes under the Public Demands Recovery Act. Both the Courts below have considered this point and are of opinion that the defendant is entitled to challenge the validity of the sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act. The learned Subordinate Judge in the lower appellate Court has held that, inasmuch as the present suit was brought within the period within which the defendant was entitled to bring a suit under the Public Demands Recovery Act to have the sale set aside, he is entitled to urge by way of defence all the objections that he could have raised had he brought a suit under the said Act. This view, in our opinion, cannot be maintained. The Public Demands Recovery Act may generally be regarded as a Code in itself and it has laid down the procedure to be observed in effecting a sale under it. It is not contended in this case by the defendant that there were no arrears due from him or that the certificate prepared under S. 4 of the Act was not duly filed. All the objections that the defendant has taken in the present case relate to the subsequent conduct of the person responsible for the service of the notice and the sale processes. It may be noted here that the plaintiffs are strangers and had nothing to do with the proceedings taken under the Public Demands Recovery Act.

After a certificate is issued, it has to be filed under S. 6 of the Act and thereafter notice of the certificate in the prescribed form is issued under S. 7. When the notice is served, there are several remedies provided for in the Act which may be availed of by the debtor to have the certificate set aside. It is necessary to refer only to a few of the sections of the Act to show what remedies are open to the debtor against a sale under a certificate under the Act and where those remedies stop. For our present purpose, we will consider the remedies which come into existence after the sale of the property. Under S. 22, the sale may be set aside on deposit of the amount due. Under S. 23, the person whose property is sold may within a certain time apply by the certificate officer to set aside the sale on the ground of non-service of notice or on the ground of a material irregularity in the certificate proceedings or in publishing or conducting the sale. S. 24 gives the debtor the right to bring a suit in the civil Court to have only the certificate cancelled or modified and for any further consequential relief under certain limitations. S. 35 debars a civil Court from setting aside a certificate sale except on the ground that the amount stated in the certificate was actually paid or discharged, that no part of the amount stated in the certificate was due by the certificate-debtor and that in cases of non-payment of fines imposed or costs, etc. or fees adjudged by a Collector or a public officer under any law, the proceedings of such Collector or public officer were not in substantial conformity with the provisions of such law. S. 36 is an important section to be considered in this connexion. It provides that if the debtor has not applied to the Collector under Ss. 22 or 23 he may bring a suit in the civil Court within one year of delivery of possession to the purchaser to set aside the sale on the ground of non-service of notice under S. 7. But it is expressly laid down there that a sale of immovable property in execution of a certificate shall not be held to be void on the ground that the notice required by S. 7 has not been served.

Reading all these sections together, one cannot but come to the conclusion that a certificate sale can only be set aside by the civil Court on the grounds that there were no arrears of rent due for which the certificate was taken or that notice under S. 7 was not served if the suit is brought within the time fixed. It becomes further clear that all the remedies that have been provided for by the Public Demands Recovery Act must be sought after. The jurisdiction of the civil Court to take cognizance of cases for setting aside certificates or certificate sales has been limited by several provisions in the Act itself. Lastly comes S. 37 which says that every question arising between the certificate holder and the certificate debtor or their representatives relating to execution etc., of a certificate duly filed under this Act or relating to the confirmation or setting aside of a sale held in execution of such certificate shall be determined not by suit but by order of the certificate officer. There is a proviso attached to the section that a suit may be brought in a civil Court in respect of any such question on the ground of fraud. This limits the jurisdiction of the civil Court as between parties to the certificate in a suit for setting aside a certificate and virtually reduces it to a suit based upon fraud only.

Now, the position in the present case is this: The defendant when he came to know of the certificate and the sale thereunder had to seek remedies provided for by the Public Demands Recovery Act. It is found by the Subordinate Judge that the defendants' right to take proceedings under the said Act had not been extinguished by virtue of the application of S. 18, Limitation Act. But that does not seem to be a valid ground for holding that, because the defendants' right to sue subsisted on the date the present suit was brought, he had the right, without bringing such a suit, to raise objections against a certificate sale by way of defence. There is no authority either in the Statute law or in the case law in support of the view that it is open to the defendant to challenge the certificate sale by way of defence in a suit for possession brought by the purchaser. As already stated, the remedy of the certificated debtor is limited to the procedure indicated in the Act itself. We are not called upon in this case to consider whether a defence could be raised with regard to the invalidity of the sale on the ground that there was no money due from the certificate debtor at the time when the certificate was issued; nor are we called upon to consider whether it is competent to the defendant to raise the objections under S. 47, Civil P. C., in a civil Court sale or any similar enactment. The Public Demands Recovery Act seems to us to vest the certificate officer with an exclusive jurisdiction to deal with questions relating to the publication of the certificate and the processes thereunder. The right of interference by the civil Court is limited to cases where there were no arrears due or non-service of notice under S. 7 or the whole proceedings are vitiated by fraud. It is not denied in this case that arrears were due nor has it been contended that the certificate had not been duly filed. In these circumstances, to hold that it is open to the defendant to take by way of defence objections to the validity of the sale in a suit in the civil Court and that Court is competent to give effect to it, would be virtually to vest the civil Court with powers which are expressly denied to the civil Court.

The observations of the Judicial Committee in Govind Lal Roy v. Ramjanam (1), with reference to a sale for arrears of revenue oppositely apply to sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act. Their Lordships say that it is a sale held by the Collector or other officer authorized to hold sales under the Act, although it may be contrary to the provisions of the Act by reason of some irregularity in publishing or conducting the sale and that security of purchasers at sales for public demands should not be impaired.

Reference has been made in this connexion to some cases which have very little bearing on the point before us except an unreported case of this Court, Reajuddin Dalal v. Secretary of State (2). In that case, it appears to have been held that a sale held under a certificate without notifying the date, time and place is liable to be set aside by a civil Court as the sale was in substance a colourable exercise of the powers conferred on the certificate officer by the Statute. There the certificate debtor was the plaintiff and it may be that the learned Judges who decided those cases thought that it was a case of fraud which came within the ambit of S. 37, Public Demands Recovery Act. It is not further clear that that was not a suit under S. 36 or any other section of the Act. Without admitting the correctness of the view expressed therein, we do not think that that decision is of any help to us for the determination of the question raised in this appeal, namely, whether the defendant can in a suit against him object in his defence to the certificate sale in the civil Court. The next case referred to is the case of Protap Chandra v. Secretary of State (3). In that case, it was held that the certificate itself was bad as S. 4, Public Demands Recovery Act, did not authorize the issue of more than one certificate in the prescribed form given in the appendix. In that case too, the certificate-debtor was the plaintiff. Some support to the view which has been taken by us in this case is to be found from the ratio of the decision given in the case of Jogneswar Sikhdar v. Kailash Mandal (4). It is therein expressed that the defendant cannot in his defence be allowed to challenge a sale held by the civil Court inasmuch as he did not seek the remedy offered to him by O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C. It may possibly be argued that where the sale is a nullity or void, the objection can be taken by a defendant by way of defence. But in the present case, no such question arises. The sale here is not void but is voidable at the worst. It was open to the debtor to have proper proceedings taken before the proper tribunal. The defendant has not been able to show that the sale under which the plaintiffs claim did not confer any right on them by virtue of any defect.

There is a finding by the trial Court that the sale certificate does not cover the entire property in suit. The Subordinate Judge has laid down the law correctly when he says that a misdescription in the sale proclamation cannot be a ground for holding that a property did not pass under it if it can be gathered from the surrounding facts and circumstances that there could not be any doubt as to what was actually sold. But the learned Subordinate Judge has not considered the evidence upon this point and the fact relating to it in full, inasmuch as he is of opinion that the view he has taken with regard to the invalidity of the sale is enough to dispose of the suit. As we are of opinion that the defendant is not entitled to resist the plaintiffs' claim on the grounds urged by him in his defence, the plaintiffs' suit must succeed. But we should like to see a definite finding by the Subordinate Judge on the point dealt with by the Munsif namely, whether the sale certificate covers the property in suit and, if it does, whether the whole of it or a part only.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal is allowed, the decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and case is remitted to that Court for disposal after a clear finding as to whether the sale certificate Ex. 4 covers the land in suit or any portion thereof. The plaintiffs' suit will be decreed according to the finding arrived at upon this issue. If any portion of the land in suit is not found to be covered by the sale certificate, the plaintiffs' suit will be dismissed to that extent. The plaintiffs are entitled to their costs in this Court. Costs of the Courts below will abide the result.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 52—Tenant proving deficiency in area is entitled to abatement of rent unless landlord shows express stipulation or other circumstances precluding tenant from claiming relief.

When the tenant has shown that there is a deficiency in area proved by measurement in respect of the tenures or holdings in his possession he is entitled to an abatement of rent even though the tenant has not shown what the area was, at the time of the inception of the tenancy or what the state of things was when the rent was assessed or adjusted, unless the landlord shows that either the tenant has no right to abatement by some express stipulation contained in any document governing the tenancy or that there are circumstances which would disentitle the tenant to obtain relief: 22 C. Judgment.—The suits out of which appeals Nos. 31, 33, 34, and 35 have arisen were commenced by the tenants praying for abatement of rent on the ground of decrease in area of the tenures covered by the suits on account of diluvion. The first Court held that the plaintiffs tenants had been able to prove that the area in each case, for which rent had been previously paid by them was larger than the area in their possession at the time of the commencement of the suits and that the deficiency in the area was due to diluvion. The learned Munsiff stated that there was no document forthcoming from which the original area, that is, the area at the time of the inception of the tenancy could be found out and that there were no materials whatsoever, on the record by which the extent of the original area of the tenures could be traced. He also stated that the plaintiffs had been able to produce before him the Record-of-Rights which showed that the recorded area in the possession of the plaintiffs at the time of such Record-of-Rights, namely, in 1907 was larger than the area found, by the commissioner who had been appointed to measure the land, in the possession of the plaintiffs. The question then arose as to whether the fact that the tenants had been unable to show what the area was at the time of the inception of the tenancy would have the effect of barring relief to the tenants in the circumstances referred to above. The first Court observed as follows :

“Abatement on the ground of decrease in area due to diluvion is an ordinary incident of a tenure and my opinion is that the tenant is entitled to some relief on this score only if it can be shown that at some date prior to the institution of the suit the tenant paid rents for a larger area than in existence at present. This does not injure the landlord at all and it is he who profits by the tenant's failure due to ignorance to establish the original area. The original area which was surely greater than the area taken as the starting basis for calculation being not taken into account the proportion to which the tenant is entitled is increased to the advantage of the landlord. For the purposes of the suits, I am thus inclined to take the areas noted in the settlement records as the basis of my calculations. The records were prepared long ago and it can be presumed that the tenants are paying the recorded rentals for the recorded area.”

The first Court then went into an elaborate calculation showing what the recorded area in the possession of the plaintiffs was as tenants in the Record-of-Rights and what the area found by the Commissioner in their possession was and gave them the appropriate relief on the basis of the difference of the two areas referred to above. The lower appellate Court to which appeals had been carried by the defendant landlord in the above circumstances held that the tenants having failed to prove the area for which rent had been previously paid by them and the Munsiff having failed to find out whether the rent was a consolidated rent for the entire tenure disallowed the abatement granted by the Munsiff. Against this decision of the lower appellate Court the plaintiffs tenants have preferred appeals Nos. 31, 33, 34 and 35.

In appeal No. 32 which arises out of Suit No. 151 of 1925, the plaintiff was the landlord and the tenants were the defendants. In that suit which was a suit for rent, the lower appellate Court granted a decree to the landlord for the amount of the rent claimed and refused to grant any abatement whatsoever. Against this decree, the defendants the tenants have appealed to this Court.

It appears, as indicated above, that there is no document forthcoming showing the inception of the tenancy but that the tenants have been able to show that the rent previously paid by them at any rate at the time of the Record-of-Rights was in respect of a larger area than the area found by the commissioner to be in their possession. Now, it cannot be disputed that rent is paid by a tenant for the use of the land settled with him or found to be in his possession and if, for no fault of the tenant, any portion of the land so settled is washed away he cannot on general principles of justice and equity be held liable to pay rent for the portion which has been washed away. This is elementary and has been referred to in a very early case decided in 1864 Sheikh Enayetoollh v. Sheik Elaheebuksh (1). In that case, Sir Barnes Peacock, C.J. stated that it was settled doctrine that the tenant was entitled to abatement for the lands washed away in all cases and even in the case where there was a kabuliati if the terms of the kabuliati were not such as to preclude him from claiming that abatement. One modern statement of what was stated by Sir Barnes Peacock in 1864 is to be found in the case of Salimullah v. Kali- prosonno (2). The rule being one founded on principles of natural justice and equity, we have to examine for ourselves whether there is anything in the section itself which precludes us from giving relief to the tenants in circumstances such as have been disclosed on the record.

To start with, it has been laid down in several cases that S. 52, Bengal Tenancy Act, is not exhaustive. But be that as it may, the terms of the section itself show conclusively that in the present instance the tenants have brought their cases within the purview thereof. They have shown in each case that the area for which rent had been previously paid by them, that is for the period between the date of the settlement record and the date of the commencement of the suits was larger than the area found to be in their possession as would appear from the result of the local investigation held by a commissioner duly appointed in that behalf. In other words, they have shown that there is a deficiency in area proved by measurement in respect of the tenures or holdings in their possession. That being so ex facie the tenants have brought their cases within the four corners of the sections. It is said, however, that the tenants have not shown what the area was at the time of the inception of the tenancy nor have they shown what the state of things was when the rent was assessed or adjusted. There is no doubt that the tenants have not shown what the area was at the inception of the tenancy nor have they shown what the state of things was when the rent was assessed or adjusted. But the real question is whether in the circumstances such as have arisen here the tenants are to be held disentitled to relief because of failure on their part to prove the matters referred to above. To hold that the tenants would be disentitled to relief would be to hold something not in accordance with the principles of natural justice and equity on which reliance was placed by Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., in the case of Sheikh Enayetoollah v. Sheikh Elaheebuksh (1) but to go merely by expressions used here and there in cases where the landlord was seeking to increase the rent payable by the tenant on the ground of increase in area. No case has been shown to us where in a suit by a tenant for abatement of rent on the ground of diluvion it has been laid down that the tenant is disentitled to relief because he has not been able to prove what the rent was at the time of the inception of the tenancy, or what the area was at the time when the rent was assessed or adjusted. In the absence of any such case, where the facts are that certain lands are proved to have been washed away and yet the claim for abatement is resisted by the landlord it must lie on the landlord to show that there are circumstances which do not entitle the tenant to claim relief. It is, in the first place, for the tenant to show that there is a deficiency in area. The onus of proof is then shifted on to the landlord to show that either the tenant has no right to abatement by some express stipulation contained in any document governing the tenancy or that there are circumstances which would disentitle the tenant to obtain relief. The landlord having failed to show any such circumstance and the onus of proof having been discharged by the tenants, it follows, in our opinion, that the tenants in these cases are entitled to the relief claimed. What the actual measure of such relief would be has been found by the learned Munsif and we have not enough materials on the record furnished by the landlord to show that the calculation made by the Munsif in measuring the amount of relief to be granted to the tenants was in any way wrong. That being so, we allow appeals Nos. 31, 33, 34 and 35.

(2) [1915] 22 C. L. J. 569=33 I. C. 319.

Appeal No. 32 must also be allowed. It is clear from what has been indicated above that in the suit out of which that appeal has arisen, the lower appellate Court has granted a decree for rent for the full amount claimed whereas the decree should have been for the amount of rent claimed by the plaintiff less the amount allowed on account of abatement of rent that is to say, the decree should have been for the amount allowed by the Munsif. The result, therefore, is that all these five appeals are allowed, the decrees of the lower appellate Court are set aside and those of the Court of first instance are restored and affirmed with costs in this Court as well as in the Court of appeal below.

Criminal P. C., S. 307—Judge disagreeing with verdict but not thinking to refer the case should not express his inconclusive opinion.

Sessions Judges are under no obligation to have or express their individual opinion upon really disputable questions of fact which are for the jury. If the Judge really disagrees with the verdict, that is, as a settled and considerate opinion then it is necessary for the ends of justice to refer the case; if he does not think it necessary his "disagreement," is not a reality and then he should not expose his inconclusive state of mind: (1871) 15 W. Asaduzzman—for Appellant.D. N. Bhattacharjee—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal by one Ibrahim Molla who has been sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment being convicted by the unanimous verdict of the jury for setting fire to a certain building on 17th March 1928. It appears that it occurred in the course of Ramjan days of this year. There is a good deal of evidence and if that is believed it clearly justifies the finding of the jury. The learned Judge points out that no witness actually states that he saw the accused setting fire to the place. The evidence, if it is believed, is to the effect that the complainant got up in the middle of the night, went outside and saw the accused and his brother Mobarak standing near the hut and was about to run away and he also saw the flames coming up. He then cried for help and number of people came up. These people have given evidence in the case and they say that they saw Ebrahim and his brother Mobarak there. In addition to that there is evidence which has been carefully laid before the jury evidence as to enmity and evidence of threat to burn down the house of Nefajuddin, the father of the complainant. This is a question entirely of fact. The learned Judge in his charge has gone through the evidence most minutely. He has put before the jury all the circumstances which he has analysed from every point of view and the only thing that can be said with regard to this charge is that it is full. It is so full and careful that it may be doubted if any ordinary juror could appreciate it in a short space of time. There is one point on which it is said that the learned Judge should have given fuller direction to the jury viz., with regard to the passage where he says "there is no eyewitness to prove that the accused set fire to the place." On that it is said that he should have gone and delivered a lecture to them on circumstantial evidence making it clear that circumstantial evidence must not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused but must be consistent with no other view. It is much more useful to tell the jury that they should not convict the accused until guilt is proved and that the evidence which is consistent with his innocence does not prove his guilt. In this case, I am unable to say that there is any important fact which has been misrepresented or overlooked. The learned Judge says:

"there is room for doubt as to whether the accused is really guilty. I see no reason to differ from the unanimous verdict of the jury, however, on what are after all, questions of fact. Not agreeing with but accepting the unanimous verdict of the jury I convict the accused."

This is a method of expression which I have noticed before and I cannot notice it again without deploring it. Sessions Judges are under no obligation whatsoever to have or to express their individual opinion upon really disputable questions of fact which are for the jury. If a Judge agrees or disagrees, it is a matter prima facie for himself but if he disagrees with the verdict of the jury and is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court, he is obliged to do so. If he is not clearly of opinion that the conviction is wrong so as to make it necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court then the position is that described in S. 306 "the Judge does not think it necessary to express disagreement" and his opinion being on that view irrelevant he will be well advised to keep it to himself. Learned Judges do not seem to appreciate that they are given an overriding power not that they may pose as critics but in order that miscarriage of justice may not take place. In this case there is no reference made under S. 307, Criminal P. C., and it does not seem to me that the charge can be attacked as defective or insufficient. In such a matter as a conviction for arson to intimate a doubt upon which one is not prepared to act is to cover the proceedings with all the appearance of injustice and indeed of despair for justice. If the Judge really disagrees with the verdict, i. e., has a settled and considered opinion that the crime has not been proved against the accused, it seems to be clear enough that it is necessary for the ends of justice to refer the case. If he does not think this necessary his "disagreement" cannot be a reality at all, and the less his inconclusive state of mind is exposed the better, as the law does not require him to interfere. In the case of verdicts of acquittal cases are fairly common in which the Judge thinks that the jury has taken a more favourable view for the prisoner than he would have taken himself and yet is not clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to refer the case. Here too, however, there is a certain indecency in acquitting the prisoner while publishing belief in his guilt. To administer properly Ss. 306, and 307, Criminal P. C., practical good sense is required not only as regards what is to be done but also as regards what is to be said and as a matter of practical good sense acquittals and convictions raise, for the present purpose, considerations which, while covered equally by the phrase "the ends of justice" are never quite the same.

As I find a dictum in the case of Queen v. Bahar Ali Kahar (1), still repeated in some text books saying that the Judge should always say whether he agrees with the jury. I would here add that under the Code of 1861 there were no provisions comparable to the present Ss. 306 and 307 the former of which in particular is an express enactment upon this subject. The case of Queen v. Bahar Ali Kahar (1), was one in which it was held that there was no evidence at all to go to the jury and the observation which has for so long been preserved appears to me to have been inapt and insufficiently considered.

The verdict of the jury must in this case stand and this appeal is dismissed.

Appeals Nos. 2684 to 2686 of 1926, Decided on 19th February 1929, against appellate decrees of Sub-Judge, Burdwan, D/- 15th September 1926.

Sarat Chandra Bose, Santosh Kumar Bose and Sisir Kumar Banerjee—for Appellants.

Sitaram Banerji and Bejoy Prosad Sinha Ray—for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—These three appeals arise out of three suits in which the plaintiffs sought for a declaration that certain lands were held by them rent free under the defendant as the defendant landlord had wrongly got these lands recorded in the Record-of-Rights as liable to pay rent and then fraudulently got rent assessed for them under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act. The plaintiffs also asked for confirmation of their possession and also for an injunction restraining the defendant from executing any decree for rent which he might obtain in certain rent suits which he had brought against them.

The first Court decreed the suits holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to a declaration that the lands were lakhiraj lands. That Court also confirmed their possession and issued permanent injunction on defendant 1 restraining him from realizing in execution the amounts of the decrees which he had obtained for rents for these lands. The defendant appealed to the District Court. The learned Subordinate Judge held that the suits were barred by limitation and further that they were barred by S. 109, Ben. Ten. Act. With regard to the question of limitation he held that the suits were governed by Art. 120, Lim. Act, which provides a period of six years. He held that time ran against the plaintiffs from the date of the final publication of the Record-of-Rights and hence the suits were barred by limitation. He further found that S. 109, Ben. Ten. Act, was a bar to the present suits. The defendant had made an application under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for a declaration that these lands were not rentfree lands but rent paying lands and to have a fair rent assessed upon them. These proceedings were decided ex parte against the present plaintiffs.

The learned Subordinate Judge held that these questions were res judicata and the present suits were barred. As regards the question of limitation the first question decided by the learned Subordinate Judge was whether Art. 120 or Art. 142 or 144, Lim. Act applied to the present cases. In other words whether 6 years or 12 years rule of limitation applied to the cases. The plaintiffs had added to their declaratory suits prayers for confirmation of possession and an injunction that the defendants might be restrained from realizing rents in execution of any decrees that he might obtain in certain rent suits. With regard to the prayer for confirmation of possession the learned Subordinate Judge has held, and I agree with him, that there was no cause of action which would justify the plaintiffs in asking for confirmation of their possession, that no attempt has been made by the landlord defendant to dispossess the plaintiffs or in any way to disturb their possession. Mere bringing of suits for rent against a party, is not an attempt to disturb his possession of the property in question. I agree therefore with the learned Subordinate Judge that the prayer for confirmation of possession is entirely unnecessary. Therefore on that account the plaintiffs cannot have the period of limitation for 12 years. The next question is whether the application for an injunction was necessary or not or indeed whether it was a prayer which the plaintiffs could ask for. What they asked for, as far as we can see, was an injunction restraining the defendant from realizing rents in execution of any decrees that he might obtain. I do not think that it was open to the Court to grant any such injunction. The injunction which they asked for was an injunction restraining the defendant from executing any rent decrees which he might or might not obtain. He had not obtained any decree for rent. The prayer for the injunction was clearly premature and it could not be asked for or granted in the present suits. It is, therefore, clear that the period of limitation applicable to the present suits is six years as held by the learned Subordinate Judge.

The next point to be considered is from what point of time does time run against the plaintiffs. The respondent contends that the time runs against the plaintiffs from the date of the final publication of the Record-of-Rights in which case admittedly the plaintiffs' suits are barred. In support of this contention he relies on the case of Rajani Nath Pramanik v. Monaram Mandal (1). The appellants contend on the contrary that time runs from the date when the defendant made an actual claim against them on the strength of the entry in the Record-of-Rights which claim they contend was made when the defendant sued them for rent on the basis of rent assessed in S. 105 proceedings and of the entry in the Record-of-Rights that the lands are liable to pay rent, and they rely upon the decision in the case of Dina Nath Das v. Rama Nath Das (2). The question as to which decision is applicable to the present cases would depend upon the relief that the plaintiffs sought for in the plaint. I have carefully considered the plaint. There it does not appear that the plaintiffs asked for the correction of any entry in the Record-of-Rights. Their prayer would seem to be for a declaration that they had rent free title to the properties in question. Incidentally, no doubt, they referred to the entry in the Record-of-Rights as showing that their title was not rent free. But they did not specifically ask for the correction of any entry in the Record-of-Rights. Therefore it seems to me quite clear that the decision which applies to the present cases is not the decision in the case of Rajani Nath Pramanik v. Monaram Mandal (1) but the decision in the case of Dina Nath Das v. Rama Nath Das (2). That being so, I think it is quite clear that the time began to run against the plaintiffs from the date of the institution of the rent suits. Therefore so far as the question of the limitation is concerned it must be decided in favour of the appellants.

There remains now to be decided the second point raised by the appellants which was decided against them in the lower appellate Court, namely, that the suit was barred by the principle of res judicata. The appellants allege that the decision in the proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, was obtained by fraud. The trial Court held that there was nothing to show that the decision in the proceedings under S. 105, which defendant 1 had obtained was obtained by fraud. This finding as far as can be seen, has gone unchallenged in the Court of appeal below. We must, therefore, take it that this decision in proceedings under S. 105 was not obtained by fraud as alleged by the plaintiffs. If that is so then clearly the plaintiffs' suits are barred by the principle of res judicata. The result, therefore, must be that the appeals must fail and are dismissed with costs.

Rash Behari Roy having resigned, one Rai Sahib Monomohan Guha, who was defendant 3, in the suit was appointed common manager by an order passed by the District Judge on 8th May 1916. On 1st April 1920 the District Judge passed a further order empowering defendant 4 to perform the duties of common manager until further orders. In the meantime Rai Sahib Monomohan Guha tendered his resignation, and on the other hand the proprietors or some of them applied to have the estate released. On 31st May 1920 an order was passed by the District Judge accepting the resignation of Rai Sahib Monomohan Guha with effect from 17th April 1920, and declaring that the estate was thereby released to the proprietors. Defendant 4 was thus in charge of the office of common manager from 16th January 1920 till 31st May 1920. During the period, on 1st April 1920 the District Judge called upon defendant 4, as common manager, to submit accounts for the years 1325 and 1326. Defendant 4 submitted the accounts of 1325 while he was yet in office. After the estate was released he submitted some further accounts down to the date of the release.

Defendant 1 was a Naib appointed by defendant 3 while the latter was common manager, and defendant 2 was an assistant to defendant 1. In the accounts submitted by defendant 4 after the release, as aforesaid, two sums of money i. e., as Rs. 6,379-2-5½g and Rs. 3,021-10-2g were shown as being with defendant 1 the former as howlat taken by him and the latter as cash in hand. The accounts were audited and were passed by the District Judge in the usual way. On 30th May 1923 the present suit was instituted against defendants 1 and 2 as principal defendants and defendants 3 and 4 as pro-forma defendants. It is necessary to set out the scope and character of the suit as originally framed in order to appreciate the nature of the controversy with which we are concerned and which is to all intents and purposes a more recent development.

The plaint, as originally laid, was in its essence, a suit for accounts against, and for recovery of money not accounted for or taken as loan, by defendants 1 and 2. The claim was valued at Rs. 2,100

The gravamen of the charge was against defendants 1 and 2. It was, however, alleged that the appointment of defendants 3 and 4 as common manager was illegal and ultra vires, and that it was not known to the plaintiffs whether defendants 1 and 2 had rendered any accounts to defendants 3 and 4, that defendants 3 and 4 had not rendered accounts nor explained the books of the period during which they had acted as common manager to the plaintiffs after the estate had been released, and in the return of the accounts which defendant 4 had filed for the period down to the date of the release of the estate the items of Rs. 6,379 and odd and Rs. 3,021 and odd had been shown as already stated above. The reliefs asked for in the plaint are quoted below in extenso :

(a) For a decree that defendants 1 and 2 be ordered to file correct accounts in Court and to render those accounts.

(b) For the appointment of a commissioner to examine the accounts filed by the defendants and for a decree in favour of the plaintiffs after taking proper Court-fees for the amount for which they are held liable and for ordering the amount to be recovered out of the properties secured by defendant 1 by his indemnity bond also out of the sum kept in deposit by defendant 2 and also from the other properties of defendants 1 and 2.

(c) For a decree that defendants 1 and 2 be ordered to file all the papers during the period of their services as Naib if they did not file them to defendants 3 and 4 or that defendants 3 and 4 be ordered to file the papers in Court if defendants 1 and 2 gave them those papers.

(d) If defendants 3 and 4 state or if it be proved that defendants 1 and 2 have rendered nikash and made over the amounts due from them to defendants 3 and 4 from defendants 1 and 2 then for a decree in favour of plaintiffs and against defendants 3 and 4 for such amount as may be recoverable under the nikash.

And (e) For costs with future interest and for any other reliefs to plaintiffs such as they may be found entitled according to law and equity.

The plaint is anything but clear and it is not without considerable difficulty that any foundation of the liability of defendants 3 and 4 can be made out. Putting the construction most favourable to the plaintiffs, all that can be gathered is that it is defendants 1 and 2 who are primarily liable; but that defendants 3 and 4 are to be held liable only if they have received any money or papers from defendants 1 and 2, and have withheld the same.

Written statements were then filed on behalf of the defendants. In the written statement which defendant 4 filed he stated that the returns which defendant 1 had submitted of the period of his work were incorrect and incomplete and explanations that he had given of his accounts were unsatisfactory, and that for this reason defendant 4 was obliged to show in the accounts that he submitted to the District Judge the said two items as being with defendant 1, one as howlat and the other as cash in his hands.

The plaintiffs thereafter applied for amendment of the plaint, and as a result of the amendment that was allowed, the following two prayers were added :

(f) If the principal defendants be not found liable for rendering accounts or if there be any bar to plaintiffs getting a decree for accounts then for a decree in favour of the plaintiffs and against the principal defendants for the amount that may be found due after deducting reasonable costs from Rs. 6079-6-5½ pies marked as loan and Rs. 3021-10-2 pies marked as deposit in the hands of defendant 1 after taking from plaintiffs the proper Court-fees for the same ;

and (g) for passing a decree in favour of plaintiffs and against the pro-forma defendants for the amount claimed by plaintiffs or for the amount that the plaintiffs be held entitled to get from the pro-forma defendants as damages. How the question of damages could at all come in the suit upon the facts alleged in the plaint, I confess I have not been able to appreciate. It would of course arise on the supposition that defendants 3 and 4 had failed to take the money from defendants 1 and 2 as they were bound to do, but no such case appears to have been made anywhere.

The suit was tried by the Subordinate Judge who dismissed it holding that the plaintiffs had no cause of action. The District Judge on appeal by the plaintiffs, decreed the suit against defendants 1 and 4. He dismissed the suit in so far as it was against defendants 2 and 3, holding that defendant 2 had no liability to render accounts to the plaintiffs and that the suit as against defendant 3 was barred

Defendant 4 has then preferred this appeal. The contentions urged on his behalf are mainly three:—In the first place it is contended that as he was a common manager appointed by the District Judge the suit as against him was not maintainable without a notice under S. 80, Civil P. C. Next, it is urged that as the accounts submitted by him were passed by the District Judge, there was no further liability on his part to render any accounts. Lastly, it is said that there is no proper basis for the decree that has been passed as against him.

I propose to deal with the last contention first, because in the view that I take of it, it is not necessary to go into the other two contentions and the answer that has been given to them on behalf of the plaintiffs-respondents. In the appeal before the District Judge the plaintiffs confined their claim to accounts as against all the defendants to the two particular sums mentioned above. The District Judge has expressly said so in his judgment. All that the District Judge has said in his judgment as the basis for the decree against defendant 4 is this:

"I do not consider that the District Judge had any authority to investigate these accounts (meaning—the accounts submitted by defendant 4) and the fact remains that the position with regard to the two sums of money entered in the nikash as outstanding against Saroda Charan Sirkar (i. e. defendant 1) remains unexplained. Each page is signed by Nalini Kumar Chakrabarty, (i. e., defendant 4) and I consider it essential that he should be a party to any further investigation which may take place with regard to these items. My finding with regard to defendant 4 is therefore that he is liable to render proper accounts to the plaintiffs. . . . As regards defendants 1 and 4, I set aside the order and decree of the lower Court and order that a preliminary decree be passed against defendants 1 and 4 to the effect that an account be taken regarding the two sums of money, namely, Rs. 6,379-2as-5½g and Rs. 3,021-10as-2g mentioned in para. 4 of the plaint and a commissioner be appointed for making the necessary investigation into the matter. It is further ordered that for the purpose of the investigation the parties concerned produce before the commissioner all papers in their possession with regard to the two sums in question."

The whole basis of a decree for accounts is a liability on the part of the defendant to account. A finding that it would be convenient to have the accounts examined in the presence of the defendant will hardly suffice to make the defendant a party liable to account and on that consideration only he cannot be made a party to any investigation that is to be held by commissioner. In the present case I am unable to find that there is any other reason why defendant 4 should be a party to any further proceedings that have been ordered to be held by the commissioner. The plaintiffs' suit has proceeded so far on the footing of defendant 4 having been a common manager and having submitted accounts showing the two specified sums as being in the hands of defendant 1. Learned advocate for the plaintiffs-respondents has conceded before us that his clients are not proceeding in the present suit against defendant 4 on the footing of his position as sub-manager. Nothing has been established, nor indeed has anything been alleged, which may indicate that there was any liability on the part of defendant 4 to account for these two sums. It has never been alleged, far less attempted to be proved, that the two sums or any portions thereof ever came into the hands of defendant 4. It has been argued that defendant 1 may, in the course of the investigation that is to be held by the commissioner, be able to show that he paid amounts or parts of them to defendant 4. Such, however, is not the defence of defendant 1. It has also been argued that the commissioner may find in the course of his investigation that that was the position. But, as pointed out in the case of Bharat Chandra v. Kiran Chandra (1), where the principles governing suits for accounts and the authorities bearing on them have been discussed.

"It is not open to any principal, who has got all the accounts of his agent in his possession, to employ the machinery of the Court for examining his accounts on the off-chance of making his agent liable for any sum which on such examination may be found due from him."

It has not been suggested anywhere in the present suit that defendant 4 was withholding any papers to render which there was a liability on his part, and in view of the defence of defendant 1 as contained in his written statement beyond which that defendant will not be permitted to travel, it is impossible to see how the plaintiffs can expect to fasten to defendant 4 with any liability so far as the two sums of money are concerned.

(1) A.I.R. 1925 Cal. 1069=52 Cal. 766.

It has been also urged that the onus is on defendant 4 to show that the said amounts have not been received by him. This argument in my opinion is entirely untenable. As observed in the case Bharat v. Kiran (1) it was for the plaintiffs at least to allege that defendant 4 had received the money or any part of it, and then the Court would have been called upon to decide the question upon such evidence as was brought before it whether a liability had been established; and only in the event of the liability having been established a preliminary decree could have been passed directing an investigation by the commissioner to determine the extent of that liability. A decree of the present character passed in anticipation of determination of the liability and leaving to the commissioner the determination of the liability itself—a function which legitimately appertains to the Court—and not merely the extent of the liability, is one that the law never contemplates. I am clearly of opinion that the decree in so far as it is against defendant 4 is entirely unsupportable and the suit in so far as it was against him was wholly misconceived.

The appeal will consequently be allowed and the decree of the District Judge as against defendant 4 being reversed the suit in so far as it was against him will be dismissed with costs in all the Courts. Defendant 1 as respondent in this appeal has invited us to make an order in his favour under O. 41, R. 4, Civil P. C., but I see no ground whatever to entertain this prayer. The decree which plaintiffs have obtained against defendant 1 will accordingly stand.

Specific Relief Act, S. 42 — Although Court can grant a declaration that a person is entitled to any legal character or to any right to any property, Court will not grant declaration likely to be infructuous.

A held three separate jamas under three sets of landlords. He mortgaged them to B along with other lands by a registered deed for Rs. 5,000. The landlords ignoring the existence of separate jamas instituted two suits against A for rent, treating all lands as constituting one jama. Having obtained decrees in those suits, they put up lands to sale alleging that they were lands in arrears. Thereupon B instituted a suit for a declaration that the two aforesaid decrees were really money decrees and that the mahal in arrears could not be sold with power to annul incumbrances under Ch. 14, Ben. Ten. Act.

Held : that the declaration asked for was in substance merely a declaration as to the legal effect of two decrees passed by the Court. Such a declaration could not be granted under S. 42 which does not sanction every form of declaration but only a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to any legal character or to any property. Moreover such a declaration could not be granted as it would be simply infructuous without a relief in the shape of a permanent injunction for, the Court in which the decrees are executed would in no way be bound by a declaration made by a different Court as to the character of the decree under execution before it. It is well established that a Court will never make a declaration likely to be infructuous : 39 Cal. 704, Ref.

Judgment.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen has been decreed by both the Courts below.

The plaintiff's case was as follows :—There is a ganti jama comprised of about 900 bighas of land of which the holders were defendants 1 to 23, 24 to 29 and one Kedar Ghosh, and No. 30, owning respectively 5/6th, 1/12th and 1/12th shares therein. Defendant 31 for himself and also on behalf of his brother defendant 32 obtained a maurashi mokarari lease of a 5/6th share of the said jama from defendants 1 to 23 in 1308 B. S. at a rental of Rs. 303 and odd. Subsequently defendant 31 obtained settlements of a 1/12th share from defendants 24 to 29 and the said Kedar Ghosh at a rental of Rs. 30 and odd, and also a settlement of the remaining 1/12th share from defendant 30 at the same rental. Thereafter the interest of Kedar Ghosh passed to defendants 19 to 23 and defendant 32 sold his interest to defendant 31.

Thus there were three separate jamas held by defendant 31 under three sets of landlords. Defendant 31 mortgaged these three jamas to the plaintiff along with other lands by a registered deed executed in 1326 B. S. for Rs. 5,000. The landlords, however, ignoring the existence of the separate jamas instituted two suits for rent treating all the lands as constituting one jama and as bearing a total rental of Rs. 364 and odd. One of these suits was No. 829 of 1923 in which defendants 31 and 32 were both impleaded as defendants. The other suit was No. 2308 of 1923 which was by all the landlords with the exception of defendant 21, and against defendant 31 only. Having obtained decrees in the aforesaid suits the said defendants 1 to 30 put up the lands to sale alleging that they were the lands in arrears. The plaintiff then instituted the suit asking for the following reliefs : (Ka) that a declaration may be made to the effect that the two decrees aforesaid are really money decrees and the mahal in arrear cannot be sold with power to annul incumbrances under Ch. 14, Ben. Ten. Act ; (kha) that it may be declared that the lands attached form a maurasi mokarari intermediate ganti jama and not a non-transferable ryoti jama ; and (ga) that a temporary injunction may be granted restraining defendants 1 to 30 from selling the attached properties by auction till the final disposal of the suit. Prayer (kha) appears to have been subsequently withdrawn and prayer (ga) was rejected by the trial Court inasmuch as there was no prayer for permanent injunction to the same effect. The Courts below have decreed the suit in plaintiff's favour in terms of prayer (ka).

Apart from the objection that in instituting the suit the plaintiff was crying before he was hurt for it may just as well be that the mortgage would never be annulled even though the properties are sold with power to the purchaser to annul all encumbrances the suit for the declaratory relief which the plaintiff asked for in prayer ka in our opinion was not maintainable in law. The declaration asked for is in substance merely a declaration as to the legal effect of two decrees passed by the Courts. If this declaration was asked for as auxiliary or introductory to some other relief or reliefs also asked for, S. 42, Specific Relief Act, would have had nothing to do with the matter and such a declaration would have rested on long established practice ; but as the relief for this declaration stands alone it is one which must be authorised by that section, which does not sanction every form of declaration but only a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to any legal character or to any right to any property : see Deokali Koer v. Kedar Nath (1). The declaration asked for does not go anywhere near what S. 42, Specific Relief Act, contemplates. Indeed it is not even alleged that the plaintiff's status or right as mortgagee has ever been denied. Again if it be assumed that such a declaration is permissible, it will be simply infructuous, without a relief in the shape of a permanent injunction, for, the Court in which the decrees are executed will in no way be bound by a declaration made by a different Court as to the character of the decrees under execution before it. It is well established that a Court will never make a declaration that is likely to be infructuous.

It has been brought to our notice that respondents 29 to 29a have died during the pendency of this appeal and their heirs have not been brought on the record. The appeal in so far as those respondents are concerned must be taken to have abated and to have proceeded without them. This, however, does not affect the appeal as against the other respondents which in our opinion, must succeed, and it is accordingly allowed, the decrees of the Courts below being set aside and the suit dismissed with costs in all the Courts.

Judgment.—These three appeals arise out of three execution petitions made of a decree passed by this Court in Appeal from original decree No. 374 of 1908 dated 5th July 1910. The question in controversy depends upon the true interpretation of the decree. Although the learned Subordinate Judge has stated many things in his judgment disallowing the claim of the decree-holder, it is not necessary to go into all these matters. The real question is whether the decree-holder who was the plaintiff in the suit is entitled to execute the decree against the property in the hands of the respondents in these appeals. The plaintiff lived in the family of Radhika Mohan Das, the original owner of the property, as a domesticated son-in-law. After the death of his father-in-law he had disputes with his mother-in-law and it seems that he was obliged to leave the house of his deceased father-in-law. Thereupon, he brought a suit for maintenance against his mother-in-law which was decreed by this Court. The relevant terms of the decree with which we are now concerned are these :

"That it is hereby declared that the plaintiff is entitled out of the estate left by Radhika Mohan Das to maintenance at the rate of Rs. 25 a month."

It was further decreed that "the plaintiff would be entitled to realize the sums due as maintenance in execution of the decree without a fresh suit."

The defendant in the above suit, the widow of Radhika Mohan, is now dead and the decree-holder seeks to realize the maintenance allowed to him by the decree from the estate of Radhika Mohan now inherited by his wife and his sister-in-law. The question is, whether the decree-holder appellant is entitled to realize the money out of the property in their hands. The Subordinate Judge has held that he is not. The real question in this case is whether the maintenance allowance given under the decree was made a charge on the estate. If it was made a charge on the estate, no doubt the wife and the sister-in-law of the appellant would be bound to pay the maintenance out of the property and the decree-holder need not bring a fresh suit. But if it was not made a charge on the estate, then the decree was passed against the widow of Radhika Mohan only and so long as she was alive, she was bound to pay the sum of Rs. 25 a month out of the estate left by her husband.

It is contended by the learned advocate for the appellant that upon a true and proper construction of the decree it should be held that a charge was effected on the estate by the decree. There is no word expressive of 'charge' on the estate. We have endeavoured to find in the original plaint if any charge was claimed by the decree-holder. The plaint could not be got, but the report of the case in which the decree was made is to be found in Gobind Rani v. Radha Ballabh (1). From the statement of facts in the judgment at p. 207 of the report it appears that the decree-holder only asked for a declaration that he was entitled to a certain sum of money from the defendant who was his mother-in-law out of the estate left by Radhika Mohan and the claim was for the maintenance of himself, his wife and children. Now, no charge could have been declared by this Court for the maintenance of his wife and children on the estate left by Radhika Mohan, having regard to the fact that, after the death of the widow, the wife of the then plaintiff would be entitled to one-half of the estate by right of inheritance. In the decree provision is made for the maintenance of the wife and children of the decree-holder, in case the mother-in-law drove them out of the house and refused to maintain them. So it is evident that no charge could have been declared for the maintenance of the wife and children on the estate of Radhika Mohan for the very good reason, as I have stated, that the wife would be entitled to one-half share of the estate after the death of the widow and the male children would be the next reversioners. Therefore upon a true construction of the decree it seems to us that no charge was created on the estate and the decree was in the same terms as regards maintenance of all and so only a personal decree against the widow. It, consequently, follows that after the death of the widow the decree-holder would not be entitled to any maintenance by execution of the decree referred to above. An argument was addressed to us that a part of the claim made in one of the applications was for arrears of maintenance due during the lifetime of Gobinda Rani, the widow of Radhika Mohan. Nothing was said with regard to that in the Court below and from the application it is difficult to understand that any such claim was made. These appeals must, accordingly, stand dismissed with costs. Hearing fee, one gold mohur in each case.

Will—Construction.

A Hindu governed by the Dayabhaga School executed a will in the following terms:—

"But in case none of such adopted sons survive my said wife I desire and direct my executors, after the death of my said wife to make over and divide the whole of my estate both real and personal, unto and between my daughters in equal shares, to whom and their respective sons I give, devise and bequeath the same, but should either of my said daughters die without leaving any male issue surviving, but leaving my other daughter her surviving, then in such case the surviving daughter or in the case of the death of either daughter leaving sons, the share of such daughter is to be paid to such her son or sons, share and share alike."

The wife of the testator died without leaving any adopted son. There were two daughters to the testator A and B who got the estate in equal shares after the widow's death. A had four sons C, D, E and F and B adopted a son J after the testator's death. B survived her sister A. C, D had predeceased B.

Held: that as J was not adopted in testator's lifetime, there was intestacy at the time of B's death so far as her share was concerned and so her share would pass to the testator's heirs existing at the time of her death; i. e., J, E and F would take one-third each: 12 I.A. 137; 30 C.W.N. 357, Rel. on; 27 Cal. 996 (P.C.); 35 Cal. 896 (P.C.) and 38 Cal. 188 (P.C.), Ref. [P 428 C 1]

Judgment.—This suit is brought to determine the construction of the will of Haridass Dutt, a Hindu governed by the Dayabhaga law, who died on 30th September 1875. Haridas Dutt duly executed his will on the day upon which he died, and the clause in the will that the Court is now invited to interpret has already on three occasions been construed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I am informed that the parties are determined once more to obtain the opinion of the Privy Council as to the meaning and effect of these provisions. It may be so, but to my mind this is a very plain case, and I have no doubt as to the interpretation that ought to be put upon the clause under consideration.

The Official Assignee is defendant 7, as representing the estates of Ram Prosad, Khetter Prosad, and Syam Prosad, who have been adjudicated insolvents. The provisions of the will which are material for the purposes of this case are as follows:

"But in case none of such adopted sons survive my said wife, or in case of either surviving my said wife and dying under the said age without leaving a son or sons, I desire and direct my executors, after the death of my said wife, or the death of such a son after her, but under the age of 18 years without leaving a son or sons, to make over and divide the whole of my estate, both real and personal, unto and between my daughters in equal shares, to whom and their respective sons I give, devise and bequeath the same, but should either of my said daughters die without leaving any male issue surviving, but leaving my other daughter her surviving, then in such case the surviving daughter and her sons shall be entitled to the share of the deceased daughter, or in the case of the death of either daughter leaving sons, the share of such daughter is to be paid to such her son or sons, share and share alike."

At the trial an issue was raised as to whether the adoption of defendant 1 Jugal Kishore by Ranimani and Ramakanta Sen, which was alleged to have taken place on 2nd November 1900, was valid in law. All the parties to the suit, except defendant 5 admitted the validity of the adoption, and after Jugal Kishore had adduced evidence to prove his adoption, defendant 5 also expressly admitted through his learned counsel, and I hold that, on 2nd November 1900, Jugal Kishore duly and validly was adopted by Ramakanta and Ranimani as their son.

On 14th August 1904, Srimati Surnamani died, having previously duly adopted Jyoti Prasad, who died without issue on 29th January 1881, and after his death having purported to adopt one Amrita Lal Dutt, whose adoption was declared invalid by the Privy Council on 2nd May 1900. Amrita Lal Dutt v. Surnomoye Dasi (1). On 31st January 1903, Srimati Surnamani had executed a will of which she appointed the Administrator-

"as to the nature of the estate which, in the events which have happened, the testator's daughters took under the terms of the will."

The Judicial Committee held that "according to the true construction of the will the intention of the testator was to create in favour of his daughters an estate for life with a remainder over to their sons, and the learned Judges of the High Court ought to have held that, in the events that have happened, the daughters of the testator, Ranimani Dasi and Premmani Dasi, are entitled to the testator's estate in equal shares for life and with benefit of survivorship between themselves." Radha Prosad Mullick v. Rani Moni Dassee (2).

On 8th May 1909, Premmani died intestate, leaving her four sons surviving her.

On 4th March 1910, Radha Prosad made an application to the Court (Flet-

General of Bengal the executor and trustee. After the death of Srimati Surnamani, Ranimani on 19th December 1904, filed a suit (912 of 1904) against her sister Premmani, her sister's four surviving sons, Radha Prosad, Kasi Prosad, Pyari Lal and Behari Lal (the two younger sons having been born after the death of Haridas), and Jugal Kishore, the adopted son of Ranimani and Ramakanta Sen, for the construction of the will of Haridas, the administration and partition of his estate, and incidental relief. This suit eventually was heard on appeal by the Privy Council, and the only question raised in the appeal was cher, J.), pursuant to the liberty reserved in that behalf in suit 912 of 1904, in which he "claimed to be entitled with his brother Kasi Prosad to their mother's share in the estate."

His claims were resisted by his brothers Pyari Lal and Behari Lal, and by Ranimani Dasi and her adopted son Jugal Kishore.

The High Court, (Jenkins, C. J., and Woodroffe, J.), reversing the decision of Fletcher, J., held that inasmuch as they were not born at the date of the death of Haridas:

tatives of Jyoti Prosad and between them the property bequeathed (i. e. to Premmani) will be divided in three equal shares." Radha Prosad Mullick v. Ranimoni Dasi (3).

An appeal to the Privy Council was dismissed, their Lordships agreeing both with the decision of the High Court and the reasons upon which it was based. The Judicial Committee, however, added that:

"With regard to the contention of the appellants (i. e., Ranimani and her adopted son, Jugal Kishore) that the Court was wrong in holding that no grandchildren of the testator born, or adopted, after the death of the testator on 30th October 1875, could take under his will, their Lordships will not advise His Majesty to make any order except that the present advice is not to prejudice the position of appellant 2 if and when such question comes before a Court for decision," Ranimoni Dasi v. Radha Prosad Mullick (4).

On 17th March 1927, Ranimani died, and on 6th April 1927, the present suit was brought by Pyari Lal for the purpose of ascertaining who were the persons entitled under the will of Haridas to Ranimani's share of the estate.

Three rival constructions were urged upon the Court. It is common ground: (1) that, inasmuch as Jugal Kishore was neither born nor adopted during the lifetime of the testator, he is not entitled under the will to succeed to the estate as the son of Ranimani; Bhubaneshwari Debi v. Niloomul Lahiri (5); (2) that the sons of Radha Prosad and Kashi Prosad, neither of whom were alive at the death of Ranimani, were not entitled upon an intestacy to take any share of the estate as the heirs of Haridas. Nepaldas Mukherji v. Probhas Chandra Mukherji (6). The contention of Pyari Lal and Behari Lal is that as Ranimani died without leaving a son entitled to succeed to her share under the will, there was pro tanto an intestacy, and on Ranimani's death that Pyari Lal, Behari Lal and Jugal Kishore were entitled to succeed to Ranimani's moiety as the heirs of Haridas in equal shares. In my opinion, that is the correct view according to the true construction of the will. For Jugal Kishore it was contended that on the death of Srimati Surnamani, Ranimani and Premmani each took, not a life-interest but an absolute interest in a moiety of Haridas' estate, and, therefore, on Ranimani's death that he was entitled on the whole of Ranimani's property, including her moiety of Haridas' estate, as her only son and heir. Were I to state the reasons that would induce me to hold that this construction is unsound it would avail nothing for the learned Advocate-General, who appeared for Jugal Kishore, conceded that this contention runs counter to the decision of the Judicial Committee in Radha Prosad Mullick v. Rane Moni Dasse (2), and the construction that has been placed upon this will by the Judicial Committee is binding on the Courts in India. In the alternative, Jugal Kishore claimed that he was entitled to a third share of Ranimani's moiety of the estate as co-heir with Pyari Lal and Behari Lal of the testator Haridas.

The sons of Radha Prosad and Kashi Prosad, defendants 2 to 6, contended that upon a true construction of Haridas' will whereby the testator directed that in the events that happened the executors were: "to make over and divide the whole of my estate, both real and personal unto and between my daughters in equal shares, to whom and their respective sons, I give, devise and bequath the same,"

the testator intended, provided, and effected that the whole estate should devolve upon those of his two daughters' sons who might be living at the time of his death, subject to a life interest in a moiety of the estate in favour of each of the daughters; and that upon the death of Hari Das, Radha Prosad, Kashi Prosad and Jyoti Prosad obtained an immediate vested interest in the estate to a moiety of which they or their representatives became entitled to possession upon the death of each of the daughters.

In my opinion this construction cannot be sustained. It appears to me that such a construction is not in consonance with the intention of the testator to be collected from the terms of the will for example, it gives no effect to the word "respective" as used in connexion with the gift to the daughters and their sons, and it is inconsistent with the provision: "in the case of the death of either daughter leaving sons, the share of such daughter is to be paid to such her son or sons, share and share alike."

of the Privy Council upon the construction of the will; for if the construction which these defendants urge the Court to put upon this clause is the correct one, and all the sons of the two daughters living at the death of Haridas possessed a vested interest in the whole estate, subject to the life-interest of the daughters, each of such sons would have been entitled to succeed on Premmani's death to a share of her moiety, and it would have been incumbent upon the Privy Council in Ranimoni's case (4) to decide whether or not Jugal Kishore was to be regarded as one of such sons, and in that capacity entitled to a share of Premmani's moiety of the estate. But that the Privy Council did not do; and to my mind it is clear that the reason why the Judicial Committee did not determine whether Jugal Kishore as the adopted son of Ranimani was entitled to take under Haridas' will in the appeal in which the succession to Premmani's moiety of the estate alone was in dispute was because their Lordships were of opinion that under the terms of the will Jugal Kishore was not entitled and could not succeed in any event, to a share in Premmani's moiety of the estate. Their Lordships, therefore, were not disposed to decide what rights (if any) Jugal Kishore possessed under Hari Das' will until the death of Ranimani, in which event alone (if at all) he would be entitled to a share of the estate of Hari Das. For these reasons, I am clearly of opinion that the will cannot bear the construction for which defendants 2-6 contend, and I hold and declare that with respect to Ranimani's moiety of Haridas estate there is an intestacy. and that Pyari Lal, Behari Lal, and Jugal Kishore as the heirs of Haridas are entitled to possession thereof in equal shares, including the property moveable and immovable to which Ranimani was entitled on partition and under the consent decree and orders in suit No. 611 of 1907 as prayed. Pyari Lal, Behari Lal and Jugal Kishore are also jointly entitled to Ranimani's pala of worship. There will be a decree for partition of Ranimani's share. The costs of all parties as between attorney and client including the cost of the inventory that has been made and all reserved costs will be paid out of the estate by the receiver.

Criminal Revn. No. 1210 of 1928, Decided on 20th February 1929, against order of the Deputy Magistrate, Contai, D/- 22nd September 1928.

(a) Criminal P.C., S. 476-B—Under S. 476-B appellate Court, as it is governed by O. 41, Civil P. C., can remand case.

In dealing with an appeal under S. 476-B, the appellate Court is governed not by S. 424, Criminal P. C., but by O. 41, Civil P. C., and so it has power to remand a case if it acts in accordance with the rules of O. 41: A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 284 (Per Duval, J.), Foll. [P 429 C 2]

(b) Criminal Trial—Complaint by Munsiff under S. 476, Criminal P. C.—On appeal District Judge remanding case directing complaint to be properly worded—No objection taken to remand order by way of civil revision nor objection to complaint raised at commitment—Order became final and complaint could not be challenged now in High Court.

A complaint was made by a Munsif under S. 476, Criminal P. C., and on appeal from his order the District Judge holding that the order was otherwise good remanded the case directing the complaint to be properly worded. No objection was taken to this order by way of revision nor was any objection raised before the Committing Magistrate on the ground that the complaint was not properly made.

Held: that as the order of the District Judge was not objected to by way of civil revision it became final and as the objection to the complaint was not raised at the time of commitment, it could not be raised now in the High Court: *A. Suhrawardy, J.—This rule has been obtained for setting aside an order passed by the Magistrate committing the accused to the Sessions to take their trial for various offences mentioned in the order. The Magistrate took cognizance of the case of a complaint by the Munsiff of Contai under S. 476, Criminal P. C. It appears that on the application of the opposite party the Munsiff made an order under S. 476, Criminal P. C. Against that order an appeal was taken by the petitioner to the District Judge under S. 476-B and the learned Judge by his order dated 28th May 1928, held that the order made by the Munsif under S. 476 was otherwise good except that it was vague inasmuch as it contained a few sections of the Penal Code and "any other section of that Code found applicable." He accordingly sent the case back to the Munsif and directed him to specify all the sections of the Penal Code in his complaint under S. 476, Criminal P. C. The Munsif accordingly made a complaint specifying the sections of the Penal Code. No objection was taken to the legality of the proceedings before the trial Magistrate but it is complained before us that the order of the District Judge remanding the case to the Munsif and asking him to make a complaint under S. 476 is bad in law and without jurisdiction and, therefore, the entire proceedings leading to the commitment of the accused must be set aside.

In the circumstances of this case I am of opinion that this contention ought not to prevail. The order of the District Judge passed under S. 476-B has now become final. No objection was taken against that order under S. 115, Civil P. C., or any other law. This objection moreover was not taken before the trial Court on the ground that the complaint upon which the case was started was not validly made before it. The learned counsel appearing for the petitioners has referred us to two decisions of this Court in which it has been held that under S. 476-B the appellate Court has no jurisdiction to remand a case but should make the complaint itself. These cases were decided upon different sets of facts. In these cases the original Court refused to make the complaint. There was an appeal and the appellate Court was of opinion that the complaint should have been made. It was held that it was the duty of the appellate Court to make the complaint and not to direct the trial Court to do it, in view of the wording of S. 476-B. Moreover those cases were decided by Civil Benches of this Court under the Civil Procedure Code. In Hamid Ali v. Madhu Sudan Das (1), the learned Judges held that the appellate Court should have itself made the complaint; but the learned Judges composing the Benches differed in their opinion as to the procedure to be followed by the appellate Court in dealing with an appeal under S. 476-B, Criminal P. C. Chotzner, J., being of opinion that it should be governed by S. 424, Criminal P. C., and Duval, J., holding that it should be governed by O. 41, Civil P. C. If the latter view is correct—and it seems to me, it is—there is no reason why the District Judge should have no power to remand the case to the lower Court if he acts in accordance with the rules contained in O. 41, Civil P. C. In the present case the District Judge did not overrule the Munsif and take upon himself the responsibility of making a complaint against the accused. He affirmed the order of the Munsif and simply pointed out to him that the order passed by him should be properly worded. In my opinion the order passed by the District Judge in this case did not come within the scope of the decisions referred to. Even if it did, I think in the circumstances of this case that order cannot be challenged at this stage.

Under S. 215, Criminal P. C., we are entitled to quash the commitment only on point of law. But it has been argued on behalf of the petitioners that the District Judge has no jurisdiction to remand the case under S. 476-B to the Munsif and therefore the entire subsequent proceedings are illegal and should be set aside. As I have pointed out the order of the District Judge was not illegal and did not contravene the provisions of S. 476-B, and if it did, it was not an order without jurisdiction. In Manir Ahmed v. Jogesh Chandra (2), it has been held that the appellate Court has no jurisdiction to remand a case to the Court of first instance to file a complaint. The words "no jurisdiction" were used there in a wide sense to include an act against the law. There was no absence of jurisdiction but at the most an illegal exercise of jurisdiction. The petitioners have lost their remedy (if they had any) now, not having taken any action against the order of the District Judge passed under S. 476-B. They should not now be allowed to challenge that order which has become final between the parties, in collateral proceedings.

In this connexion it may be necessary to consider the case of Raj Chunder v.

(2) A. I. R. 1929 Cal. 195=55 Cal. 1277.

Gour Chander (3). Under the old Criminal Procedure Code sanction granted by a Court under S. 195 enured for a period of 6 months only within which complaint was to have been filed in a Criminal Court. In that case the complaint was filed after 6 months and it resulted in the commitment of the accused. The learned Judges quashed the commitment on the ground that the complaint was made against the express provisions of the law. With reference to the application of S. 537 it was observed that it did not save the proceedings because they contravened the express provisions of S. 195, Criminal P. C. In the present case I do not see why S. 537 should not cure the defect, if any. There is no contravention of any express provisions of the Code. If there is any error, it is one provided against by S. 537, Criminal P. C. In this view I would discharge this rule.

Graham, J.—I agree that the rule should be discharged. There can I think be no question as to the jurisdiction of the Magistrate to make the commitment—and that it was a valid commitment according to law. The contentions which have been raised as to the legality of the proceedings in the civil Courts are matters which ought to have been raised long ago by an appeal or by way of application in revision. It appears moreover that these objections were not even taken in the committing Court and that they are now raised at the eleventh hour after commitment.

Appeal No. 603 of 1927, Decided on 22nd March 1929, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, 1st Court, Barisal, D/- 9th September 1926.

Civil P. C., O. 22, R. 3 — Where the plaintiff in a mortgage suit dies after the preliminary and before the final decree, R. 3 does not apply.

On the death of one of two mortgagees, after they had obtained a preliminary decree for sale of the mortgaged property, the suit does not abate if the heirs of the deceased mortgagee are not brought on record within the time limited by law: A. I. R. 1928 Mad. 914 (F.B.); *A. I. Ramendra Chandra Roy—for Appellants.

Gunada Charan Roy, Satindra Nath Roy Chaudhury for Probodh Chandra Kar—for Respondents.

Mitter, J. — The question of law which arises for consideration in this appeal is as to whether on the death of one of two mortgagees after they had obtained a preliminary decree for sale of the mortgage property the suit abates if the heirs of the deceased mortgagee are not brought on record of the suit within the time limited by law. The appellants who are the surviving mortgagee and the heirs of the deceased mortgagee contend that the suit does not abate whereas the mortgagors, now respondents, contend that the suit has abated. The lower appellate Court has accepted the contention of the respondents and has dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

The appellants contend that the view taken by the lower appellate Court is erroneous as O. 22, R. 3, Civil P. C. does not apply where a plaintiff in a mortgage suit dies after the preliminary and before the final decree; on the other hand the respondents contend that O. 22, R. 3 applies as under the Code of 1908 proceedings after the preliminary decree are not proceedings in execution and that the suit continues until the final decree is passed.

It seems to us that the contention of the appellants must prevail for as has been recently pointed out by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that after a decree has once been made in a suit, the suit cannot be dismissed unless the decree is reversed on appeal. In the case of Lachmi Narayan v. Balmukund (1) Lord Phillimore in delivering the judgment of their Lordships said:

"The parties have on the making of the decree acquired rights or incurred liability which are fixed unless or until the decree is varied or set aside. After a decree any party can apply to have it enforced."

Although these observations were made in a case where after a preliminary decree for partition the plaintiff did not appear when the case came on for final decree and the case was struck off the same principle should apply to a case where as in the present, a man did not appear because he could not appear as he was then dead. The question which arises for decision in the present case arose directly for decision before a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in the case of Perumal Pillai v. Perumall Chetti (2). In that case Sir Murray Coutts-Trotter, C. J., held that O. 22, Rr. 3 and 4 did not apply to circumstances such as exist in the present case. We are in entire agreement with that decision and with the reasons on which the Full Bench rested their judgments.

The Allahabad High Court, we may observe, has also taken the same view as the Madras Full Bench: see Ali Bahadur Beg v. Rafiulla (3). It remains to notice two cases of our own Court which take the view that the provisions of O. 22, R. 4, apply both before and after, passing of the preliminary decree: see Bhut Nath Jana v. Tara Chand (4), and Mounjendra Dutta v. Jnan Ranjan (5). We do not think that these decisions can be held to be good law in view of the observations made by the Judicial Committee in Luchmi Narain's case to which reference has already been made. For the reasons given above we hold that the decision of the lower appellate Court dismissing plaintiff's suit must be set aside and the judgment of the Court of first instance restored with costs throughout. The Court of first instance granted a decree in favour of the plaintiffs except the heirs of Alam Oazi for 14-2/3 annas share of the mortgage money and as the plaintiffs did not appeal to the lower appellate Court and were content with the decree of the first Court they cannot have a decree for their whole claim.

Jack, J.—I agree.

(a) Landlord and Tenant—Tenant's not paying rent under kabuliati does not show that kabuliati was not acted upon.

Birendra Kumar De—for Appellant.

Biswa Nath Ray—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for arrears of rent. The suit has been decreed by both the Courts below. The defendant has then preferred this second appeal. In support of the appeal two contentions have been urged. The first one is to the effect that the question as to whether the relationship of landlord and tenant exists between the plaintiff and the defendant has not been properly determined by the learned Subordinate Judge on appeal. It is said that although he has found that there was a kabuliati under which the rent in the present suit was claimed it has not been found whether the kabuliati was actually acted upon or not. Now this argument as far as I can understand it, really means that it was the defendant's case that the kabuliati although executed was not intended to be acted upon; because the mere fact that the defendant has not paid any rent after the execution of the kabuliati does not go to show that the kabuliati has not been acted upon or indeed would absolve the defendant from his liability to pay rent under the kabuliati. So far as this matter is concerned all that the defendant has been able to prove is that the rent has not been realised under the kabuliati since its execution. On the other hand the learned Subordinate Judge refers to certain facts as indicating plainly that the kabuliati was intended to be acted upon; for instance he has said that there was a mortgage decree of the value of Rs. 1,500 in plaintiff's favour as against the predecessors of the defendant, that this decree was afterwards settled at the amount of Rs. 1,000 and that the mortgagors, not being able to pay up the decretal amount sold the land to the plaintiff, and after the sale they executed certain kabuliats out of which is the one in the present suit. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that the kobala and the kabuliat were all registered on one and the same date, that is to say, the 10th March 1917, and that after the execution of these documents—the execution proceedings were dismissed for non-prosecution and the mortgage decree was never executed by the plaintiff again. All these go to show that the transactions which were represented by the execution of the kabuliat as well as the execution of the kobala were bona fide transactions really intended to be acted upon. Under these circumstances we are unable to uphold the first contention that has been urged on behalf of the appellant.

It has been urged in the next place that S. 60, Rent Act, operates as a bar to the passing of the decree in the present suit. Now this objection does not appear to have been taken in the written statement and although a question or two may have been put to the plaintiff or his witnesses as to whether his name was registered or not, we are not prepared to hold that the Court below were bound to take cognizance of this objection, the more so because if it had been taken in the written statement it would have been open to the plaintiff to get his name registered before the decree was passed even if he had not done so before the suit. This contention also should be overruled. The appeal in our opinion fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—In this case, it seems that the rule was granted on the ground that the defendant himself in his deposition stated that he paid Rs. 25 in liquidation of his debt in 1332 B. S. If the period of limitation counts from that date, the suit would be within time. The learned Judge, however, stated in his judgment that the plaintiff's son's marriage took place in Jaistha 1331 when the sum of Rs. 25 was paid. There is nothing in the recorded evidence of the defendant to that effect. But it must have been stated by the defendant that the money was paid at the time of his son's marriage. In taking down the deposition, the learned Judge probably made a mistake in writing 1332 in place of 1331. But that does not appear to be material now. The principal point argued on behalf of the opposite party is that no stipulation for interest was made in the hatchitta. Therefore, the sum of Rs. 25 must have been paid in the part-payment of the principal. That being so, limitation cannot run from the date of payment even assuming that the payment was made in Jaistha 1332, under the provisions of S. 20, Lim. Act, as this fact of part-payment of the principal does not appear in the handwriting of the defendant who is said to have made it. There is, however, another point and it is this: It appears from the hatchitta that the date was altered from 1331 to 1332. This is a material alteration in the document and under no circumstances can the plaintiff claim any money on the basis of this document. The rule must, accordingly, be discharged with costs—two gold mohurs.

Decided on 2nd July 1928.

(a) Murshidabad Act (15 of 1891), Condition (1)—Nawab of Murshidabad letting lands, to which Act 15 applied, for 21 years in consideration of 5 lacs of rupees to be paid in advance—Lease, as it contravened condition (1) was null and void and Nawab, being person under disability, was not estopped from denying validity of lease—Evidence Act, S. 115.

The Nawab of Murshidabad executed a lease to the defendants of certain lands and premises to which the Murshidabad Act 15 applied for a term of 21 years in consideration of the sum of rupees five lacs as advance of the total rent payable for during the said term of 21 years. The Nawab then sued to recover possession of the demised property and mesne profits, upon the ground that the lease was null and void by reason of the provisions of condition (1) of the Murshidabad Act.

Held: that the lease contravened condition (1) of the Act and was therefore null and void. [P 434 C 1]

Held further: that as the Nawab was a person under disability, he was not estopped from denying the validity of the lease: Jeffries v. Alexander, 8 H. L. C. 594; *Batiman (Lady) v. (b) Interpretation of Statutes—Where legislature has prohibited making of contract, if intention is clear that such contract is void, that contract is utterly null and void—But if language does not plainly indicate such intention and such contract is for benefit of some person, contract would be voidable at such person's option provided he is sui juris.

Where the legislature has prohibited the making of a contract, and has expressly provided or, having regard to the language in which the Act is couched, has manifested its intention, that the contract should be for all purposes void such contract is utterly null and void. [P 435 C 1]

Where the language that has been employed does not plainly and conclusively indicate the intention of the legislature that the contract should be void for all purposes, if the inhibition is merely for the benefit of a particular person, or persons the Court will lean to the construction that the contract is voidable at the election of the person or persons for whose benefit the inhibitory Act was enacted, provided that such persons are sui juris, and capable of managing their affairs in a reasonable and proper manner. [P 435 C 1]

Where, however, the person or persons for whose benefit the inhibition was created are not deemed to be capable of conducting their affairs in a sensible and normal way, and the Act was passed for their protection, or where the contract is prohibited not merely for the benefit or protection of individuals, but because the intention of the legislature was to forbid the making of the contract in the interest of the community generally, and as a matter of public policy, in either case, a contract that contravenes the provisions of the Act is null and void for all purposes: *Magdalen Hospital v. Judgment.—This case involves the construction of the Murshidabad Act (15 of 1891). On 25th July 1920, the Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad and his eldest son, defendant 3, executed an indenture, whereby the Nawab let to defendants 1 and 2 certain lands and premises to which the Murshidabad Act applied for a term of 21 years in consideration of:

"the sum of rupees five lacs as advance of the total rent payable for and during the said term of 21 years, the annual rent being one equal 21 part of the said total rent, and the said lessees do hereby covenant with the said lessor in manner following (that is to say) that the said lessees shall pay to the said lessor at or immediately before the execution of these presents the said sum of rupees five lacs as advance of the total rent payable during the said term of 21 years."

In the same indenture defendant 3 covenanted with the lessees that in the event of his succeeding to the estate within the period of the term he would allow the lessees to continue in occupation of the demised property "without paying any rent therefor pursuant to the terms of this lease." An acknowledgment of the payment of the five lacs was endorsed upon the indenture by the Nawab. Thereafter defendants 1 and 2 went into, and at all material times have remained in, possession of the demised property. The present suit has been brought by the Nawab to recover possession of the demised property and mesne profits, upon the ground that the indenture of lease of 25th July 1920 is null and void by reason of the provisions of condition (1) of the Murshidabad Act. Condition (1) is to the following effect:

"The said Nawab Bahadur shall not nor shall any of his successors in the said titles sell mortgage devise or alienate the said properties respectively or any of them otherwise than by lease or demise for a term not exceeding 21 years, and under a rent without bonus or selami."

Three issues fall for determination :

(1) Is the lease in suit a "lease or demise for a term not exceeding 21 years and under a rent without bonus or selami" within condition (1) of the Murshidabad Act?

(2) If nay, is the lease void, or voidable only at the instance of the Secretary of State for India?

(3) If the lease is void, is the Nawab estopped from denying its validity?

In my opinion the terms of the lease in suit plainly contravene condition (1) of the Act. The intention of the legislature in passing the Murshidabad Act was to provide "for the maintenance of the position and dignity" of the Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad for the time being, and the Act was enacted to prevent any Nawab in the future from squandering his possessions, and thereby becoming unable to meet the current expenditure necessary for his maintenance as "the premier noble of Bengal." The legislature, in order to give effect to its intention, provided that the rent reserved under any lease granted in future by the Nawab for the time being should be payable periodically, and, in my opinion, condition (1) was inserted for the very purpose of meeting such an evasion of the Act as that which has been attempted in the present case.

Under S. 105, T. P. Act (4 of 1882), a lease of immovable property is defined as :

"a transfer of a right to enjoy such property made for a certain time expressed, or implied, or in perpetuity in consideration of a price paid or promised, or of money, a share of crops, service, or any other thing of value, to be rendered periodically or on specified occasions to the transferrer by the transferee, who accepts the transfer on such terms."

In the section :

"the price is called the premium, and the money, share, service, or other thing to be so rendered is called the rent."

I have no doubt that the five lacs which the lessees agreed to pay to the lessor under the indenture of 25th July 1920 was a premium or selami and not rent, notwithstanding that it is stated therein to be an "advance of the total rent payable." In my opinion, the terms of this lease clearly offended against the provisions of condition (1), for :

"The principle, as I understand it, is that whenever it can be shown that the acts of the parties are adopted for the purpose of effecting a thing which is prohibited, and the thing prohibited is in consequence effected, the parties have done that which they have purposely caused, though they may have done it indirectly, and endeavoured to conceal that they have done so" per Blackburn, J., in Jeffries v. Alexander (1).

Suppose a Nawab, having sold all the free property of which he was possessed and, having dissipated the purchase moneys, proceeded to grant leases for 21 years of the residue of his property that was subject to the Murshidabad Act, for a lump sum or sums to be paid as a present advance of future rent. Now, if the Nawab, having squandered the sums advanced, happened to die shortly after the leases had been executed, the very object which the legislature had in view when enacting the Murshidabad Act would be frustrated ; for the succeeding Nawab, so long as the leases subsisted, would be penniless, and the premier Noble of Bengal would have no means of livelihood, and would be unable to maintain himself in a manner befitting his position and dignity. The legislature, conceiving that it would be against public policy in a country like India that the premier Noble of the Province of Bengal should be reduced to a condition so parlous and undignified, by enacting the Murshidabad Act, endeavoured to prevent the creation of such a situation, and to protect the Nawabs against the risks of improvidence. The object and effect of the indenture in suit being to evade the provisions of the Act in my opinion, the lease of 25th July 1920 offends against both the spirit of the Act and the provisions of condition (1) and is prohibited.

As to the second issue that has been raised I am clearly of opinion that the provisions under which the Secretary of State for India in certain events becomes entitled to retake possession of the properties to which the Act applies do not, and do not purport to, invest the Secretary of State with the power to affirm or avoid any transaction that contravenes the terms of the Act, but were enacted to prevent a recurrence of such inhibited acts, or a course of wasteful extravagance by a Nawab which, if persisted in, would lead to the dissipation of the possessions of the House of Murshidabad. In my opinion, whether the lease in suit was merely voidable, or whether for all purposes it was null and void depends upon the intention of the legislature to be collected from the terms of the Act. The principles of construction which the Court must apply in order to ascertain whether this lease is void or voidable are, I think, as follows :

Where the legislature has prohibited the making of a contract, and has expressly provided or, having regard to the language in which the Act is couched, has manifested its intention, that the contract should be for all purposes void such contract is utterly null and void.

"Prohibitory statutes prevent you from doing something which formerly it was lawful for you to do. And whenever you can find that anything done is substantially that which is prohibited I think it is perfectly open to the Court to say that that is void, not because it comes within the spirit of the statute, or tends to effect the object which the statute meant to prohibit, but because by reason of the true construction of the statute, it is the thing, or one of the things, actually prohibited ; per Lord Cranworth, L. C., in Philpott v. St. George's Hospital (2); Jagad-bandhu Saha v. Radha Krishna Pal (3), Abdul Aziz v. Kanthu Mallik (4); Madras Hindu Mutual Benefit Permanent Fund v. Ragava Chetti (5)."

Where the language that has been employed does not plainly and conclusively indicate the intention of the legislature that the contract should be void for all purposes, it would seem that if the inhibition is merely for the benefit of a particular person or persons the Court will lean to the construction that the contract is voidable at the election of the person or persons for whose benefit the inhibitory Act was enacted, provided that such persons are sui juris, and capable of managing their affairs in a reasonable and proper manner.

Where, however, the person or persons for whose benefit the inhibition was created are not deemed to be capable of conducting their affairs in a sensible and normal way, and the Act was passed for their protection, or where the contract is prohibited not merely for the benefit or protection of individuals, but because the intention of the legislature was to forbid the making of the contract in the interest of the community generally, and as a matter of public policy, in either case a contract that contravenes the provisions of the Act is null and void for all purposes.

"It is said that "void" is sometimes construed "voidable," and where the provision is introduced for the benefit of the parties only, such a construction may be right, but where it is introduced for public purposes, and to protect those who are incapable of protecting themselves, it should receive its full force and effect ; per Bayley, J. The King v. Hipswell (6)."

Take the case of eleemosynary and ecclesiastical corporations governed by 13 Eliz., c. 10 by way of illustration. If a bishop made a lease or grant which was not warranted by this statute, it was held at one time to be neither "void nor voidable by the bishop himself who made it, but remains good against him during such time as he remains bishop. But as to the successors of the bishop, such leases or grants are void or voidable, as the case happens to be, as will appear hereafter. And the reason such leases or grants are good against the bishop himself who made them, is because they were so at the common law, and the statutes were made only for the benefit of the successors, that they should not be bound by those acts of their predecessors which might turn to their prejudice and disadvantage ; but not to give the bishop himself power to avoid or derogate from his own acts, which would be against all rules both of law and equity, and, therefore, was not within the meaning of the said statutes : Bacon's Abridgement, Vol. 4, p. 761, Coke Litt. 45-a, Roe v. Archbishop of York (7), per Lord Ellenborough."

In Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts (8), however, the House of Lords took a different view as to the validity of such leases, and it was held that leases which contravened 13 Eliz. c. 10 were ab initio null and void as being against public policy.

"As to the character of the evil which it is sought by the statute to prevent it is clear that in the case of an eleemosynary corporation, the whole property of which is devoted to charity, and where the office bearers and other members of the corporation have no personal interest whatever, the object must be to make the property of the corporation absolutely inalienable, in any way other than by the particular form of lease which is authorized . . . . . The intention is to condemn the lease as a wrong and a void thing, even though every member of the corporation should have committed himself to it, and should be anxious to maintain it : per Lord Cairns, L. C., ibid at p. 332 ; see also Bishop of Bangor v. Parry (9).

Now, it is obvious that the legislature thought that the Nawabs of Murshidabad were not likely to manage their affairs in a reasonable and provident way, and by enacting the Murshidabad Act was minded to protect successive Nawabs against themselves, and as a matter of public policy and concern to make provision to prevent any Nawab in future from squandering the possessions of the distinguished house of which he was the head. For these reasons it appears to me plain that the lease in suit by means of which the parties intentionally sought to evade the provisions of the Act is null and void for all purposes.

But it is urged that even so the Nawab is not entitled to maintain the suit, for, "If a man has made a solemn deed covenanting that another shall enjoy the premises and likewise for further assurance, it shall never lie in his mouth to dispute the title of the party to whom he has so undertaken": per Lord Mansfield in Goodtitle v. Bailey (10), and on behalf of the first and second defendants it is contended that the Nawab is estopped from denying the validity of the lease for he cannot derogate from his own grant. No doubt, apart from the Act that contention would be sound. But by reason of the Act the Nawab has become pro tanto a person under disability, and both because the Act was passed on grounds of public policy and not merely for the personal benefit and protection of the Nawabs and because the Nawab is incapacitated from executing such an indenture, in my opinion, this contention cannot be sustained.

The claim of the Nawab to recover possession of the demised premises in no sense depends upon the void indenture of lease, for the lease, being null and void for all purposes, may be disregarded by the Nawab and every one else; and it is not pretended that the first and second defendants were induced to take the lease by any fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the Nawab; indeed to my mind it is clear that the lessees were content to risk the chance of the lease being held to be void in order to obtain the very substantial benefits which they thought would accrue to them through being put into possession of the demised premises. Further, in my opinion, the Nawab is in consimili casu with other persons under disability such as minors and married women in England who are restrained from anticipation: Bateman (Lady) v. Faber (11), R. Leslie v. Sheill (12), Thurstan v. Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society (13), Jagadbandhu Saha v. Radha Krishna Pal (3), Mohori Bibee v. Dharamodas Ghose (14), Mahomed Syedol v. Yeoh (15), Fuli Bibi v. Khokai Mondal (16), Sadiq Ali Khan v. Jai Kishori (17). In R. Leslie v. Sheill (12), Lord Sumner, as he then was, stated the reason for affording immunity to infants from contractual obligations to be that:

"It was thought necessary to safeguard the weakness in infants at large, even though here and there a juvenile knave slipped through, supra at p. 612."

and the ground upon which I hold that the Nawab is not estopped from denying the validity of the lease in suit was explained by Channell, J., in Corporation of Canterbury v. Cooper (18), where his Lordship observed that:

"The reason why there can be no such estoppel is, if you were to hold that the corporation were estopped by the fact of their having granted this lease you would be giving the go by to the statute which says they shall not grant the lease when the person to whom it is granted acts upon it. If you say that is estoppel, that estoppel is got rid of by the statute. There can be no estoppel merely by the granting of the lease or acting under it. There can be no estoppel preventing the corporation stating that the lease is not in fact valid."

The result is that there will be a decree for possession as prayed. The Nawab through his learned counsel has stated that he is prepared, upon obtaining possession of the demised property, to refund to the first and second defendants such a sum as the Court deems it equitable that he should repay to the first and second defendants in respect of this transaction.

In my opinion it is in consonance with equity and good sense that the Nawab should repay to the first and second defendants the money that he actually has received as consideration for the lease, and the Nawab consents to a personal decree being passed against him for five lacs of rupees. But I do not think that the Nawab should be awarded any sum for mesne profits, or that the lessees should receive interest on the moneys advanced. The parties to the lease deliberately attempted to evade the provisions of the Act, and while the Nawab was content to forgo the profits accruing from the demised property in consideration of a present advance of five lacs, the lessees on their part were prepared to pay five lacs and to give up the interest that would accrue therefrom in return for the opportunity of collecting the rents of the demised property. It may be that the lessees have incurred expenditure on the property but they must be content with the fruits that they have been able to garner from the demised property while it was in their possession. In the circumstances I make no order as to costs.

Nabadwip Chandra Pandit—Respondent.

Appeal No. 2251 of 1926, Decided on 20th April 1928, against appellate decree of the Sub-Judge, Noakhali, D/- 23rd June 1926.

(a) Evidence Act, S. 92. (4)—Evidence of acts and conduct of parties showing that essential terms of registered instrument are varied is not admissible.

The evidence of the acts and conduct of parties for the purpose of showing that the main or essential terms of a registered instrument have been varied is not admissible, for an agreement is none the less oral, although it is to be inferred from the conduct of the parties: 6 C. W. N. 242, Dist.; 38 Cal. 892 (P.C.); 39 Cal. 284; 41 Cal. 493 (P.C.); 20 C. W. N. 347 and other cases discussed; 20 C.W.N. 847, not Appr. [P 438 C 1, P 439 C 1, 2]

(b) Civil P. C., S. 100—Scope.

The question of waiver, acquiescence or estoppel is a question which can be examined by the High Court in second appeal: 21 All. 496 (P.C.), Ref. [P 439 C 2]

(c) Landlord and Tenant—Mere non-realization of rent according to kabuliyat does not raise inference that there has been waiver to receive rent fixed under kabuliyat.

In order to establish an abandonment of right which is created by a document which is explicit and unambiguous in its terms, something more than a mere non-enforcement of right over a number of years is necessary. So the mere fact of non-realization of rent for a number of years according to the terms of the kabuliyat, does not necessarily give rise to the legal inference that there has been a waiver of the right to receive rent fixed under the kabuliyat. Mitter, J.—This is plaintiff's appeal against the decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Noakhali, dated 23rd June 1926, modifying a decision of the Munsif, Lakhimpur, dated 25th August 1923. The suit in which this appeal arises was commenced by the plaintiff for recovery of Rs. 57-8-9 as arrears of rent together with cesses and interest for the years 1325 to 1328 B. S. in respect of a holding which the principal defendants hold under the plaintiff. The case of the plaintiff is that the defendant was holding the disputed land at a jama of Rs. 7-15 a year. He states that the rights between the parties were created by a kabuliyat which was executed on 28th Chaitra 1293, and that the plaintiff did not realize through mistake the jama at the rate Rs. 7-15 a year but realized it at the rate of Rs. 5 a year. The defence of the defendant in substance was that the defendant was holding this jama at a fixed rental of Rs. 5 a year. This defence did not prevail with the Court of first instance and the Munsif decreed in part for the rents of the period in suit at the rate of Rs. 7-15 a year and only varied the amount of interest. An appeal was taken to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Noakhali and the learned Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to get rent at the rate of Rs. 5 a year. Before the Subordinate Judge it was contended by the defendants, now respondents, that although in the kabuliyat of 28th Chaitra 1293, there was a stipulation that after the Bengali year 1296 rent was to be realized at the rate of Rs. 7-15 a year, rent had been realized at the lower rate of Rs. 5 ever since that date and, consequently, there has been a waiver of the stipulation in the kabuliyat that the fixed rental was to be at the rate of Rs. 7-15 a year. This contention of the defendant prevailed with the lower appellate Court and the lower appellate Court came to the finding that the explanation given by the plaintiff that the rent at the rate of Rs. 7-15 was not realized through mistake was not an explanation which he would accept and from the fact of non-realization of rent at the rate of Rs. 7-15 the Court of appeal came to the conclusion that there has been a waiver of this stipulation to pay a higher rate and that consequently the plaintiff could not claim rent at that rate. The Court of appeal also held that on the construction of the kabuliyat the defendant was holding a permanent mokarrari lease under the plaintiff. In other words, the effect of the lower appellate Court's decision is that all the terms of the kabuliyat must be given effect to except the term which referred to the progressive increase of rent up to the limit of Rs. 7-15 which was to be the fixed rental for all times to come after the year 1296. In support of this decision, the lower appellate Court relied on three decisions of this Court in the cases of Beni Madhub Gorani v. Lalmoti Dassi (1) and Kailash Chandra Saha v. Darbaria Sheikh (2) and Manindra Chandra Nandi v. Sm. Durga Sundari Dassya (3).

A second appeal has been taken to this Court against this decision of the Subordinate Judge and it has been argued by the learned vakil for the appellant that the decision of the lower appellate Court in so far as it decreed the plaintiff's suit at the reduced rate of Rs. 5 is wrong; firstly, because it was not permissible to the lower appellate Court to rely on the evidence of the acts and conduct of parties for the purpose of varying the terms of the original kabuliyat, and secondly, because in any event the mere fact of non-realization of rent for a large number of years does not necessarily give rise to the legal inference that there has been a waiver of the right to receive a fixed rent of Rs. 7-15 a year after 1296. We think that both these contentions are well-founded and must prevail. The case of Beni Madhub Gorani v. Lalmoti Dassi (1) relied on by the lower appellate Court is obviously distinguishable. It will appear from the report of that case that there the question was as to whether the kabuliyat was ever acted upon. The kabuliyat stipulated a rate of rent to be Rs. 27 at the inception and after a certain number of years to be Rs. 30 and the rent which was paid was neither Rs. 27 nor Rs. 30 and it was held that as the rent mentioned in the kabuliyat had not been paid for a large number of years, an inference might be drawn that the kabuliyat was not intended to be acted upon. In the present case, it is common ground that the kabuliyat was acted upon, so far as the realization of rent at the rate of Rs. 5 up to the year 1296 was concerned. It is not the case of the defendant that there was any contemporaneous agreement at the inception of the tenancy which was created by the kabuliyat that although it was stipulated that after 1296 the rent to be paid was Rs. 7-15, yet it was agreed that that stipulation was not to be given effect to. The case of the defendant is that by reason of non-realization of rent from 1296, there has been a variation of that particular stipulation in the kabuliyat and as the kabuliyat was created by a registered instrument, such a variation or reduction of rent could only be made by another registered instrument. In this connexion, reference may be made to the provisions of S. 92, Cl. (4), Evidence Act, and to two decisions, one of a Full Bench of this Court in the case of Lalit Mohan Ghosh v. Gopali Chuck Coal Co., Ltd. (4) and to the case of Durga Prasad Singh v. Rajendra Narayan Bagchi (5), which went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The case of Kailash Chandra Saha v. Darbaria Sheikh (2) does undoubtedly lend some support to the contention raised by the learned vakil for the respondent and support the view taken by the Court of appeal below. To this case Nalini Ranjan Chatterjea, J. was a party and he considered the case of Kailash Chandra Saha v. Darbaria Sheikh (2) in a later case, namely, in the case of Nagendra Lal Khan v. Bhola Nath Bhuya (6). At p. 338 (of 27 C. W. N.) Chatterjea, J. in delivering the judgment of the Court observed as follows:

(4) [1911] 39 Cal. 284=14 C. L. J. 411=12 I. C. 728=16 C. W. N. 55 (F.B.).

(5) [1913] 41 Cal. 493=21 I. C. 750=40 I. A. 223 (P.C.).

(1) [1898] 6 C. W. N. 242.

(2) [1915] 20 C. W. N. 347=32 I. C. 251.

(3) [1915] 20 C. W. N. 680=32 I. C. 185.

"It may be open to doubt, however, whether there can be a waiver of the essential terms of a registered lease except by a registered instrument having regard to the decision of the Full Bench in the case of Lalit Mohan Ghosh v. Gopali Chuck Coal Co. Ltd., (4) where, however, the variation was sought to be effected by documents. But in the cases mentioned above, the Court held, upon the evidence of the subsequent acts and conducts of the parties, that certain terms of the contract were never intended to be acted upon. On the other hand, in the case of Lakhatulla v. Bishwambhar Roy (7), Jenkins, C. J., and Doss, J. held that an agreement is none the less oral because it is to be inferred from the conduct of the parties."

The learned Judge then referred to the fact that this question was raised before the Judicial Committee in the case of Maung Kyin v. Ma Shwe La (8) but was not decided and he held again at p. 339 that although the decisions of some of the other High Courts took a view contrary to that taken by the Full Bench of this Court in Preonath v. Madhusudhan (9), the question so far as this Court is concerned was not free from difficulty nor settled, although the weight of authority was in favour of the admissibility of evidence of the acts and conduct of parties and this Court has held in some cases upon the subsequent acts and conduct of parties that certain terms of a contract were never intended to be acted upon, i. e. from the very beginning. At the time of this decision in Narendra Lal Khan v. Bhola Nath Bhuya (6) the Judicial Committee, as the learned Judge points out, expressed no opinion on the question with regard to the admissibility of the evidence of the kind with which we have to deal. It appears, however, that the Judicial Committee did decide the question in 1917, as will appear from the report in the case of Maung Kyin v. Ma Shwe La (10). Apparently, the attention of the learned Judges who dealt with the case of Narendra Lal Khan v. Bhola Nath Bhuya (6) was not drawn to the case. Be that as it may, it seems to me from a reading of this decision that evidence of the kind with which we have to deal in the present case, namely, the acts and conduct of parties for the purpose of showing that the main or essential terms of an instrument has been varied is not admissible. Reference might be made in this connexion to the following observations of Lord Shaw in that case:

"Founding upon this section, the respondents maintain that the whole of the evidence led must be rejected. On the contrary, the appellants maintain that notwithstanding the terms of the section, they are entitled to set up and prove the acts and conduct of the parties as inconsistent with the transfer of property and only consistent with the true nature of the transaction having been one of mortgage or transfer of mortgage. They found upon a considerable body of authority to that effect, etc., etc."

Their Lordships pointed out at p. 332 that the true rule seems to have been laid down in the case of Dattoo Totaram v. Ramchandra Totaram (11) decided by Sir Lawrence Jenkins. We think that, having regard to the observations which I have quoted, it is extremely doubtful if the decision in Kailash Chandra Saha v. Darbaria Sheikh (2) to which reference has already been made can be regarded as good law. Mr. Sen who has appeared for the respondent had to concede that in substance the effect of this relinquishment is really to vary the right of the plaintiff which was a right to receive the higher rate of rent. There has really been a subtraction from that right and that variation can only be made by a registered instrument. We think the decision of the lower appellate Court is wrong.

With regard to ground 2 taken by the learned vakil for the appellant, as I have already stated, that also is a substantial ground and should be given effect to. It lay on the defendant to establish that there has been a permanent relinquishment of the right by the plaintiff to receive the higher rent. The fact of non-realization of rent for a large number of years might be consistent with a temporary abatement although the temporary abatement might extend over a large number of years. The question of waiver or relinquishment is a question of legal inference from facts found. The question of waiver, acquiescence or estoppel is a question which can be examined by this Court in second appeal. In this connexion, reference may be made in the case of Beni Ram v. Kundan Lal (12).

We think that in order to establish an abandonment of right which is created by a document which is explicit and unambiguous in its terms, something more than a mere non-enforcement of right over a number of years is necessary. It is conceded that there is nothing more in this case than the fact of non-realization of rent for a number of years. That alone would not justify us in holding that there has been a permanent abandonment of the right to receive a higher rent. The result is that the decree of the lower appellate Court must be set aside and that of the Munsif restored but in the circumstances of the present case, there will be no order as to costs.

Corporation of Calcutta — Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 357 of 1929, Decided on 18th April 1929, against order passed by the Municipal Magistrate and the Chief Executive Officer of Corporation of Calcutta.

Calcutta Municipal Act (1923), S. 299—Interpretation and scope of—Inapplicability of corresponding provisions of the Act of 1899.

According to S. 299 of the Act a person may be served with notice for any alleged unlawful encroachment. The words "fixture attached to a building" should be construed as they stand and the structure complained of whether constructed either before or after the "building" is within the section. The corresponding provision of the Act of 1899 which required the building to be erected before the fixture does not govern the interpretation of the present Act: 23 C. W. N. 752, Ref.

Satindra Nath Mukherji,—for Petitioner.

D. N. Bagchi and Gopendra Krishna Banerjee—for Opposite Party.

Pearson, J.—This is a rule which was issued upon the Municipal Magistrate and the Chief Executive Officer of the Corporation of Calcutta calling upon them to show cause why a certain order of demolition should not be set aside on the ground that the elements necessary to constitute an offence punishable under

S. 364, sub-S. (1), Calcutta Municipal Act of 1923, had not been shown to exist. The petitioner is the owner of certain premises No. 49, Doctor Lane, Calcutta. He was served with a notice under S. 299, Calcutta Municipal Act, alleging that he had unlawfully encroached over the extreme end of a blind passage by the side of his house by erecting an one-storied entrance with masonry walls and pucca roof and a ledge and calling upon him to remove the same. On his failure to do so, he was prosecuted before the Municipal Magistrate and order was passed directing that the structure complained of should be demolished. The finding of the Magistrate is that the passage belongs to the Corporation and that there has been an encroachment; and there is no denial of this fact. The defence gave evidence to the effect that this covered entrance had been in existence for some 40 years.

The language of S. 299, sub-S. (1) of the present Calcutta Municipal Act of 1923 is as follows:

"When any verandah, platform or other similar structure or any fixture attached to a building so as to form part of the building whether erected before or after the commencement of this Act causes a projection, encroachment or obstruction over or on any public street or any land vested in the Corporation, they may by written notice require the owner or the occupier of the building to remove or alter such structure or fixture."

Section 364 of the same Act provides for the demolition of such structure by an order of the Magistrate. The applicant before us relies upon the case of Mohammad Raziuddin v. Corporation of Calcutta (1). It was a case decided under the corresponding provisions of the former Calcutta Municipal Act of 1899. The corresponding section of that Act, namely, S. 341, sub-S. (1) provided as follows:

"When any fixture has, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, been attached to a building so as to form part of the building and the same causes a projection, encroachment or obstruction over or on any public street or any land vested in the Corporation, the General Committee may by written notice require the owner or occupier of the building to remove or alter such fixture."

The decision of this Court in the case cited was based on the wording of the old section, it is said in the course of the judgment:

(1) [1919] 23 C.W.N. 752=58 I.C. 352=29 C. L.J. 605.

"As we understand them, the word 'fixture' which has been attached to a building cannot be applied to a part of the building which was constructed at the same time as the main building itself. The word 'when a fixture has been attached' seem to us to mean that the building must first be in existence and the attachment of the fixture subsequent to the erection of the building."

Consequently, in that view, as it had not been proved that the platform in question was constructed after the building was erected, the Court in that case held that the Municipal Magistrate had no power to order for the demolition complained of. On the analogy of that case, it is argued before us that there is no evidence in the present case to show when the structure complained of was erected whether before or after the building to which it was attached, and, therefore, it is said that the same order should be made holding that the Magistrate had no power to pass such an order. The answer to that argument I think is this : As a matter of interpretation, the section as it now stands must be construed according to the ordinary plain meaning of the language used. The decision in the case cited obviously depended upon the construction which the Court sought ought to be put upon the language employed in the section of the old Act, particularly the words "when any fixture has been attached." If we looked at the present corresponding S. 299, those words are not to be found. The words now are :

These words taken in their ordinary meaning are sufficient to cover the present case and it matters not that evidence is not forthcoming to show whether the structure complained of came into existence after the building to which it was attached or before. It is a question of plain meaning of the words of the section as they stand, and, in my opinion, no analogy can be evoked from the language of the previous Act nor can it be said that the present Act must be constructed to mean the same thing as to the previous Act though a different language has been employed. For these reasons, in my opinion, the rule should be discharged.

Jack, J.—The plaintiff in this suit seeks to recover from the defendants the amount due on a mortgage bond. In her written statement defendant 1 says that she executed the bond and admitted execution before the Sub-Registrar understanding it to be a power of attorney in the name of the plaintiff to manage her properties. She contends that the bond was not legally attested and executed. Defendant 2 was a benamidar of the plaintiff. Defendant 3 files a written statement supporting that of defendant 1 and adding that he had purchased the properties to the knowledge of the plaintiff. The Court of first instance decreed the suit except for a deduction of a portion of the claim for interest. The appellate Court dismissed the appeal and, allowing the cross appeal on account of interest, decreed the suit in full. In this appeal it is urged that inasmuch as one of the attesting witnesses to the bond when examined, proved hostile, the remaining attesting witness who is alive should have been examined to prove the bond, and, not having examined him, the Court was not entitled to invoke the provisions of S. 71, Evidence Act, and prove the bond by other evidence.

Both the Courts below have held that it is only necessary to call one attesting witness before having recourse to other evidence under S. 71 of the Act. This view appears to be in accordance with the wording of Ss. 68 and 71 of the Act and was adopted in a recent decision of this Court: Hason Ali v. Gurudas Kapali (1). It is true that good authorities have held that it is not clear whether, under S. 71, Evidence Act, other evidence can be given to prove the document where the attesting witness called denies, or does not recollect, the execution of the document and there is another attesting witness alive, subject to the process of the Court, and capable of giving evidence: cf. Field, Edn. 6, p. 236. However, had the intention of the legislature been otherwise, one would have expected to find S. 71 of the Act differently worded as it cannot be supposed that when S. 68 and 71 of the Act were drafted cases in which one or more of the attesting witnesses would prove hostile were not anticipated. I therefore think that, in the present case, the Court was justified in taking other evidence as to the execution of the document. Of course S. 71 does not relieve the plaintiff from the necessity of producing the best evidence available. Here the remaining attesting witness was summoned, but did not appear, and the plaintiff has given reasons which the Court below has accepted for not taking further steps to produce him. Had he been the only witness it would undoubtedly have been the duty of the plaintiff to exhaust all the processes of the Court in order to produce him, but since an attesting witness had been produced, other evidence became admissible under S. 71, Evidence Act and the plaintiff was not bound to produce another attesting witness whom there were grounds for him to believe hostile.

There was some doubt whether it was necessary to decide as to the applicability of S. 71, Evidence Act, in this case inasmuch as there is some ground for holding that the written statements of defendant 1 and defendant 3 amount to an admission of execution of the bond by defendant 1, so as to make S. 70, Evidence Act, applicable and avoid the necessity of proving execution as against them. However, the admission was certainly not clear and unqualified. Defendant 1 says that she executed the bond and admitted execution before the Sub-Registrar, but did so understanding it to be a power of attorney in the name of the plaintiff to manage her properties, and that she would not have signed it had she been aware of its contents. This is, I think, not such an admission as to make S. 70, Evidence Act, applicable, though it is an important piece of evidence in proof of execution, there being no specific allegation of fraud. In the circumstances the Courts below were justified in finding that execution of the mortgage bond by defendant 1 was proved. There seems to be also no ground for withholding interest at the bond rate. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal by defendant 2 and arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff, now respondent, to enforce a mortgage bond which is said to have been executed by defendant 1 in the month of Magh 1324 B. S. Defendant 2 is a subsequent purchaser of the equity of redemption. Defendants 1 and 3 put in separate written statements. Their contention is that defendant 1 executed the bond knowing it to be a power of attorney and that she would not have executed the bond if she knew it to be a mortgage bond. They further raised the defence that the mortgage bond was not attested in accordance with law.

The Munsif held that the mortgage bond had been duly executed and attested and that consideration passed for the same, and that defendant 1 executed the mortgage bond knowing it to be a mortgage. Of the four attesting witnesses to the mortgage bond two were dead at the date of suit and the third attesting witness turned hostile and did not prove the execution or attestation and the fourth attesting witness Abdul Aziz was summoned by the plaintiff but as he told the plaintiff that he would not depose so, plaintiff took no further steps to examine him. The Munsif held in these circumstances that as the attesting witness who was examined did not prove attestation S. 71, Evidence Act, was attracted to the facts of the case and the execution of the mortgage could be proved by other evidence and the evidence of the other witnesses who were not the attesting witnesses was sufficient to prove execution. The Munsif granted the usual preliminary mortgage decree and directed that unless the decretal money was paid within a certain time the amount would be realized by the sale of the mortgaged property. The Munsif, however, held that the stipulation for compound interest was penal and allowed interest at 18 per cent. per annum up to the date of the decree. The defendant preferred an appeal to the Subordinate Judge and the plaintiff filed a cross-appeal on the question of interest with the result that plaintiff's suit has been decreed in full.

Against this decision an appeal has been taken to this Court by defendant 3. The appellant contends that S. 71, Evidence Act, does not apply as the remaining attesting witness who is alive has not been examined. The respondent on the other hand contends that as one attesting witness was called for the purpose of proving the execution of the mortgage bond as required by S. 68, Evidence Act, and the said witness has denied the execution of the document S. 71 applies and in support of this contention the respondent relies on a decision of this Court in the case of Hasan Ali v. Gurudas Kapali (1).

The case referred to undoubtedly supports the contention of the respondent, for, Mallik, J., with whom Cuming, J., concurred said this :

"As observed before the plaintiff did actually call one of the attesting witnesses then alive and it was only when that attesting witness resiled, the plaintiff proceeded to prove the document by other evidence...This in my opinion, was a full compliance with the provisions of Ss. 68 and 71, Evidence Act."

In the case cited there were other attesting witnesses alive.

It does not seem to me clear that S. 71 can be applied unless the evidence of the attesting witness who is alive and is subject to the process of the Court be taken when one attesting witness has, after being called, denied execution. Field, J., who is regarded as a high authority on the law of evidence states in his commentary on the law of evidence as follows :

"If one of two or more attesting witnesses being called denied or does not recollect the execution of the document, it is not very clear whether other evidence can be given to prove it, if there be another attesting witness alive, subject to the process of the Court and capable of giving evidence, who is not produced."

Woodroffe, J., another high authority on the law of evidence quotes this opinion of Field, J., without dissent in his well known commentary on the law of evidence. The rule of English law regarding attestation of wills is expressed in the case of Coles v. Coles (2), in the following words :

"A party propounding a will is bound to call one at least of the attesting witnesses, if he can be produced, to prove the due execution and if such witness fails to prove the due execution he is bound to call the other, although he may know him to be an adverse witness."

In the case of Pilkington v. Gray, (3), the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that where one of two attesting witnesses to a will retracted his evidence and in effect swore to the signatures of testator and the witnesses having been forged it was necessary to explain the absence of the other attesting witness before other evidence of the execution of the will could be let in. It is not sufficient to say that the other attesting witness will turn out hostile. In the case of Gobinda Chandra Pal v. Pulin Behary Benerji (4), Mukerji, J., with whom Greaves, J., concurred, observed that the mere fact that the only surviving attesting witness is considered hostile by the party taking his stand on the mortgage does not relieve him from the duty of examining him as a witness. It seems to me that it was not intended by enacting S. 71 to depart from the rule of English Law that the evidence of the other witnesses should not be introduced unless the absence of the other attesting witness is satisfactorily explained in the case where one of the two attesting witnesses has been called and has denied execution. It is not necessary, however, to express a final opinion on the question as to whether the construction of S. 71 contended for by the appellant is the right one for the appeal can be decided on another ground.

It appears from the written statements that both defendants 1 and 3 admitted execution of the mortgage bond in the pleadings although they said that the execution was obtained by fraud i. e., by representing the same to be a power of attorney. In these circumstances S. 70, Evidence Act, is attracted to the facts of the present case and the admissions of defendants 1 and 3 are sufficient proof of the execution of the mortgage bond against them; see Nund Kishore Lal v. Kanee Ram Tewary (5).

The appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs. I agree with my learned brother in dismissing the appeal although my reasons for so doing are not the same as his.

Appeal No. 921 of 1927, Decided on 18th April 1929, against appellate decree of Offg. Sub-Judge, 2nd Court, Mymensingh, D/- 14th January 1927.

Contract Act, S. 25 (3)—Mere implication of a promise to pay will not bring an acknowledgment of debt under S. 25 (3).

There is a difference between an acknowledgment as understood under the Limitation Act and a promise to pay as contemplated by the Contract Act. Mere implication of a promise to pay will not bring an acknowledgment of debt under S. 25, Contract Act, though it would imply a promise to pay under S. 19, Lim. Act. Mablagnandi is not a promise to pay under S. 25, Contract Act, so as to revive a debt which was barred at the date of the mablagnandi: A. I. R. 1921 Pat. 29; 67 I. C. 298; A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 338; 10 Cal. 284 (F.B.), Ref. [P 444 C 2, P 445 C 1]

The defendant was an agent of the plaintiff. The agency terminated in 1915. In August 1921 Defendant signed a mablagnandi in these words: "I remain liable to the Sarkar for the sum of Rs. 412-7-3." Plaintiff sued on this mablagnandi. Defendant pleaded that the suit was barred by limitation.

Held: that the words used in the mablagnandi did not support the contention that there was an express promise to pay. All that they meant was that the debtor admitted his liability for the amount and declared his indebtedness. They did not satisfy the requirements of S. 25, Contract Act, and the suit was time barred. [P 445 C 1]

Jogesh Chandra Roy and Sachindra K. Roy—for Appellant.

Surjya Kumar Guha—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The facts on which this appeal is based are that the defendant was a gomastha under the plaintiff. The agency terminated in April 1915. In August 1921 there was a mablagnandi signed by the defendant in these words: (in Bangali, the translation of which is as follows: I remain liable to the Sarkar for the sum of Rs. 412-7-3). The suit was brought on this mablagnandi and the only point that arises is whether it is barred by limitation. The defence was that the mablagnandi was obtained from the defendant by undue influence; but the plea was not accepted by the Courts below. Both the Courts below have agreed in holding that the plaintiff's suit is barred by limitation. It is argued on behalf of the appellant that though the debt of which the mablagnandi was made had become barred by limitation at that date, S. 19, Lim. Act, would not apply. There was a fresh start of time from the date of the mablagnandi under S. 25 (3), Contract Act.

It appears to be well-established by authority that there is a difference between an acknowledgment as understood under the Limitation Act and a promise to pay as contemplated by the Contract Act. The cases in settling the law on this point which was at one time in a nebulous state have laid down the distinction that mere implication of a promise to pay will not bring an acknowledgment of debt under S. 25, Contract Act, though it would imply a promise to pay under S. 19, Lim. Act. It has been pointed out that in this respect there is a difference between the English and the Indian Laws. Under the English law an implied promise to pay will afford terminus quo for a suit on the debt but under the Indian law that promise must be an express promise. The law and the cases on this point have been discussed in the case of Rambahadur Singh v. Damodar Prosad Singh (1), where it was held that mere acknowledgment of debt without a promise to pay is insufficient to create a new contract to pay. This view is also supported by two decisions of this Court the judgments of which are to be found in Panchanan Poddar v. Khitish Chandra (2) and Khitish Chandra v. Umed Mondal (3). In the last case the learned Chief Justice has observed that a mablagbandi is a good acknowledgment under S. 19, Lim. Act, and, therefore, it preserves any debt due which was not at that time barred by limitation, but in dealing with this matter the Court must also proceed upon the view that mablagbandi is not a promise to pay under S. 25, Contract Act. so as to revive a debt which was barred at the date of the mablagbandi. This point does not require further elaboration.

But it has been argued by Mr. Roy appearing for the appellant that the words used in the mablagbandi mean a promise to pay the amount there stated. The words are (in Bengali) which have been correctly translated by the learned Subordinate Judge as "I remain liable to the Sarkar for the sum of Rs. 412-7-3." In our opinion, these words do not support the contention that there is an express promise to pay. The most that it can be said to mean is that the debtor admits his liability for the amount and declares his indebtedness. If it were an acknowledgment under S. 19, Lim. Act, it might probably have been successfully argued that it implies a promise to pay. It does not satisfy the requirements of S. 25, Contract Act. The law on this point will be found discussed in Pollock and Mulla's Contract Act, 5th Edn. p 197, et seq.

It has also been argued that the article of the Limitation Act, applicable to this case should be Art. 64, Lim. Act, which deals with money found to be due on accounts stated between the plaintiff and the defendant. As was pointed out in the Full Bench decision in the case of Dukhi Sahu v. Mahommad Bikan (4) an account stated has a definite technical meaning where there are cross-demands which are settled between the parties. There is nothing in this case to show that there was any such mutual dealing between the parties the relation between them being that of principal and agent.

The view according to the facts of this case taken by the Courts below is correct and this appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 2130 of 1925, Decided on 1st June 1928, against appellate decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, Howrah, D/- 26th May 1925.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 1, R. 8—In previous suit by Secretary of Samaj, defendant objecting to maintainability of suit under R. 8—Court overruling objection and holding suit maintainable without aid of R. 8—In subsequent suit defendant contending that R. 8 was bar to suit as Court's permission was not obtained—Executive Committee of Samaj authorizing Secretary to maintain suit—Questions raised in two suits were different and res judicata could not apply—Objection being technical, case will be covered by Civil P. C. S. 99, Civil P. C., S. 11.

In a previous suit by the Secretary of Religious Association the defendant objected that the suit was not maintainable under O. 1, R. 8 as the plaintiffs were not 'numerous.' But the Court overruled the objection and held that the suit was maintainable without the aid of that rule. In the subsequent suit the defendant contended that R. 8 was bar to the suit as permission of the Court was not obtained. It was clear from the proceedings of the Executive Committee of the Samaj that the Secretary was authorized to institute the suit and presumably the Executive Committee had authority to so authorize him.

Held: that as the questions raised in the previous and the subsequent suit were different ones, the subsequent suit was not barred by the principle of res judicata. [P 446 C 2]

Sarat Chandra Roy Chowdhury, Dharendra Lal Kastgir and Jitendra Mohan Banerjee—for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—In this case the respondent is the Secretary of a religious association called the Amraguri Nava-vidhan Brahma Samaj. Some years ago he brought a suit against the defendants as Secretary of the Association for recovery of possession of the land in suit on the allegation that it was owned by the Brahma Samaj. That suit was decreed on 26th November 1909. The defendants appealed; but before the appeal was finally heard the plaintiff took possession through Court on 12th September 1910. He was subsequently dispossessed by the defendants in November 1910 which dispossession gave rise to the present suit. The appeal in the previous case was finally decided by the lower appellate Court on 25th July 1911 and dismissed, the decree in favour of the plaintiff having been maintained. The present suit was instituted on December 1920. Both the Courts below have given a partial decree to the plaintiff.

The only point that has been argued before us is that the suit in its present form is not maintainable. It is contended that the association is not a corporation within the meaning of O. 29, Civil P. C. The only provision therefore under which the plaintiff is entitled to maintain the suit is prescribed by O. 1, R. 8. This question was raised in the Court below and decided against the defendant appellant. It should be noted here that the previous suit was brought under O. 1, R. 8 but the defendants objected that the suit was not maintainable as that rule did not apply in that case the plaintiffs not being 'numerous.' The objection in the previous suit was overruled by the trial Court but it was not argued in the lower appellate Court. It was attempted to be raised in second appeal in this Court but the learned Judges refused permission to allow the defendants to raise the point at that stage of the litigation. The trial Court in that suit held that the plaintiff as Secretary of the association was competent to maintain the suit and that it was not necessary to have recourse to the provision of O. 1, R. 8. The defendant now turns round and takes the objection that the suit ought to have been brought under that rule. On behalf of the respondent it is argued that the question as to the competency of the plaintiff to maintain the suit was finally settled in the previous litigation and it cannot be re-agitated in this case. The appellant answers that the question raised in the previous suit as well as in this suit is a question of law and under some rulings of this Court the decision in a previous suit on a question of law does not operate as res judicata. If it were necessary to go into the question raised in this case, I would have felt great hesitation in accepting the observation made in some of the cases that the decision on a question of law does not operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit based on a different cause of action. This to my mind is totally inconsistent with the plain wording of S. 11, Civil P. C. and I am not prepared to express a definite opinion upon this point without further consideration. But on the facts it is not necessary to decide the point relating to res judicata raised in the appeal. In the previous suit the question raised by the appellant was that the suit was not maintainable under O. 1, R. 8, Civil P. C. The Court overruled that objection and held that the plaintiff could maintain the suit even without the aid of that rule. In the present case the appellant contends that O. 1, R. 8 is a bar to the present suit. The questions in the two suits do not seem to be the same and I do not think that the principle of res judicata should so extended as to be made applicable in this case. But there is another ground upon which it is easy to dispose of this matter. The plaintiff has brought the present suit not only as Secretary to the Brahma Samaj, but on the strength of the decree he had obtained in the previous suit which declared that he was entitled to the land in suit and was entitled to recover possession of it from the defendants. That decree is now final between the parties and the defendant should not be allowed to go behind it and attack the right of the plaintiff to maintain the present suit on the strength of the decree.

But I agree with my learned brother that this case is governed by the provisions of S. 99, Civil P. C., as the error or irregularity complained of does not in any way affect the merits of the case or the jurisdiction of the Court, though I am not sure that that section applies to the constitution of a suit or the right to maintain a suit as that is not a question which arises in any proceeding in the suit. But as the Judicial Committee have observed in Indrajit Pratap Sahi v. Amar Singh (1) the procedure laid down by law is intended to further the cause of justice and not retard it. The appeal in my opinion fails and is dismissed with costs.

Jack, J.—The only ground of appeal argued is that the appeal is barred under the provisions of O. 1, R. 8 inasmuch as the Brahma Samaj is not a registered association and, therefore, without complying with the provisions of O. 1, R. 8, the Secretary could not maintain any suit for the recovery of lands belonging to it.

Now there can be no doubt that the circumstances of this case bring it under O. 1, R. 8. The Secretary of the Brahma Samaj is here suing on behalf of a number of persons having the same interest in the suit and under O. 1, R. 8, he can only do so with permission of the Court and the “Court shall in such case give at the plaintiff's expense notice of the institution of the suit to all such persons.”

It is only where the society is a corporation registered under the Indian Companies Act or legally authorized to sue in the name of an officer that a suit can be brought by the Secretary on behalf of the society under O. 29, R. 1. It is clear, therefore, that in this case the Secretary was not entitled under the law to sue on behalf of the Samaj not having obtained permission of the Court to do so under O. 1, R. 8.

But it is contended in this case, as found by the Court below, that inasmuch as in a previous suit between the same parties it was held that the Secretary was entitled to sue on behalf of the Brahma Samaj he must be held by the principles of res judicata equally entitled to sue in this case. In that case the trial Court held that he was so entitled to sue and that though the provisions of O. 1, R. 8 had been observed in that case their observance was not necessary. This issue was not raised in the first appellate Court and the second appellate Court refused to go into this question inasmuch as it had not been raised in the first appellate Court and in the circumstances of that case. It may, therefore, be taken to have been decided in that suit that the Secretary of this society was entitled to sue the defendants on behalf of the other members of the society in that suit. But in my opinion this is not a case in which the rule of res judicata should be applied. In the case of Aghore Nath v. Kamini Debi (2) a number of cases on the point were discussed and it was held (following Bigelow on Estoppel) that where, as in this case, the causes of action in the two cases were different :

“the estoppel should be limited to matters distinctly put in issue and determined in the prior action and it should further be restricted to questions of fact or mixed questions of fact and law, for if it was extended to pure questions of law, a Court might find itself in the position that in so far as certain parties are concerned, it is irrevocably bound to adhere to a proposition of law erroneously laid down in a previous suit.”

In the present case the question is a pure question of law and it should further be taken into account that in the previous suit the procedure laid down by law had in fact been followed and it was in such circumstances and because the point was not raised in the first Court of appeal that the Court of second appeal refused to interfere. I think, therefore, that in this case the finding of the trial Court in the former suit that the Secretary was entitled to sue on behalf of the society independently of the provisions of O. 1, R. 8 should not be regarded as res judicata in the present suit.

It follows, therefore, that in the ordinary course we should have had to find that the suit was barred through non-observance of O. 1, R. 8. In the circumstances of the present case, however, the objection to the maintenance of the suit by the Secretary is purely technical. From the proceedings of the Executive Committee of the Samaj it is clear that the Secretary was authorized by the Executive Committee to institute the suit and presumably the Executive Committee had authority to so authorize him. Taking this into account and in view of the finding in the previous suit, I think that this is a case in which the provisions of S. 99, Civil P. C., should be applied to prevent a technicality from overcoming the ends of justice, as clearly the irregularity in procedure has not affected the merits of the case or the jurisdiction of the Court. This being the only ground of appeal which was passed, the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeal No 907 of 1928, Decided on 17th April 1929.

Criminal P. C., S. 162—List of stolen ornaments is a statement and its admission is misdirection—Criminal P. C. S. 297.

Where during a search ornaments were found on the person of the accused's wife, and it was alleged that they were the ornaments stolen during the dacoity and a list handed over to the investigating police officer during the course of investigation included the ornaments.

Held: that the list being a statement within the meaning of S. 162, Criminal P. C., was clearly inadmissible and its admission having caused misdirection the verdict of the jury and the sentence of the accused should be set aside. [P 448 C 2]

Lalit Mohan Sanyal and Amrendra Narain Bagchi—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The accused in this case Fulbash Sheikh has been convicted under S. 395, I P. C., and sentenced to suffer rigorous imprisonment for a period of five years. There are two other accused but their appeals have been summarily rejected.

The short point that has been pressed upon our attention by Mr. Lalit Mohan Sanyal is that evidence which was clearly inadmissible has been admitted in this case and that, that being so there has been misdirection.

It is not necessary to set out the facts at length. It appears that at the time of the search it was found that the accused Fulbash's wife was wearing certain ornaments. The ornaments are not of much value and were very ordinary ones. The prosecution alleged that these ornaments had been stolen during the progress of the dacoity. Fulbash and his wife on being questioned about these ornaments stated that they belonged to Fulbash's wife, that they had always been worn by Fulbash's wife, that they had not been stolen during the progress of the dacoity. It appears that these ornaments were included in a second list handed to the Investigating Police Officer during the course of investigation. Mr. Sanyal thereupon contends that the list which was supplied to the Investigating Police Officer during the course of investigation was a statement in writing made to a Police Officer within the meaning of S. 162, Criminal P. C., and that therefore the list in question was inadmissible in evidence. We have examined the record and there is no doubt whatsoever that on the facts Mr. Sanyal's contention appears to be well-founded. If that is so there is no escape from the conclusion that the list in question should not have been admitted in evidence but the learned Deputy Legal Remembrancer had contended that the list was in no way responsible for the purpose of establishing the identity of the ornaments which had been stolen. In our opinion we must give effect to Mr. Sanyal's contention, and hold that inadmissible evidence having been let in, there was clearly misdirection. The question then arises as to what we should do in this matter. As stated above, the ornaments in question were of not much value and were such as are ordinarily worn by this class of persons. There is also the circumstance that as soon as these ornaments were noticed during the search, Fulbash and his wife stated at once that they were the property of Fulbash's wife and had always belonged to her, in other words, it is clear that no endeavour was made to conceal these ornaments at the time of the search or at any other time. In these circumstances we are of opinion that no useful purpose would be served by our directing a re-trial. We accordingly set aside the verdict of the jury and with it the conviction and sentence and direct that accused Fulbash be discharged. If he is on bail his bail bond will be cancelled.

Basti Mandal — Plaintiff — Respondent.

Appeal No. 859 of 1927, Decided on 18th March 1929, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Murshidabad, D-/ 4th December 1926.

Civil P. C., S. 11—Decisions arrived at in previous suit though dismissed operate as res judicata.

On a suit by the landlord for ejectment of his under-raiyat, it was contended by the defendant that he was a cosharer. The Courts held the plea to be unavailing that point having been already decided in a prior suit between them in spite of defendant's contention that the previous suit having been dismissed on the ground that notice had not been served to the defendant, that point was undecided.

Held: that even then the question of the status having been already decided in that suit, did operate as res judicata: 13 Cal. 17, Dist.; A. I. R. 1922 P. C. 241, Rel. on.

Abinash Chandra Ghosh—for Appellant.Bankim Chandra Mukerji and Purna Chandra Chatterjee—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiff for ejecting the defendant from a plot of land on the allegation that the defendant was holding the same as under-raiyat and that notice had been served on the defendant determining his tenancy. The prayers in the plaint were for declaration of the plaintiff's raiyati and for recovery of khas possession. The defendant besides contending that no notice was served upon him asserted that he was a cosharer with the plaintiff in respect of the suit land. The suit has been decreed by both the Courts below. The defendant has then preferred the present appeal.

The contention that has been urged in the appeal relates to the question of res judicata. Both the Courts below have held that the question as to whether the defendant is a cosharer of the plaintiff or an under-raiyat under him is barred by res judicata by reason of a previous decision between the parties. The contention that has been urged in connexion with this matter is that inasmuch as the previous suit which was a suit instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant for recovery of possession on declaration of title and in which the same question was raised was dismissed on the ground that notice had not been served on the defendant, the finding at which the Courts had arrived in that suit as regards the status of the defendant is not to be treated as res judicata in the present suit. Now on reference to the record it seems that the previous suit was one in which the plaintiff has asked for declaration of his title to the land and for khas possession thereof, and the defence of the defendant in that suit was that he was not a tenant holding under the plaintiff but was a cosharer of his. This defence was gone into and ultimately it was found that the plaintiff's title to the land was made out, but notice had not been served on the defendant and upon that the suit was not dismissed but a decree was made in the plaintiff's favour in the following terms:

"Ordered that the plaintiff's alleged title to the land in suit be declared, he cannot recover khas possession of the land but he may sue for settlement of fair rent and recovery of nazar if he likes."

From this decision the plaintiff preferred an appeal and the defendant a cross-objection, and the appellate Court, to which the said appeal and the cross-objection was preferred, upheld the decree which the trial Court had passed. The facts therefore are not that the suit was dismissed on a preliminary point making it unnecessary for the Court to go into the other questions that arose in the suit but that the questions were decided and made the foundation of a decree declaring the plaintiff's title, and one of the prayers in the suit, namely, that for khas possession was refused on the ground that notice had not been served on the defendant. Under circumstances such as these the case to which the learned advocate for the appellant has referred, namely, that of Nundo Lal v. Bidhoomukhey Dehee (1) has in our opinion no application. The real reason on which this doctrine of res judicata is founded in so far as a case of the present description is concerned has been given by the Judicial Committee in the case of the Midnapur

Zamindary Co. Ltd. v. Naresh Narayan Roy (2) at p. 467 (of 48 Cal.) where their Lordships say that they do not consider that a decision will found an actual plea of res judicata where the defendants having succeeded on the other plea, had no occasion to go further as to the finding against them. This cannot be said of the present case in view of the fact that the plaintiff's title was declared and it is only one of his prayers, namely, that for khas possession was refused on the ground that no notice was served. We are of opinion that the Courts below were right in the view that they took on the question of res judicata.

The appeal therefore fails and must be dismissed with costs.

MITTER, J.

Eakubali Pandit—Appellant.

v.

Appeal No. 131 of 1926, Decided on 7th December 1928, against the appellate decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, Noakhali, D/- 7th September 1925.

Record-of-Rights—Entry showing that under-raiyats had acquired occupancy rights—Entry based on kabuliyat which contained no clause entitling plaintiff to eject defendants, under-raiyats, but contained term that it was year to year tenancy—If kabuliyat be treated as permanent lease it offended against Bengal Tenancy Act S. 85—If treated as year to year lease, it could not protect defendant from ejectment—So entry based on it was void—Bengal Tenancy Act, Ss. 85 and 49.

There was an entry in the Record-of-Rights to the effect that under-raiyats defendants had acquired occupancy right. The kabuliyat did not contain any clause entitling the plaintiff to eject the defendants, but contained a term that it was a san basen kabuliyat, i. e., it was a tenancy from year to year;

Held: that if the kabuliyat was treated as creating a permanent lease, it must be regarded as void since it would offend against S. 85. On the other hand if it was treated as a year to year lease it did not protect the defendants from ejectment upon notice under S. 49. In either view of its terms, therefore, the kabuliyat could not create a right of occupancy in the under-raiyats; and hence the Record-of-Rights based on it was not correct: 27 C. L. J. 107 and 28 C. Khetra Mohan Ghose and Mahendra Kumar Ghose—for Appellant.

S. C. Basak and Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta—for Respondents.

Biraj Mohan Majumdar—for Deputy Registrar.

Judgment.—The suit in which this appeal has arisen was brought by the plaintiff, now appellant, to eject the defendants on the allegation that defendants are under-raiyats on whom notice to quit had been served under S. 49 (b), Ben. Ten. Act and whose tenancy had been determined by such notice. The defence of the defendants, now respondents, is (i) that notice had not been properly served on the defendants; (ii) that they have acquired a right of occupancy by custom and are not liable to be ejected.

The Munsif held after a careful examination of the evidence that the service of notice to quit which was served on the defendants through Court in April 1920, had been satisfactorily established and points out that one of the defendants, Muhammad Ali does not come forward to depose that no notice was served on him. The Munsif refers to the entry in the Record-of-Rights in favour of the defendant to the effect that though under-raiyats the defendants have acquired a right of occupancy and states that the entry is proved to be wrong the moment it is shown that defendants are under-raiyats, and that the defendants have failed to establish that they have acquired a right of occupancy by custom and that on the other hand plaintiff has proved that there is no such custom.

The Munsif rested his decision on the further ground that plaintiffs brought a suit for ejectment against the defendants under S. 66, Ben. Ten. Act, and defendants, although appearing at the earlier stages of the suit, did not ultimately contest it with the result that an ex parte decree was passed. It is said that if the defendants were under-raiyats with rights of occupancy the decree for ejectment could not have been passed and the decree in the said suit (No. 1826 of 1919) operates as res judicata on the question of the status of the defendants. The Munsif accordingly decreed plaintiff's suit.

An appeal was taken to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Noakhali who reversed the decision of the Munsif and dismissed plaintiff's suit. The Subordinate Judge rested his decision on three grounds : (i) that the evidence of the service of notice to quit is meagre and unsatisfactory; (ii) that the presumption arising from the entry in the Record-of-rights has not been rebutted ; (iii) that it cannot be seriously contended that all the elements which go to constitute proof of custom have not been mentioned even by the few witnesses examined. It is argued for the plaintiff, now appellant in second appeal, that the judgment of the lower appellate Court is not a proper judgment and there had been a defect of procedure in the trial of the appeal which has affected the merits of the case so as to call for the interference of this Court in second appeal.

I think the contention of the appellant is well founded and must prevail. The lower appellate Court deals with the question of service of notice rather perfunctorily. He says "the proof of service of notice is admittedly not quite satisfactory." The Munsif discusses in detail the evidence to show that the notice was served through Court and points out that no reason is suggested why the Court peon with six witnesses to the service should sign a false report. In my opinion, there has not been a proper consideration of the evidence on the question of service of notice which must be considered again. The learned advocate for the respondents frankly concedes that the judgment of the Subordinate Judge on this point is not as satisfactory as it should be.

The lower appellate Court admitted at the appellate stage a certified copy of a kabuliyat, which does not contain any clause entitling the plaintiff to eject the defendant. It is a kabuliyat which also contains the term that it is a (san basan) kabuliyat, i. e., it is a tenancy from year to year. The Record-of-Rights was based on this kabuliyat. If it is a kabuliyat which creates a permanent under-raiyati tenancy it cannot be admitted in evidence as it contravenes the provisions of S. 85, Ben. Ten. Act and cannot create a valid contract between the parties and the presumption arising from the entry in the Record-of-Rights is rebutted as soon as it is shown that the entry was based solely on a document which did not create a valid contract between the parties: see Bagha

v. Ram Laxhan (1). The Subordinate Judge points out that under the kabuliyat the defendant had been given the right to alienate the land under certain conditions and there are no words conferring on the plaintiff the right to eject the defendant. If the lease is regarded as conferring permanent rights on the under-raiyat then it cannot be acted on as being in contravention of S. 85. If on the other hand the lease is taken as a lease from year to year (san basan) the under-raiyat is liable to be ejected upon notice under S. 49 : see Chandi Charan v. Somla Bibi (2).

The Record-of-Rights was based on this kabuliyat which (i) treating it as creating a permanent lease offends against S. 85 and must be regarded as void (ii) treating it as year to year lease does not protect the defendant from ejectment, Chandi Charan v. Somla Bibi (2) : (See observations of Mookerjee, J.). Whatever construction is put it does not justify the entry in the Record-of-Rights that defendants have acquired occupancy right. The Record-of-Rights based as it is on the kabuliyat is not correct for in either view of its terms the kabuliyat cannot create a right of occupancy in the under-raiyat. The Record-of-Rights does not state that the defendants have acquired a right of occupancy by custom.

In these circumstances with regard to this point also the appeal must be reheard and the lower appellate Court would consider the question whether the defendants have on the evidence established that there is a custom in the locality under which under-raiyats acquire a right of occupancy. If no such custom is established plaintiffs will be entitled to a decree in ejectment provided the Court holds in his favour on the question of service of notice to quit. The judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and the case is sent back to it in order that it may rehear the appeal in the light of the observations I have made. The costs of the appeal will abide the result.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 158 (B)—Purchase by landlord in execution of decree against some co-tenants of tenure—Only interest of judgment-debtors passes unless they represent whole estate.

Where a landlord sues only the recorded co-tenants of a tenure, obtains a decree, and purchases the tenure in pursuance of the decree but omits to implead a purchaser from one of the co-tenants all that he obtains by the purchase is the interest of the defendant judgment-debtor. But the whole tenure including the interest of the purchase will pass under the auction-purchase pursuant to the decree if the facts warrant a finding that the tenants who were impleaded in the circumstances represented the whole estate. [P 452 C2]

Bankim Chandra Mukherji and Bansari Lal Sarkar for Kamini Kumar Sarkar—for Appellant.

Saratkumar Mitra—for Respondent.

Page, J.—The plaintiff purchased the interest of one of several co-tenants of a transferable tenure. The purchase was made in June 1912. In October 1912, there was an entry made in the Record-of-Rights, recording his vendor as one of the co-tenants. In December 1912, proceedings were taken by the landlord under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for enhancement of rent, and to those proceedings the original tenants, including the vendor of the plaintiff, were made parties. Enhancement was granted, and, in 1917, a suit was brought by the landlord against the original co-tenants for arrears of rent from 1913 to 1916. He obtained an ex parte decree on 8th December 1917, and the decree-holder himself purchased the tenure at the auction-sale pursuant to the decree on 20th December 1918. On 19th June 1924, the plaintiff brought the present suit to establish his title to the share of the co-tenant from whom he purchased. The question which falls for determination is whether, in the circumstances obtaining in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to claim that the interest in the tenancy which he purchased did not pass by the sale.

Now, the ordinary law is that where a landlord sues some only of the co-tenants of a tenure, obtains a decree, and purchases the tenure in pursuance of the decree, all that he obtains by the purchase is the interest of the defendant-judgment-debtors. But the whole tenure will pass under the auction-purchase pursuant to the decree if the facts warrant a finding that the tenants who were impleaded in the circumstances represented the whole estate. The question in this case is whether the facts justify such a finding. Now, there is no evidence and no finding that the plaintiff expressly represented to the landlord that the co-tenants who were sued represented the tenure including the share therein that he had purchased, and there is no evidence and no finding that the plaintiff knew of the proceedings relating to the Record-of-Rights, or those taken under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act. In the circumstances obtaining in this case it does not appear that there was any evidence to justify a finding that the tenants who were sued represented the whole estate. In these circumstances the ordinary rule of law will apply, and the plaintiff is entitled to claim the share of the tenure which he has purchased.

The result is that the decrees of the lower Courts cannot stand. There will be a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to the share of the tenancy which belonged to defendant 2 in the suit. He is also entitled to joint possession of the said share with defendant 1, and to mesne profits in respect of that share from defendant 1. The suit must be remanded to the trial Court in order that the amount of the mesne profits may be ascertained. The plaintiff is entitled to his costs in all the Courts.

(a) Civil P. C., S. 100 — Scope—Bengal Municipal Act (1884), S. 85.

(b) Bengal Municipal Act (1884), S. 85 (a) —Amount deposited in Post Office Savings Bank and other savings banks in municipal area is "property within municipality."

The introduction of the word "circumstances" in the section is not intended to restrict the term "property" but to widen the scope of the section. And although it is not easy to define what the "circumstances" are, still the amounts which pass through the limits of the municipality and are available to the persons taxed at any moment, and the fact that the persons are wealthy zamindars, cannot be altogether ignored while estimating the "circumstances and property": 35 Cal. 859, Rel. on.; Other cases referred.

Bijan Kumar Mukerjee—for Appellants.

Surajit Chandra Lahiri—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The appellants who are three brothers instituted a suit against the Chairman and Commissioners of the Pabna Municipality for, amongst others, a declaration that the assessment of a personal tax on them of Rs. 21 per quarter was illegal and ultra vires. The suit has been dismissed by both the Courts below. The appellants contend, in the first instance, that the imposition of a personal tax jointly against them is illegal as has been recently held to be so by this Court. We have considered the question whether we should allow the appellants to urge this contention now when it was not urged in any of the Courts below or even in their grounds of appeal to this Court. We think we shall not be justified in doing so.

They next urge that in assessing the tax the meaning of the expression "according to their circumstances and property within the municipality" appearing in S. 85 (a) has been misunderstood. Now the Subordinate Judge appears to have proceeded upon the following findings:

1. The zemindari properties of the plaintiffs let out in patni are situated outside the municipality. The income on this head is Rs. 5,487 odd a year. The rents from the patnidars are realized within the municipality at the house of the plaintiff. In 1328 the total realization amounted to Rs. 4,101 odd and in 1329, Rs. 18,921 odd.

2. In 1328 the plaintiffs received within the municipality.

Rs. 1,293 on account of interest on G. P. Notes.

Rs. 852 on account of dividends on shares in companies.

Rs. 108 on account of interest from the Post Office Savings Bank.

Rs. 7,624 on account of decretal and other dues.

Rs. 303 on account of interest from deposit in the Pabna Savings Bank.

Rs. 944 on account of fees of plaintiff 2 as managing Director of a Limited Company.

3. The total amount of patni rent payable to the plaintiffs for properties within the municipality is Rs. 642.

4. The collections made at the plaintiffs' house within the municipality are remitted to Tantiband from where they go back to the Bank within the limits of the municipality.

The question that arises is whether on these findings it can be said that the "circumstances and property" of the plaintiffs "within the municipality" can be fairly estimated at Rs. 9,000, so as to admit of a personal tax of Rs. 21 per quarter.

Upon the decisions that have been cited before us the following points may be treated as settled.

1. The word "circumstances" is equivalent to "means": Chairman of Giridih Municipality v. Suresh Chandra (1); Deb Narayan Dutt v. Chairman, Baruipur Municipality (2).

2. The expression "within the municipality" governs both "circumstances" and "property": Debendra Nath v. Chairman, Taki Municipality (3).

3. The word "property" includes both real and personal property or estate and tangible as well as intangible rights of value: Chairman Giridih Municipality v. Suresh Chandra (1).

4. When income or sale proceeds are brought from outside within the limits of the municipality and put into a Bank to the credit of a person it may without undue strain on the language, be described as his circumstance and property: Chairman Jalpaiguri Municipality v. Jalpaiguri Tea Co. Ltd. (4) per Mookerjee, J. The proceeds so deposited are property within the municipality: per Buckland, J.

5. What constitutes the circumstances and property of a person within the municipality must on a large measure depend upon the facts of the particular case: Chairman Jalpaiguri Municipality v. Jalpaiguri Tea Co. Ltd. (4).

It is true that in assessing the assessee's circumstances and property within the meaning of S. 85 (a) of the Act his circumstances and property which are only within the municipality itself have to be considered Kameswar Pershad v. Chairman, Bhabua Municipality (5) and Chairman, Rajpur Municipality v. Nagendra Nath Bagchi (6). But despite the able arguments of Dr. Mukerjee I am unable to see that in this case any question arises as to whether the measure of the assessee's liability is what he gets and not what he spends, such as arose and was decided in the case of Chairman, Giridih Municipality v. Suresh Chandra Muzumdar (1), and Debendra Nath Rai Chaudhuri v. Chairman, Taki Municipality (3) or whether the list in respect of income brought from outside is the extent to which it is to be spent within the limits of the municipality as was laid down in the case of the Chairman, Joynagar Municipality v. Sailabala Dutt (7).

Here apart from anything else there are two items in the findings of the Courts below which give us a fair estimate of the amount which was in the Post Office and the Savings Bank to the credit of the appellants. These items are Rs. 108 (on account of interest from the Post Office Savings Bank) and

Rs. 303 (on account of interest from deposit in the Pabna Saving Bank). These two items indicate the amount in deposit in these two places to be very near Rs. 9,000 if not more. This amount is undoubtedly "property within the municipality" within the meaning of the words as used in S. 85, Cl. (a). Mookerjee, J., in Chairman, Giridih Municipality v. Suresh Chandra (1) observed:

"I am unable to hold that the word "circumstances" was introduced in S. 85 to restrict the term "property." The intention on the other hand seems to have been to widen the scope of the section so as to make taxable what might perhaps be not properly comprised under the term property and at the same time ought not to escape assessment."

If, then, to the two items mentioned above, it is still necessary to add anything to make up Rs. 9,000 the "circumstances" of the appellants within the municipality are available for being taken into account. It is not easy to define what the "circumstances" are. They are not matters which can accurately be put down in £. s. d. But the amounts mentioned in the findings of the learned Subordinate Judge which pass through the limits of the municipality and are available to the appellants at any moment they may like to spend them and the fact that the appellants are wealthy zemindars can not be altogether ignored. We are of opinion that there is no error of law or of principle upon which the Courts below have proceeded and we accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Judgment.—These two appeals arise out of two suits brought by the plaintiff, now appellant, under S. 149, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act, in which she wanted a declaration that she was entitled to rent deposited by the tenant-defendants in each of the two cases and she claimed that she purchased the tenure which originally belonged to Ishan Chandra Maity in 1910 and that she has been in possession thereof since then. The suit was resisted by defendant 1 who claimed to have purchased the property at a sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act in the year 1914. It is admitted that the plaintiff lands appertained to khas mahal Estate No. 2835 and were comprised in a chak of 172 bighas. The original owner of this tenure was one Gopal Chandra Chatterjee, whose interest was sold in execution of a mortgage decree against him and purchased by one Tapaswiram. Ishan and defendant 1 purchased this interest in the tenure from Tapaswiram. Ishan's interest was one-third and that of defendant 1 was two-thirds in this chak. In execution of a money decree, Ishan's interest was sold and purchased by one Rakhal Bhandari in 1907 and in the year 1910 Rakhal sold whatever he purchased from Ishan to the present plaintiff. The present plaintiff after his purchase deposited the landlord's fee as required by S. 12, Ben. Ten. Act. The defence of defendant 1 is that the interest of Ishan was extinguished by the sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act and that it was not a transferable interest and passed no title in favour of the present plaintiff. The Court of first instance overruled the defence and gave the plaintiff decrees in the two suits. Against these decrees two appeals were carried to the Subordinate Judge by the defendant and there was a further second appeal to this Court in which, by consent of parties, it was agreed that this suit under S. 149, Cl. (3), should be tried as a title suit and the question of title shall be determined finally by the Subordinate Judge on remand. The Subordinate Judge has reversed the decision and decrees of the Munsif in the two suits. He finds, in the first place, that the interest of Ishan was not a transferable interest and that, therefore, the plaintiff acquired no title to the property, as his interest was not recognized by the Government who was the proprietor of this tenure. He further finds that, even if the interest of Ishan was transferable, it was extinguished by the sale in favour of defendant 1 under the Public Demands Recovery Act and as that sale still stands, the plaintiff has got no title to the plaintiff lands. He, accordingly, allowed the appeals and dismissed the plaintiff's suits. Against these two decrees of the Subordinate Judge of 24-Parganas, two second appeals have been taken to this Court and two points have been taken by Mr. Chatterjee who has appeared for the plaintiff-appellant in both these appeals. It is argued, in the first place, that the Subordinate Judge is clearly in error in holding that the interest of Ishan was not a transferable interest.

It is admitted that the interest of Ishan is heritable. It is further found from the khas mahal jamabandi register, which was produced by the defendants-respondents as their own document in the Court of first instance, that the interest of Ishan was a mourasi interest and the lower appellate Court was clearly in error in holding that the interest was not a permanent interest on an erroneous view of the meaning of the word "mourasi." It is argued, in the second place, that as the tenure was a permanent tenure, the moment it is shown that the landlord's fee has been paid under S. 12, Ben. Ten. Act and the deed registered by the registering officer in favour of the plaintiff, the landlord-Government was bound to recognise the transfer and was bound to issue the certificate under the Public Demands Recovery Act in the plaintiff's name. The certificate not having been admitted in his name, his interest could not have passed at the sale in execution of the certificate which was held under the Public Demands Recovery Act in 1914. I think both these contentions of the learned advocate are sound and must prevail. The learned Subordinate Judge is clearly in error in holding that the word "mourasi" does not convey a permanent interest. As has been pointed out in the Tagore Lectures for the year 1895 by Mr. Sarada Charan Mitra, (1921 Ed. p. 205) who was one of the Judges of this Court and who is regarded as an authority on the land laws of Bengal, that mourasi tenures are, by the definition itself, "heritable" and which are :

"not held for any "limited time." The learned author at p. 203 further points out that it has now been settled that the words "with your sons and grandsons in succession (Bengali) "

and words of similar import convey a permanent and transferable right. They convey an absolute right subject to payment of rent. If there are no words fixing the rent in perpetuity, the tenure becomes mourasi, but not mokarrari. There can be no doubt that the word "mourasi," which implies, according to its literal meaning, "a succession from generation to generation" in the interest held by the mourasidar, conveys the idea of permanency, as it can be predicated of such a tenure that it is held for an indefinite time. This tenure, therefore, comes clearly within the definition of "permanent tenure" as stated in S. 3, Cl. (8), Ben. Ten. Act. The Subordinate Judge was evidently misled by the decision in the case of Katyayani Debi v. Uday Kumar Das (1) in which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee said that a mourasi and mokarrari interest implies "permanent and transferable and at a fixed rent." From that it does not follow that mourasi interest is not a permanent interest without fixity of rental. It appears also in this case that there have been at least seven transactions of the property by way of sale and mortgage, etc. It appears also from the landlord's books, the jamabandi registers, that the name of the transferee is mentioned and that the transferee has been recognized by the Government. It is also said that there has been no alteration of rent. In my opinion, the use of the expression "mourasi" is sufficient to constitute the tenure a permanent tenure. In addition to that there are other circumstances, to which I have just referred, which place it beyond doubt that the tenure was one which was of a permanent character. The first ground taken appears to be well founded and must be given effect to.

With regard to the second ground taken, it appears to me that the sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act in favour of defendant 1 was a nullity, for it was a sale in pursuance of a certificate in which the plaintiff was not named, although the plaintiff had given the necessary notice of the transfer in his favour under S. 12, Ben. Ten. Act, and his transfer was complete as soon as the document was registered. As has been pointed out by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Surapati Roy v. Ram Narayan Mukerji (2).

"a transfer of a permanent tenure by a registered document was held to be complete under S. 12, Ben. Ten. Act, as soon as the document was registered, and the same view was expressed in the case of Hemendra Nath Mukerji v. Kumar Nath Roy (3), already referred to. Their Lordships consider that the present controversy is covered by the latter decision."

It was incumbent on the Government to have issued the certificate in the name of the present plaintiff, if they wanted to make the sale effective as against her or as against the tenure. The decree could not be regarded as a decree for arrears of rent within the meaning of S. 20, Cl. (3) of the Public Demands Recovery Act, for the real tenant was not made a party to the certificate. Consequently, what passed by the sale was only the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor if anything passed at all. There is good authority for saying that if the real person liable under the certifioate is not made a party, the sale is an absolute nullity. Reference may be made in this connexion to the case of Lalit Mohan Sen v. Manoranjan Ghosh (4). As was pointed out by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Khiarajmal v. Daim (5), the Court had no jurisdiction to sell the property of persons who were not parties to the proceedings pursuant to which the sale appears to have taken place. The sale, therefore, did not affect the interest of the plaintiff in any way. The result is that these appeals are allowed, the decrees of the Subordinate Judge in both the cases set aside and those of the Munsif restored with costs throughout.

But it is not desirable that he should be tried as many times when he could have been tried for all of them at one trial: 2 A. L. J. 673; Cr. Rev. No. 934 of 1919, Rel. on; A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 179, Ref. [P 459 O 1]

Probodh Chandra Chatterjee—for Petitioner.

Satindra Nath Mukharji—for the Crown.

Mukerji, J.—On a chalan submitted by the police in which it was stated that the petitioner had, as a durwan in the employ of Messrs. Sew Narain Golap

Roy, committed criminal breach of trust in respect of a gross sum of Rs. 3,651-5-3, the Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta issued warrant against the petitioner on 19th July 1927. On 12th September 1927, the case was transferred by the Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate to the 4th Court, that is to say, to the Court of Mr. H. K. De, Presidency Magistrate. That learned Magistrate thereafter proceeded to try a co-accused of the petitioner who had also been sent up for trial on the same police chalan and discharged him under S. 253, Criminal P. C. On 15th November 1927, the trial of the petitioner commenced before Mr. H. K. De, the offence specified in the summary form prescribed by S. 370, Criminal P. C., being:

“Criminal breach of trust as a servant in respect of Rs. 3,651-5-3 realized on purjas entrusted to him by Ganpat Roy Chowdhury (the Manager of Messrs. Sew Narain Golap Roy), S. 403, I. P. C.”

Charges in respect of 3 items viz.: Rs. 257-8-3 Rs. 1,855-0-3 and Rs. 178-11-3 were framed against the petitioner as being the items in respect of which criminal breach of trust was committed by the petitioner on 6th June 1927, and the petitioner was convicted on these charges and was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 3 months. The trial thus concluded before Mr. H. K. De, on 8th February 1928.

On 14th April 1928, another chalan was submitted by the police to the Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate stating that the petitioner had committed criminal breach of trust of three sums of money, viz., 700, 100 and 100 on 6th June 1927, 25th May 1927 and 24th May 1927, respectively, the other particulars being the same as in the previous chalan. It was stated in the chalan that the petitioner was undergoing the sentence passed on him by Mr. H. K. De. The Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate issued order for the petitioner being brought up for trial. The petitioner put in a petition objecting to the trial on the ground that these three items were included in the gross sum of Rs. 3,651-5-3 and maintained that he had already been tried for the whole offence that he had committed, and so under S. 403, Criminal P. C., could not be tried again. The Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate disallowed the objection, proceeded with the trial and ultimately convicted the petitioner in respect of the said three items and sentenced him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 3 months.

The petitioner then moved this Court and obtained this rule. The grounds of the rule are that S. 403, Criminal P. C., was a bar to the second trial of the petitioner, or, at any rate, on the principle underlying that section, no such second trial should have been held. It should be noted here that it is not disputed on behalf of the Crown that the three items in respect of which the second trial was held are included in the gross sum of Rs. 3,651-5-3 though they are not covered by any of the three items which formed the subject-matter of the charges framed in the first trial.

At the outset I may observe that I do not understand how the police could have submitted a second chalan when on the first one, which included all the items of the second chalan in the gross sum that was mentioned therein, cognizance of the entire offence had already been taken by the Magistrate. It is true that they might have moved the Magistrate for a second or a further trial in respect of some offence or offences which had not yet been tried; but such application would lie to Mr. H. K. De to whom the whole case, on the first chalan had been made over, and not to the Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate. It is well settled that in circumstances such as these it was Mr. H. K. De alone so long as the case had not been re-transferred from his file, who was competent to deal with any such application. Where a Magistrate has once become properly seised of a case by transfer or otherwise he is seised of the whole matter and a superior Magistrate cannot take action except under Chap. 32 or by withdrawal of the case to his own Court: Radhaballav v. Benode (1), Moul Singh v. Mahabir (2), Golabdy v. Emperor (3) Ajab Lal v. Emperor (4). Were this a ground on which the rule had been issued I should have felt no difficulty in making it absolute and quashing the conviction of the petitioner on this ground alone. To turn now to the grounds of this rule.

Now, there is a divergence of judicial opinion on the question whether after a trial in respect of a gross sum in respect of which breach of trust was alleged to have been committed between two specified dates, a second trial in respect of an offence alleged to have been committed on an intermediate date but not included in the gross sum is permissible. In Appadurai Ayyar, In re (5) the Madras High Court held that under such circumstances the charge in the first trial should be taken to have included all the items covered by the period and the same view was taken by Suhrawardy, J. in Nagendra Nath Bose v. Emperor (6). A contrary view was taken by the Bombay High Court in the case of Emperor v. Kashi Nath Bagaji (7). This contrary view also has been taken by Newbould and Greaves, JJ., in the aforesaid case of Nagendra Nath Bose v. Emperor (6) in which, however, Newbould, J., pointed out that it would make a considerable difference if it were shown that the defalcation which formed the subject of the charge in the second trial was within the knowledge of the prosecution and so could or might have been included in the charge in the first trial. These cases have but a remote bearing on the present case in which it is not the fact that the former trial was for a gross sum and so I am not called upon to express my own view on this matter.

The present case is one in which the prosecution knew perfectly well what was the gross sum in respect of which the petitioner had committed criminal breach of trust. It was a sum of Rs. 3,651-5-3. They could have, if they liked, proceeded against the petitioner in respect of this gross amount under S. 222 (2), Criminal P. C. Instead of doing so they elected to proceed on three items and got the petitioner convicted. Then they picked up three other items and got the accused tried a second time. Though S. 403, Criminal P. C., may not strictly apply in its terms to a case like the present, still there is abundant authority for the view that a second trial in circumstances such as these ought not to have been allowed to be held. Where six documents were alleged to be fabricated at one and the same time and at first the accused was tried for fabricating three of the documents and acquitted, a second trial for fabricating the other three documents, though not barred, was set aside, it being held that it was not desirable that the second trial should take place as the fabricating of all the documents was treated in the first trial as one offence: Emperor v. Inamullah (8). The principle underlying S. 403 have been often extended to cases not falling strictly within the letter of that section: e. g. Emperor v. Jhabbar Mull (9), Emperor v. Bishun Das (10), Jaliram v. Raj Kumar (11). Again in Surja Kanta Bhattacharjee v. Emperor (12) this Court quashed a trial under the following circumstances. S was convicted by Court of Sessions on a charge under Ss. 408 and 477-A, I. P. C., in respect of an item of Rs. 2 when he could have been but was not tried on a similar charge for a further sum of Rs. 7 at the same trial. This Court, on appeal, set aside his conviction and directed that he should not be retried, meaning, on the charge in respect of Rs. 2. Thereafter the prosecution wanted to proceed against S in respect of the other sum of R. 7. This Court stopped that trial.

I am of opinion that if the petitioner had moved this Court for stopping his second trial he would have found no difficulty in getting an order in his favour. But after the trial is over it is not possible to hold on this ground alone that the conviction is illegal. The fact however, remains that he did move the Magistrate for the purpose but failed.

I shall therefore, make the rule absolute to this extent that it will be ordered that the conviction will be upheld but the sentence should be reduced to the minimum that I can think of, namely, a day's rigorous imprisonment which he must have already served out.

But it is not desirable that he should be tried as many times when he could have been tried for all of them at one trial. B. B. GHOSE AND BOSE, JJ.

Abdul Bari Dewan and others—Appellants.

v.

Hrishikesh Mittra and others—Respondents.

Appeal No. 104 of 1926, Decided on 31st July 1928, against original decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, Howrah, D/- 5th March 1926.

(a) Evidence Act, S. 104—Suit for establishing title and ejectment—Plaintiff claiming land in dispute under sale-deed—Defendants contesting the claim as holders of lakheraj property—Plaintiff has to prove that the land is within the geographical limits of the patni village—Burden of proving that the land is dedicated to a foundation as Niskar Pirattar then shifts on the defendants.

A dispute arose regarding lands which were claimed to be included in a pattah in favour of the plaintiffs granted under a sale-deed. The vendors were the daughter's sons of the original lessee. Being the expectant reversioners after the death of the widow of the original lessee a confirmatory lease was obtained in their favour. A mela used to be held at stated time in the year and the profits realised by the original lessee and after him the vendors of the plaintiffs. It was contested that the parcel of land was dedicated as Niskar Pirattar, and the income from the mela was utilized for the expenses of the foundation.

Held: that the most important question in such a case was whether the land in question was within the geographical limits of the village belonging to the zamindari of which patni was granted to the patnidars, the original lessors. If the lands were really within the ambit of the village then the burden of proving that the lands are Niskar Pirattar must rest on the defendants: A. I. R. 1922 P. C. 272, Foll. [P 460 C 2]

(b) Adverse possession—Acquisition of title—Evidence.

Mere holding of a mela and realisation of profits therefrom, even assuming that the mela was held at the instance of fakirs who looked after a foundation does not prove their title to the land on which mela was held.

(c) Civil P. C., O. 16, R. 1—Summons to produce a document—Judge has no power to refuse to issue a summons at any stage.

The function of a civil Court is akin to that of a post office and it has no power to refuse to issue a summons at any stage. The only thing that the Court can do is not to adjourn a case for the production of a witness who is sought to be summoned at a late stage. In such a case the parties get the summons issued at their own risk.

(d) Civil P. C., S. 99—Refusal of summons under O. 16, R. 1—Party producing copy of document sought to be produced in Court but neither proving that it was original nor that it was true copy—There was no miscarriage of justice due to refusal.

Where a summons to a party to produce a document (chitta) was refused by the Court whereupon the party produced an alleged copy of the document sought to be produced but failed to prove that it was original or true copy compared with original.

Held: that there was no miscarriage of justice by such refusal.

(e) Evidence Act, S. 61—Use of document to settle disputes does not make it true copy.

That the man producing a document used the same to settle disputes between the villagers, and before him the document was in the possession of his father, does not make the document a true copy of the original (chitta).

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants against the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Hooghly at Howrah by which he decreed the plaintiff's suit with regard to a plot of land situated within the putni mehal named Pir Seranga. The plaintiff's case shortly stated is that the land appertains to the tenancy of one Moti Lal Ghose who was the Naib of the previous putnidar of lot Seranga, and after his death a confirmatory lease was taken in favour of his daughter's sons during their minority by their father. These daughter's sons were expectant reversioners of Moti Lal's estate after the death of his widow. The daughter's sons Moti Lal, who may be described as the Sircars, were in possession of the land in question from whom the present plaintiff purchased the property by a deed dated 14th February 1920. When the plaintiff wanted to take possession of this property there was a dispute raised by the defendants who claimed to be in possession of the property. That dispute led to a proceeding under S. 145, Criminal P. O., and the Magistrate found possession with the defendants and he made an order that they should be retained in possession until the plaintiff established his right to possession in the civil Court. The suit out of which the present appeal arises was for the purpose of establishing the plaintiff's title and for ejecting the defendants. The order of the Magistrate was dated 19th July 1921.

The defendants in their written statement denied the title of the plaintiff. They contested almost every statement of fact recited in the plaint. Their case was that the land in dispute along with other lands was dedicated as Niskar Pirattar as there was a very ancient foundation known as Hazrat Sultan Pir Sahab. This religious foundation was held in great sanctity by all classes of people in the locality, Hindus and Mahomedans, and a mela used to be held on the disputed land once a year which was frequented by every class of people and shops used to be held and the income taken for the purpose of the expenses of the foundation. The existence of this mela was admitted by both parties. The plaintiff's case was that the mela was founded by Moti Lal who used to realise the rents from the shopkeepers and after Moti Lal's death his son-in-law Chakku used to supervise the mela and realise the rents and after him the plaintiff's vendors. The defendants denied in their written statement that Moti Lal or Chhaku had any connexion with the mela. The most important question in such a case as this must be, in my opinion, whether the land is within the geographical limits of the village belonging to the zemindari of which a putni was granted to the putnidars, the original lessors, who were alleged to have granted a lease to Moti Lal. If the lands are really within the ambit of the village then the burden of proving that the lands are Niskar Pirattar lands must rest entirely upon the defendants. The latest authority for this proposition is the case of Jagdeo Narain Singh v. Baldeo Singh (1)

The learned advocate for the appellants pressed two points strongly for our consideration in support of the appeal. He stated first that the Subordinate Judge had not found the title of the putnidars to the lands, that is to say, whether the lands were within the geographical limits of the putni mehal, and secondly, it was urged that it had not been proved that the disputed lands were included within the pattah in favour of the Sircars upon which the plaintiff based his claim. In opening the case on behalf of the appellants the learned advocate laid great stress upon a fact which he argued was an error of procedure on the part of the Subordinate Judge.

It was stated that the defendants called for a chitta in which the measurements of the different plots of land held by the tenants within the mouja Pir Seranga were recorded. They called for that chitta from the putnidar who is defendant 5 in the suit, but in the notice that was issued there was a mistake and instead of the actual date of the chitta 1256 B. S. the date given was 1276 B. S. That chitta was not produced by the zamindar. Thereupon in order to enable the defendants to produce a copy of the chitta the contesting defendants filed an application on 22nd February 1926 for issuing summons on the landlord to produce the chitta of 1256. The Subordinate Judge after recording his reasons in O. 61 rejected the prayer. It is contended and reasonably contended that the Subordinate Judge was not right in rejecting the prayer for issuing the summons. It is well-known that the function of the civil Court in issuing summons is akin to that of a post office, and has no power to refuse issue of summons. The only thing that the Judge can do is not to adjourn a case for the purpose of the production of the witness who is sought to be summoned at a late stage of the case. In all such cases the parties get summons issued at their own risk. They have to pay the costs. The Judge may fix a date for the witness to come to the Court according to the prayer of the party who asked for the summons. The case may be disposed of before that date. This is clearly a matter in the hands of the Judge, but in my opinion the Judge of a civil Court has no power to refuse to issue summons at any stage of the case. However, the point is whether there has been any miscarriage of justice on account of the refusal of the Subordinate Judge to issue summons on the putnidar for the production of that chitta. If the landlord did not produce the chitta the defendants might have produced a copy of the chitta in order to establish their case, and as a matter of fact they did produce a paper which the witness who produced it professed to be a copy of the chitta. But during the course of his examination he could not say that it was a true copy of the chitta, which was compared with the original, and therefore the learned Judge did not accept it in evidence. It was further contended during the course of the argument that the document that was sought to be produced was not a copy but it was an original document. That was, however, not what the witness who produced the document said, nor was the proper custody of this document proved because the man who produced the document simply said that his father was a Morol and the document was with him and after his father it came into his possession. It used to be produced by him to settle any dispute between the villagers. That, however, does not make it a true copy of the original chitta and in my opinion the learned Judge rightly rejected that document. That chitta it is contended if accepted in evidence would have proved that in the chitta the land in dispute was mentioned as the mela land of Pir Saheb.

Now coming back to the two questions which I have set forth above as argued on behalf of the appellants, it appears that the defendants' witness admitted that this land was within the geographical limits of the zemindari as well as within the putni. This was stated by Khorshed Sardar, defendants' witness 1 and who appears to be a principal person on the side of the defendants. He says that the land in suit is towards the south-west of village Seranga, the proprietor is the Burdwan Maharaja and Tulsi Babu is the putnidar whose ancestors dedicated these moujas to Gopalji. That being so no further evidence was necessary to establish that the lands are within the putni moujah. Further more the thak map of the moujah has been produced in this case and the boundary of the moujah runs along the river which is also the southern boundary of the land in dispute. This fact being established the entire burden of proof that this is Lakheraj Pirattar land shifts on the defendants, and on their side there is no evidence whatsoever except the holding of the mela once a year and the allegation that it is called Pir Saheb's land. As I have already stated there is a conflict of testimony as regards the realization of the profits of the mela. The Subordinate Judge has accepted the evidence that the profits of the mela were realized by Motilal and his successors after him and I do not see any reason to disagree from his view of the evidence. But in any case the mere holding of a mela for a few days in the year from what is known as Makar Sankranti day, even assuming that the mela was held at the instance of the Fakirs who looked after the foundation of the Pir Saheb, would not prove their title. They might have a right to hold the mela at the stated time if they had actually held the mela. On the other hand it is a fact that no Road Cess Return was filed by the defendants with regard to this land, no cesses paid and there is nothing to show except the bare statement of defendants' witnesses that this land is the lakheraj land of the Pir Saheb. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary to go again over the grounds of the judgment of the Subordinate Judge on this question and I agree with his conclusion that the property belongs to the putnidar and he was entitled to grant a lease of it and that it was not the lakheraj property of the Pir Saheb.

With regard to the second question, whether the disputed lands were included in the plaintiff's pattah or not, it has been found by the Subordinate Judge that the pattah mentioned the lands in suit as the mela lands and the Subordinate Judge held that for over 50 years the mela land has been in the possession of Motilal and thereafter of his son-in-law on behalf of Moti Lal's heirs. That is one matter of identification. Another piece of evidence which the Subordinate Judge has not noticed but which has been pointed out to us by the learned advocate for the plaintiff-respondent, is, that one of the witnesses for the defendants Sukhamay Bakshi took lease of the lands by two kabuliats from the landlord Exs. 11 and 18, one in 1916 and the other in 1920. These lands were situated on two sides of the disputed land to the east and to the west, and giving the boundaries of these two plots, the land in dispute has been described as the land of the Sircars. That is also a link connecting the Sircars' pattah with the land in dispute. The points which have been argued before us are therefore of no substance and this appeal must therefore stand dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 406 of 1926, Decided on 26th June 1928, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Chittagong, D/- 10th September 1925.

Bengal Tenancy Act, Ss. 49 (b) and 85—Suit for ejectment—Solenama in previous suit enhancing rent allowing defendants to continue generation after generation—Solenama created new lease and so was compulsorily registrable but registration was barred under S. 85—Embodying the lease in decree does not make difference in application of Registration Act, S. 17 (1) (d).

The plaintiffs who were raiyats sued the defendants under-raiyats, in ejectment on service of a notice to quit under S. 49. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiffs were not entitled to evict him relying upon a decree passed on the basis of a solenama in a previous suit for rent which the plaintiffs had instituted against him. By the solenama, the plaintiffs in consideration of an enhancement of rent, consented to allow him to hold this land permanently.

Held: that as it was not a term of the solenama that the defendant had the right to hold from generation to generation or that any such existing right was being admitted by it, it was impossible to escape from the conclusion that the solenama created a new lease in respect of land which the defendant held from before. It would not be operative as a lease unless it was registered under S. 17, sub-S. (1), Cl. (d), Registration Act, but S. 85, Cl. (2), Ben. Ten. Act, bars its registration. The fact that this lease was embodied in a decree did not make it any the more operative as a lease because S. 17, sub-S. (2), Cl. (6) excepts documents falling within Cls. (b) and (c) and not Cl. (d) of sub-S. (1): A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 913 and A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 451 (F. B.), Rel. on; A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 666, Ref. [P 463 C 2] dant holds under them as an under-raiyat sued the latter in ejectment on service of a notice to quit under S. 49, Ben. Ten. Act. The defendant denied the service of the notice and pleaded that the plaintiffs are not entitled to evict him. He rested his case upon a decree passed on the basis of a solenama in a previous suit for rent which the plaintiffs had instituted against him. By the solenama, the plaintiffs in consideration of an enhancement of rent,—his case being that the rent previously payable was Rs 17 and it was enhanced to Rs. 25 and odd,—consented to allow him to hold this land permanently. The trial Court dismissed the suit, holding that service of the notice was not proved and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to ignore the solenama. The Subordinate Judge on appeal has reversed that decision and decreed the suit. The defendant has appealed to this Court. The Subordinate Judge has found for the plaintiffs on the question of service of the notice. This finding sets that matter at rest.

As regards the solenama and the decree, the Subordinate Judge has observed that a compromise decree is none the less a contract, and treating it as such he has held in substance that as in the solenama it was stated that the plaintiffs had raiyati right and the defendant dar-raiyati right, the lease that was created by the solenama came within the purview of the first of the three propositions laid down in the Full Bench decision of this Court in the case of Chandra Kanta Nath v. Amjad Ali Haji (1).

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the view taken by the Subordinate Judge was erroneous and he relies for this contention upon two decisions of this Court, one in the case of Jagadish Chandra Mukerji v. Rasik Mondal (2), and the other an unreported case, viz., the decision in S. A. No. 506 of 1924, dated 21st April 1926. The respondents, on the other hand, rely on the case of Rajani Kanta Banerjee v. Raj Kumari Dasi (3).

The decree in the rent suit recites that the suit is decreed between the parties in accordance with the terms of the solenama. The material terms of the solenama were as follows: That the possession of the defendant in the lands would continue as before on the defendant paying a rent inclusive of cess, etc., of Rs. 25 and odd; that on the defendant giving the plaintiffs a goat at the time of the Saradiya Puja a deduction of Rs. 2-8 would be allowed from the rent; that the defendant would hold as under-raiyat under the raiyati of the plaintiffs; that the defendant would continue to hold the land from generation to generation on payment of such rent; that, in case of default damages would have to be paid at four annas per rupee; that no payment would be valid except on dakhilas, etc., etc. The defendant's case is that the rent that he used to pay before was Rs. 17 and a new rent was fixed by the solenama. It is not a term of the solenama that the defendant had the right to hold from generation to generation from before or that any such existing right was being admitted by it. It is, therefore, impossible to escape from the conclusion that the solenama created a new lease in respect of land which the defendant held from before. It would not be operative as a lease unless it was registered under S. 17, sub-S. (1), Cl. (d), Registration Act, but S. 85, Cl. (2), Ben. Ten. Act bars its registration. The fact that this lease was embodied in a decree did not make it any the more operative as a lease because S. 17, sub-S. (2), Cl. (6) excepts documents falling within Cls. (b) and (c) and not Cl. (d) of sub-S. (1) of S. 17: see Rajani Kanta Banerjee v. Raj Kumari Dasi (3). The case also comes directly within the first of the propositions laid down by the Full Bench in the case of Chandra Kanta Nath v. Amjad Ali Haji (1), and there is no estoppel.

The two cases relied upon by the appellant appear to have overlooked the distinction that there is between a document coming under Cl. (d) and one coming under Cl. (b) or Cl. (c), sub-S. (1), S. 17, when incorporated in a decree. The decree did not declare any rights, but merely superadded to the contract between the parties the command of a Judge, and it did not take the rights of the parties any further than the contract itself. In the said two cases something has been said as to the solenama having been used for proving an admission. In the solenama before us there was, as already stated, no admission of any exist-

Fishery—No permanent right to, unless grant was express, implied or customary—Mere recording of such right in chitta does not prove permanent or lost grant.

In order that there should be a permanent right of fishing it is necessary that there should be a grant or that it should be possible to hold that a grant was implied. Mere recording in the Government chitta that certain persons have been given settlement of fishing rights does not prove that there was a permanent grant, nor does it lead to the presumption of a lost grant. It should be shown that it was at least the practice of Government to give permanent leases of fishing rights.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the defendants in a suit relating to fishery rights in a portion of a khal. The plaintiffs claim to have fishing rights over a certain area, which has been recorded in the Record-of-Rights of the year 1898 as being in the khas possession of the defendant, who are the landlords. The khal lies within the khas mehal, of which the defendants are temporary settlement-holders under Government. The plaintiffs alleged that they had been dispossessed in 1923 by certain persons set up by the defendants to fish in the khal. The first Court held that the plaintiffs had tenant-right in the fishery on a portion of the khal claimed by them. The second Court has declared the right of the plaintiffs to fish in the whole of that part of the khal, and it also declared that their rights are permanent.

An objection is taken in appeal to the declaration that the plaintiff's right is permanent. The learned Judge has given no satisfactory reason for coming to the finding that the tenancy of the plaintiffs is permanent. He states that so far back as the year 1833 the predecessor of the plaintiffs was recorded in the Government chitta of the khas mehal as having settlement of the fishery to that portion of the khal, and that subsequently, in the chitta of the year 1869, the son of that previous settlement-holder was recorded as a fisherman with fishing rights. Apart from that there is nothing that the learned Subordinate Judge could find to support the finding arrived at by him. In order that there should be a permanent right it is necessary that there should be a grant or that it should be possible to hold that a grant was implied. Mere recording in the Government chitta that certain persons have been given settlement of fishing rights does not prove that there was a permanent grant, nor does it lead to the presumption of a lost grant. The plaintiffs should have shown that it was at least the practice of Government to give permanent leases of fishing rights. In the absence of some sort of evidence from which one can infer that the settlement of the predecessor of the plaintiffs could have been permanent, the inference drawn by the Subordinate Judge from the chitta cannot be supported. The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the decree of the Subordinate Judge is modified to this extent that the fishery rights of the plaintiffs shall be declared not to be permanent. In other respects the decree of the lower appellate Court is confirmed. In the circumstances of the case we make no order as to costs in this appeal.

* (a) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 57—Object of Attachment before judgment does not come to end because subsequent application for execution proved infructuous—Civil P. C., O. 38, R. 11.

Order 21, R. 57, was intended to provide a remedy for the grievance or inconvenience which is apt to arise, where, after an attachment in execution, the application for execution cannot further be proceeded with by reason of the decree-holder's default. And it is no part of the intention of this rule to say that an attachment before judgment, which existed before any application could be made in execution, and which prima facie would continue to have effect if no application for execution had been made, should fall to the ground merely because a subsequent application for execution has come to nothing: 16 C. * (c) Civil P. C., O. 38, R. 11—Attachment before judgment does not merge in subsequent attachment.

The attachment before judgment does not merge in the subsequent attachment and become subject to all the infirmities of the subsequent attachment. The effect of two attachments on the same property is that the property is under attachment but a person entitled to the benefit of either one of the attachments, remains, in the absence of abandonment, entitled to it. No doctrine of merger is applicable: A. I. R. 1924 Mad. 494, Diss. from. [P 467 C 2]

Radhabenode Pal and Bhupendra Kishore Basu—for Appellant.

Nasim Ali—for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—This is a second appeal by defendant 1 from the concurrent decisions of the Subordinate Judge of Nadia and the Munsif of Ranaghat. The plaintiff's suit was for a declaration of title to certain land, for ejectment of defendant 1 and for setting aside the purchase of the suit land by defendant 1 on 1929 C/59 & 60

12th May 1922, in execution of a decree against defendant 2. The plaintiff's claim is rested on a prior purchase made by him at a private sale on 29th September 1921, from defendant 2. The question between the parties turns upon whether or not, on the date of the plaintiff's purchase, the property was under attachment. The material dates are as follows:

The property was attached before judgment on 10th August 1919; a decree was passed on 10th June 1920; an appeal from the decree was dismissed on 9th February 1921; the decree-holder applied for execution on 14th June 1921; and took out a fresh attachment on 24th June 1921; this execution proceeding was ultimately dismissed for default on 6th September 1921; another application for execution was made on the 19th of that month.

This was the position at the date of the plaintiff's purchase. After the plaintiff's purchase, the decree-holder again took out a fresh attachment on 3rd December 1921, and the property was ultimately sold to the decree-holder on 12th May 1922. Defendant 1 is the heir of the decree-holder.

Now the question is whether the attachment before judgment made on 10th August 1919, was subsisting on 29th September 1921 notwithstanding that the application for execution brought on 14th June 1921, had been dismissed for default on 6th September. The Courts below have held that the attachment before judgment had by that time ceased to exist, that there had been a re-attachment on 24th June 1921, which, under R. 57, O. 21, Civil P. C., came to an end when the application for execution was dismissed on 6th September.

The defendant-appellant relies upon the case of Ganesh Chandra Adak v. Banwari Lal Roy (1). It does not appear from the report of that case that after the attachment before judgment the property had been re-attached in execution. But it was held that an attachment before judgment subsists for the purpose of a subsequent execution, notwithstanding that the first application for execution has been dismissed. It was said that the provisions of R. 57, O. 21, have no application to a case in which an order for attachment before judgment has been obtained. On behalf of the respondents, it is contended, first, that by re-attaching in execution, the decree-holder has waived or abandoned the attachment before judgment; secondly, that the attachment before judgment merges in the subsequent attachment; thirdly, that on a true construction of R. 57, O. 21, an attachment before judgment comes to an end when the application for execution is dismissed under that rule, fourthly, that in the present case, under the first application for execution a sale of the property had been held, though this did not ultimately proceed to completion by sale certificate and that the effect of that sale was to make the attachment before judgment an attachment in execution: Arunachalam Chetty v. Periaswami Servai (2).

On the third of these propositions, it is contended that Ganesh Chandra's case (1), was wrongly decided and that the decision of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Meyyappa Chettiar v. Chidambaram Chettiar (3), should be followed. This is a substantial point and we must carefully consider whether we ought to dissent from Ganesh Chandra's case (1) and refer this matter to a Full Bench!

In my opinion the decision in Ganesh Chandra's case (1) was right and I agree in the result arrived at by the dissenting judgments of Schawbe, C. J., and Wallis, J., in Meyyappa's case (3), though not in all the arguments which were adduced by them. R. 57, O. 21, was a new provision introduced in 1908. It is evident from the language of the rule itself, and it is still more evident from the circumstances under which it was passed, that it was intended to provide a remedy for the grievance or inconvenience which is apt to arise, where, after an attachment in execution, the application for execution cannot further be proceeded with by reason of the decree-holder's default. This was, and still is, a very common case. This decree-holder makes some informal arrangement to give the judgment-debtor time without obtaining full satisfaction of the decree, the application for execution is not further prosecuted; it is not withdrawn; neither party attends. In these circumstances, the object of the rule is to say that the Court must make either an order for adjournment or an order of dismissal. The reason why it was necessary to require the Court, if it did not adjourn a proceeding to a definite date, to dismiss the application for execution formally and definitely can be amply illustrated from the decided cases.

In the absence of a definite order of dismissal the files of the Courts became encumbered with a number of applications for execution which were waterlogged and derelict, and a practice arose whereby such applications were ordered to be "struck off." This was a practice not justified by the Code and in cases where attachments in execution had already been ordered, the question arose whether the effect of an order "striking off" was that the attachment made upon application for execution was itself struck off or whether it remained notwithstanding such an order. Many other awkward and important questions arose out of this practice and the object of R. 57 was to ensure that this illogical and inconvenient practice should be stopped. Applications for execution were to be definitely dismissed if they were not adjourned to a future date. The object of the last sentence in R. 57 is to settle the question whether, when the application in execution is dismissed, any attachment made under that application should fall to the ground or should subsist, and the legislature has provided that it is to fall to the ground. In these circumstances, it seems reasonably clear to me that it is no part of the intention of this rule to say that an attachment before judgment, which existed before any application could be made in execution, and which prima facie would continue to have effect if no application for execution had been made, should fall to the ground merely because a subsequent application for execution has come to nothing.

I quite agree with Courts-Trotter, J., in Meyyappa's case (3), that this is not a question of giving a strict construction to a penal provision. Still the phrase "attached in execution of a decree" can only be extended beyond its proper meaning by reason of an implication required by the object of the rule or else by showing very clearly that it is required by some other rule of a germane character. Prima facie the "mischief" of the rule involves no reference to attachments before judgment, A perusal of the judgments in the Madras case does not disclose to me any ground upon which it could be held that unless upon the dismissal for default of an application for execution the attachment before judgment shall come to an end the true intention of any other rule is interfered with. Indeed I do not gather that any of the judgments of the Judges who formed the majority in that case claims that any other rule necessitates this for its own sake. What is argued is that they throw light upon the meaning of R. 57. In this way they attribute to R. 57 a meaning which is foreign to its purpose.

Again by R. 11, O. 38, it is provided that "it shall not be necessary upon an application for execution to apply for a re-attachment of the property."

From this it is contended that, upon an application for execution being made, the attachment before judgment becomes an attachment in execution and nothing more, so as to be subject to all the infirmities of an attachment in execution. Doctrines of merger and other theories are ingrafted upon the simple language of the Code that it shall not be necessary to re-attach. By reason of this provision no execution based upon an attachment before judgment can be distinguished in validity or character from an execution based upon an attachment in execution unless indeed some particular enactment can be seen to be addressed to this distinction. There is, however, nothing in R. 11, O. 38, to give colour to the view that for the purposes of R. 57, O. 21 "attached in execution" is a phrase which covers attachment before judgment.

Upon the third contention of the plaintiff-respondent, I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of this Court in Ganesh Chandra's case (1), was correct and that there is no necessity to send this matter to a Full Bench.

As regards the other contentions, it seems to me that they have little substance. At one time it was the practice to re-attach in execution, although an attachment before judgment was subsisting. In Ramkrishna Das Surrowji v. Surfunnissa Begum (4), this practice was referred to by the Judicial Committee. The question is whether a re-attachment in execution, notwithstanding the terms of O. 38, R. 11, is of itself a waiver or abandonment of the attachment before judgment. I can see no ground for saying as a proposition of law that a man who does something which is not necessary must be taken to abandon any right. In this case there is neither an express abandonment nor any reason to suppose that abandonment was intended. It was indeed manifestly contrary to the interest of the decree-holder.

As regards the contention that the attachment before judgment merges in the subsequent attachment, and, therefore, becomes subject to all the infirmities of the subsequent attachment, I respectfully differ from the opinion expressed by Ramesam, J. in the Madras case (1). The effect of two attachments on the same property is merely that the property is under attachment, no doubt, but a person entitled to the benefit of either one of the attachments remains, in the absence of abandonment, entitled to it. No doctrine of merger seems to me to be in point.

As regards the respondent's fourth point, I fail to see why, because an ineffective sale was held under the first application for execution, it can be contended that the provisions of R. 57, O. 21, become applicable to an attachment before judgment. The provisions of R. 11, O. 38, may well operate to prevent its being said that a sale in execution of a decree is without any basis of attachment in execution, even although the decree-holder has availed himself in execution of the attachment before judgment. This argument appears to me to be subject to the same objection as applies to many of the arguments adduced in the judgments in Meyyappa's case (3). It ignores the scope and purpose of the rule which is to be interpreted, namely R. 57, O. 21.

In my opinion this appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for defendant 1 with costs in all Courts against the plaintiff.

Mukerji, J.—I fully concur and desire to add a few words as regards the three cases of this Court upon which reliance has been placed on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent to induce us to dissent from the view taken in the case of Ganesh

(4) [1830] 6 Cal. 129=7 I. A. 157=1 Sar. 151 (P. O.).

Chandra Adak v. Banwari Lal Ray (1). One of those cases in Bhugwan Chunder Kritiratna v. Chunāra Mala Gupta (5). In that case the question that arose was whether, under S. 285, Civil P. O. (Act 14 of 1882), the Court which attached the property under execution before judgment, ranked with a Court which attached it after decree, in the application of that section and it was held that it did. The only relevancy of this decision is that in the section aforesaid the words "has been attached in execution" occurred, which, however, have been altered to "is under execution" in the corresponding section, namely S. 63 of the present Code, for reasons which have no bearing upon the present question. The next case is Sewdut Roy v. Sree Canto Maity (6), which only favours the view that, on an application for execution being made, attachment effected before judgment became an attachment in execution for the purposes of S. 295, Civil P. C. (Act 14 of 1882). The two attachments may be treated as on the same footing and persons who are affected by such attachment may be in the same position so long as the attachments subsist, but from that it hardly follows that all the incidents relating thereto must necessarily be identical. Indeed the Code itself treats them as different in several important respects. As regards the remarks of Mookerjee, J. in the third case, on which reliance has been placed, namely, that of Protap Chandra Gope v. Sarat Chandra (7), they appear to be obiter, as the case itself was one in which no question of attachment before judgment arose. The remarks are in these words :

"In a case of attachment before judgment, the general rule applies that a revival of execution proceedings does not operate as a revival of the attachment so as to prejudice the rights of strangers who have, in the interval, acquired a title to the property": Patringa Koer v. Madhava Nand Ram (8) and Mahabharat Dutta v. Surja Kanta De (9).

The remarks do not necessarily indicate that an attachment before judgment falls with the dismissal of an execution petition for default, and the cases on which they purport to rely had nothing to do with such an attachment. In this Court, the case of Ganesh Chandra Adak v. Banwari Lal Ray (1), does not appear to have been dissented from. I have carefully read the judgments of the learned Judges of other Courts who have taken a different view, but I am not convinced that we should dissent from the view that has been uniformly taken by this Court for a fairly long time.

Criminal Revn. No. 1142 of 1928, Decided on 8th March 1929, against order of Dist. Magistrate, Faridpur, D/- 11th October 1928.

* Criminal P. C., S. 145—Court is not confined to police report in starting proceedings, nor bound to rely on the whole of it.

Though it is the imminence of a breach of the peace as disclosed in the police report which creates jurisdiction under S. 145, it cannot be held that the Magistrate is confined within the four corners of the report. It is his duty upon all the material before him to decide whether proceedings under S. 145 are necessary or not. And even if the Magistrate relies on the police report for starting proceedings under S. 145, he need not rely on the whole of it. The Magistrate is not bound to accept the version given by the police beyond what he requires for the support of his order under S. 145. If he is satisfied from the police report that there is a likelihood of a breach of the peace concerning any land, he is entitled to draw up proceedings without accepting the truth of the whole of the police report: *A. Nirmal Chandra Chakrabarty—for Opposite Party.

Graham, J.—This rule was issued to show cause why certain proceedings under S. 145. Criminal P. C. should not be quashed. The main ground which has been urged before us is that inasmuch as the police report disclosed the fact that the first party was in possession of the land, and that the second party were aggressors and were trying to disturb his possession, the learned Magistrate had no jurisdiction to make an order under S. 145, and that the proper course for him to adopt was to issue an injunction under S. 144, Criminal P. C., or to bind down the second party under S. 107, Criminal P. C. We have been referred to some decided cases in support of this contention and amongst them to a recent decision of our own in W. Stewart v. Hubert Hughes (1). The facts of that case are distinguishable from the present as the police report itself plainly showed that there was and had been for some time no immediate apprehension of a breach of the peace but only a possibility of such breach at some future date.

The real question here is whether the materials contained in the police report were sufficient to justify the order drawing up the proceedings, and whether taken as a whole they gave rise to an apprehension that a breach of the peace might occur. On behalf of the petitioner stress has been laid upon that portion of the report which states that the second party did not claim the land, and upon a later passage stating that in the opinion of the Sub-Inspector the first party was in possession and that Sabed Sardar, a member of the second party, was the engineer of all the goimals, that he had no land in the disputed plot but hoped to get some land through Kuram Khan by creating possession by force.

Now in the first place, it is to be observed that while the trend of the decisions is that it is the imminence of a breach of the peace as disclosed in the police report which creates jurisdiction, it cannot in my opinion be held that the Magistrate is "cabined, cribbed and confined" so to speak, within the four corners of the report. It is his duty upon all the material before him to decide whether proceedings under S. 145, are necessary or not. The words in the section are:

"is satisfied from a police report or other information that a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace exists concerning any land etc."

The foundation of his jurisdiction is not, therefore, solely the police report, and it would manifestly be wrong that his power to take action should be made dependent upon the opinion of the Sub-Inspector of police. Speaking for myself, I am certainly not prepared to subscribe to the proposition in its extreme form that it is the police report and the police report alone which gives jurisdiction. Even so, however, and looking to the police report which was submitted in this case, what do we find? It is stated therein that from the past records it appeared that there was long standing enmity between the parties in respect of their neighbouring lands and the land in dispute and that several criminal cases had been instituted and disposed of. It is true as I have already said above that the report mentions that the second party did not claim the land. Then further on the report states that on enquiry the Sub-Inspector learnt that there was an actual immediate serious apprehension of a breach of the peace by the second party. Finally he says that under the circumstances he prays that an immediate injunction may be issued under S. 144, Criminal P. C., against the second party as a serious apprehension of a breach of the peace is apprehended. The Magistrate after having perused this report considered that the proper course was to draw up proceedings under S. 145, and he accordingly did so. It appears to me that this report undoubtedly does disclose that there appeared to be a reasonable apprehension of a breach of the peace. It is true that the Sub-Inspector has expressed his personal opinion that one of the parties was in possession and that the other was merely trying to oust him. But taking the report as a whole it seems to me that it cannot be said that the Magistrate was not justified in drawing up the proceedings.

There is one other matter which may be mentioned and it is this: that the learned Magistrate also appears to have based his decision to some extent upon a map which was filed in connexion with the original case under S. 145. The learned advocate for the petitioner has pointed out that this map is not on the record, and has urged that it could not have been before the Magistrate at the time when he drew up the proceedings. But this map has been referred to in the explanation which was submitted by the trying Magistrate to the District Magistrate, and it may fairly be presumed I think that it was before the Magistrate when he made his order. No doubt the map was in the record of the previous case under S. 145; and it seems probable that the record of that case was called for and perused by the Magistrate before he made the order which is complained of. Having regard to all the facts and circumstances of the case and the materials on the record in my judgment the order was a legal and proper order and the rule should be discharged.

Suhrawardy, J.—I agree. The facts seem to be that a police report was submitted to the Magistrate in which it was stated that there was a likelihood of a breach of the peace inasmuch as the first party was in possession of certain lands from which the second party was attempting to dispossess them. Against this report of the police there was a protest or narazi petition filed in which the correctness of the police report that the first party was in possession was disputed. The second party in fact claimed to be in possession of the land in dispute. This narazi petition appears to have reached the Magistrate before he had drawn up proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. On these materials before him he drew up the proceedings. It cannot be said that he had not sufficient materials before him to apprehend that there was a dispute concerning any "land within the local limits of his jurisdiction." It seems to have been argued on behalf of the petitioner that if the Magistrate relied on the police report for starting proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., he must rely on the whole of it. I cannot agree with this construction. The words are "a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace concerning any land and so." If one party is in possession and the other is trying to dispossess him, it is a dispute concerning land. But it would be a sound exercise of discretion if the Magistrate has reason to believe that one party is in possession to pass prohibitory order against the party which is trying to disturb the peaceful possession of the other party. Ganpat Singh v. Emperor (2) and Emperor v. Ram Baran Singh (3). But I am not prepared to go so far as to hold in such a case that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to start proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. It may be more proper to take preventive proceedings under S. 145, even in such a case and maintain the party in possession than to bind the other party under S. 107, Criminal P. C. In my opinion, the Magistrate is not bound to accept the version given by the police beyond what he requires for the support of his order under S. 145. If he is satisfied from the police report that there is a likelihood of a breach of the peace concerning any land he is entitled to draw up proceedings without accepting the truth of the whole of the police report. In this case in my opinion there were sufficient materials before the Magistrate to hold that there was likelihood of a breach of the peace and the question of possession of the land in dispute was not so clear as to compel the Magistrate to take action under S. 144, or S. 107, Criminal P. C. Let the record be sent down.

Pramatha Nath Roy and others — Plaintiff—Respondents.

Appeal No. 645 of 1927, Decided on 7th March 1929, against appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, 24 Parganas, D/- 19th November 1926.

(a) Civil P. C., S. 152—Consent decree.

An application under S. 152 to amend the consent decree on the ground of fraud is entirely outside the section. [P 471 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C., S. 151—Amendment of decree on ground of fraud — Separate suit will lie — S. 151 cannot be invoked.

If a party desires to have a consent decree amended or vacated upon the ground that it was fraudulently procured his proper course, and indeed his only course, is to proceed by separate suit for the purpose. There is no justification for invoking S. 151 at all. [P 472 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the appellant, J. C. Galstaun, was defendant in title suit No. 3 of 1918 in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Alipore. The case had reference to certain land situate to the south of premises belonging to the appellant and was settled in terms of a petition of compromise filed on 28th November 1918.

Reading the petition of compromise as it now stands, and as it stood on the date of the decree, the first word of the third line on the third page is the word "whole" and the effect of the petition so read has been held to be that while the respondents were to give certain land to the appellant the appellant was to give in exchange an equal quantity of land from the land abutting certain roads, but if this land of the appellant was not sufficient to equalize in area the land which the appellant was to receive, then the appellant would pay for the whole of the land which he was to receive at a certain price. The respondent's contention is that the word "whole" in the place where it occurs as above mentioned has been substituted for the word "balance" the real bargain between the parties being that the appellant was to give to the respondents from his land enough to equalize in area the land which he was to receive, but that if he had not enough land at the place specified he should give what he had and pay the respondents for the balance. It appears that the land which the appellant was to get by this exchange was an area of about  $8\frac{3}{4}$  cottas and that the land which the appellant had at the place above-mentioned was short of that area by about two cottas.

The respondents, as plaintiffs, made an application in execution to enforce the consent decree, and it appears that they contended, first that the word "whole" should be "balance" and secondly that even if the consent decree were read as it stands the true meaning and intent thereof was to the effect that the appellant should give all the land he had at the place mentioned and should pay for the shortage only. The execution matter came before this Court on appeal and it was determined between the parties that as the decree stood its true construction was that the present appellant was to pay money compensation for the entire  $8\frac{3}{4}$  cottas. The Court, however, took notice of the fact that the present respondents were contending that the compromise petition had been fraudulently tampered with and that the consent decree had been in this way fraudulently obtained by alteration of the word "balance" into the word "whole." The Court pointed out that such a question could not be raised in execution and went on to say that :

"any amendment on the ground that there was fraud in the matter must be made by the Court in the suit in which the decree was passed. It will be open to the Roys to make such application as may be necessary to the Court to make an enquiry in the matter."

The present respondent thereupon made an application before the learned Subordinate Judge for amendment of the decree alleging that the word "balance" had been fraudulently altered in the compromise petition. This application was not brought as an application in review under O. 47, Civil P. C.; indeed it was brought upon the eight anna Court-fee stamp whereas an application in review requires an ad valorem stamp of the same amount as the plaint. It would appear to have been contended by the present respondents that the application was brought under S. 152, Civil P. C., but it is clear that the case made is entirely outside that section. S. 151 has also been put forward as a section which governs and authorises the application for amendment of this consent decree upon the ground that the decree as it stands had been fraudulently obtained.

Accordingly, when the present appellant appealed to the District Judge against the order amending the decree he was made to face a preliminary objection on the part of the respondents to the effect that no appeal lay from the order complained of. He did his best to persuade the District Judge that as an order amending consent decree was, when made on contest, much the same in effect as an order directing after contest that an adjustment of suit be recorded under O. 23, R. 3, Civil P. C., one appeal at least should be given to him as it is given to a party against whom it has been held that a suit has been adjusted. This argument from analogy was not accepted by the District Judge who further held that under S. 96 of the Code, it was not possible to appeal from a consent decree. As O. 43, of the Code does not specify orders made under S. 151 of the Code as being orders from which an appeal shall lie, the appeal to the District Judge was rejected as incompetent.

It appears to me that in these circumstances, it is necessary to examine the propriety of the procedure adopted by the respondents in this case. The order of the Subordinate Judge not only affects the proprietorship of some 6 cot-tas of land in Calcutta but also convicts the appellant of fraud, and indeed of a very grave fraud, not lacking in incidents which would bring it within the scope of the criminal law. If the appellant is to be told that there is no appeal whatever from this decision it is a serious matter for him. Even if the case could be regarded as within O. 23, R. 3, the appellant's right would be restricted to an appeal to the District Judge as no second appeal lies from an order made under this rule cf. S. 104, Sub-S. (2), Civil P. C. :

Now, it appears to me that if a party desires to have a consent decree amended or vacated upon the ground that it was fraudulently procured, his proper course and indeed his only course, is to proceed by separate suit for the purpose. The matter is certainly grave enough to deserve a separate suit. The questions which have to be decided are entirely different from those at issue in the original suit. The relief sought is a very well recognized form of relief appropriate to a suit. In English practice it is old law that a fresh action is necessary to set aside a consent decree upon the ground of fraud and that such relief is not properly sought in an action of review. It appears to me that S. 152 of the Code which is confined to clerical or arithmetical mistakes and to an accidental slip or omission, is based upon this general principle, and that S. 151 is in no way intended as a violation of that principle. If the relief can be properly obtained in a separate suit, it does not appear that there is any justification for invoking S. 151 at all.

Now a leading case in this Court upon this subject is the case of Mt. Gulab Kuer v. Badshah Bahadur (1), in which numerous decisions are considered. The authorities in this Court are not uniform, but putting the matter at the highest in favour of the respondents, it may be said that there is some difference of opinion upon the question whether, and in what circumstances, a consent decree may be reviewed under O. 47 of the Code. It was said in that case that "while it must be conceded that a large preponderance of authority is against the contention that a consent decree can not on any ground be challenged upon an application for review of judgment, there is no foundation for the suggestion that there is a preponderance of authority in favour of the contention that a consent decree may be reviewed on the ground of fraud."

The main proposition decided in that case was that a party who had applied unsuccessfully under O. 47 for review of a consent decree on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud was entitled, notwithstanding his failure, to prosecute a remedy by suit. This decision was contrary to a previous decision in the case of Ram Gopal v. Prasanna Kumar (2), and I desire to reserve my opinion upon the point. In Mt. Gulab Koer's case (1) it was pointed out that there are weighty reasons why a regular suit should be regarded as a more appropriate remedy in such cases. Now, I desire to say that in my opinion it is not competent under O. 47 to obtain a review of a consent decree on the ground that the consent decree was obtained by fraud. It appears to me that before such a doctrine can be taken as authorized by the Code it is very necessary to lay one's finger upon some enactment which is clearly intended to make so large and inconvenient an exception to the general principles which govern this matter. R. 1, O. 47, after speaking of a case where a party has discovered new and important matter which was not within his knowledge or could not be produced by him at the time when the decree was passed and of mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, introduces the words "or for any other sufficient reason." In Chajju Ram v. Neki (3) the Judicial Committee had occasion to point out that these words were not unlimited and must be taken to point to a reason which is sufficient on grounds at least analogous to those mentioned in the rule. It appears to me that if mistake or error is prima facie intended to be beyond the scope of the rule unless the mistake or error be apparent on the face of the record, it is curious, to say the least of it, that a party should employ this procedure for the purpose of making out a contentious case of fraud. In my opinion the correct doctrine under the Code of Civil Procedure is in no way different upon this point from that which is laid down for England in Daniels' Chancery Practice, 8th Edn. 709. The authorities in this Court to the contrary are neither numerous nor impressive and have not infrequently been challenged : cf. Barhamdeo Prasad v. Banarsi Prasad (4). On principle and as a matter of construction of O. 47 of the Code I approve of the view taken in Ram Lagan v. Ram Brich Koer (5), and were it necessary I should desire to refer the matter to a Full Bench.

In the present case, however, the applicants themselves did not even take the precaution of applying by way of review and they succeeded before the District Judge in having the defendant's appeal dismissed as incompetent. Assuming it to be possible that we should now treat this matter as arising under O. 47 of the Code by giving leave to the respondents to pay the necessary Court-fees, I am clearly of opinion that we ought not to do so. The method which they have adopted is highly inappropriate to the circumstances of the case, and moreover so long as there is any room for argument to the effect that the applicants, should they fail in review, can proceed all over again by suit, I should be most unwilling to allow the amendment upon any terms.

It has been contended before us that because the Division Bench of this Court which heard the appeal brought from the order made in execution expressed itself as though the best course for the respondents was to make an application in the suit for amendment of the decree, the present appellant should be held bound by this expression of opinion and must sit down under the decision of the Subordinate Judge, however, disastrous its consequences may be to his business or to his reputation. I am of opinion that the remarks made by the Division Bench in the execution matter carry with them no legal consequence whatever and were in the nature of gratuitous advice.

In my judgment the correct course for us is to treat this appeal as an application under S. 115, Civil P.C., against the order of the Subordinate Judge and to set aside the whole of the proceedings upon the application for amendment of the decree. It may or may not be that the respondents, if they bring a suit, will get an allowance under the Limitation Act for the time which has been expended before the Subordinate Judge. It will be a part of our order that the respondents do pay to the appellant his costs of the proceedings before the Subordinate Judge and in this Court.

Appeal No. 498 of 1927, Decided on 7th May 1928, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Howrah, D/- 30th September 1929.

(a) Landlord and Tenant—Permanent tenancy—Pucca structure is not essential to establish permanent tenancy—Long possession at uniform rent—No attempt at ejectment—Several successions before passing of Transfer of Property Act—Inference of permanent tenancy is justified.

The existence of pucca structure is not essential in all cases in order to establish a permanent tenancy. Where there has been long possession at a uniform rent in a locality where the value of lands have enormously increased and no attempt at ejectment was made and there were several successions to the tenancy even before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act it is a legitimate inference that the tenancy was permanent : *A. A statement in the will made by tenant regarding the permanency of his tenancy may be regarded as one made in course of a transaction by which the property was bequeathed to the legatee under the will and consequently the statement made in the will may be taken as evidence under S. 13. [P 475 C 1]

(5) [1919] 4 Pat. L. J. 205=50 I. C. 497.

Mitter, J.—This is plaintiff's appeal and arises out of a suit in ejectment. Plaintiff's case is that the defendant holds under him the disputed land as a thika tenant at an annual rental of Rs 5-15-0 and that notice to quit was duly served upon him asking the defendant to vacate by the end of the Bengali year 1330 and that, as the defendant had not vacated the disputed land, the present suit was instituted. The defence of the defendant is that the land in suit is the land which he holds in permanent tenancy and at a fixed rental. He also raised the contention with regard to the validity and sufficiency of the notice. The Court of first instance held that the tenancy of the defendant was a precarious tenancy and as the notice was a six months' notice expiring by the end of the tenancy it was quite sufficient. The Munsif, accordingly, granted a decree to the plaintiff for khas possession of the land described in the plaint. An appeal was taken by the defendant to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Howrah who reversed the decision of the Munsif and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

Against this decision a second appeal has been taken to this Court and it has been argued by Mr. Chakravarti who has appeared for the appellant that the findings of fact arrived at by the lower appellate Court do not give rise to the legal inference that the tenancy of the defendant was a permanent tenancy. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the findings of the lower appellate Court. They may be summed up as follows: The defendant or his predecessor-in-title has been in possession of the disputed land for more than 80 years. They have been paying uniform rent at the rate of Rs. 5-15-0 per annum. The tenancy in question has devolved from heir to heir. There had been a hut in the land and there is also an existence of a tank on the land. The superior interest had passed by several transfers to the present plaintiff. There is no evidence that there was ever any pucca building or structure erected on the land, though the lands are situate within the Howrah Municipality and although the value of the land had been increasing for many years past, there never was any attempt made before by the landlord to increase the rent as to eject the tenant. "The land" says the Subordinate Judge:

"is now unoccupied for several years past owing no doubt, to the domestic circumstances under which defendant came to inherit it, but it is not questioned that Padmalochan lived on it by raising chapra sheds and by digging a tank."

The tank, according to the finding of the Subordinate Judge was excavated by Padmalochan, the original tenant. On these findings, the lower appellate Court has raised the inference that the tenancy was a permanent one. It has been argued on the authority of the case of Abdul Hakim Khan v. Elahi Baksha (1) that the facts found did not give rise to the legal inference of permanency of the tenancy. It is said that the existence of pucca structure is one of the essential conditions which is requisite to establish a permanent tenancy. As I read the decision in Abdul Hakim v. Elahi Baksha (1), I do not think that the learned Judges intended to lay down that the existence of pucca structure was essential in all cases in order to establish a permanent tenancy. It appears further in this case that there has been long possession at a uniform rent in a locality where, as has been pointed out by the lower appellate Court, the value of lands have enormously increased. That is an element which should be taken into consideration along with other facts in considering whether the rent was not increased or no attempt at ejectment was made because the landlord knew that the nature of the tenancy was permanent. The facts of this case fall within the purview of the recent decision of this Court in the case of Bireswar Mookherji v. Troilokhya Dasi (2). It is to be noticed that, before the passing of the Transfer of property Act, an ordinary tenancy was not heritable and as admittedly there have been several successions in the present case, the inference is legitimate that the tenancy was a permanent tenancy. If the land was held on a thika tenancy there is every reason to suppose that when the value of the land increased abnormally the same rent might not have been continued for a large number of years. In cases of this description no inflexible rule can be laid down and each case must depend on its own facts. There is a further element in this case which requires consideration.

(2) [1926] 30 C. W. N. 709.

A will was executed by Padmalochan in which he described this land as a mokarrari mourasi one with a rental of Rs.5-15-0 per annum. This will was mentioned in the written statement of the defendant and it is said that there is no evidence on behalf of the plaintiff to show that he was not cognizant of the statements made in this will. It is true that the defendant has not established that the statement in the will was brought home to the knowledge of the landlord. But some inference adverse to the landlord can be made from the circumstance that although the will was mentioned in the written statement and it was made an exhibit in the case and the probate of will was produced in the case and yet the plaintiff did not say in his deposition in Court that he was not cognizant of the contents of the will of which probate had been taken. There is this fact that after the death of Padmalochan when the will became operative, the plaintiff had been taking rent from the legatee who happened to be his son. It is said that no inference should be drawn from this circumstance for if this will had not been executed, the land in question would have devolved under the Hindu law on his son and there is some force in this contention. The fact remains, however, that the son got this property under the will and the statement in the will may be regarded as one made in course of a transaction by which this property was bequeathed to the legatee under the will and consequently the statement made in the will may be taken as evidence under S. 13, Evidence Act. In the circumstances, we think that the lower appellate Court was right in drawing the conclusion that the tenancy was a permanent tenancy.

Mr. Chakravarti has, however, strenuously contended that there is a conflict between the case Abdul Hakim v. Ellahi Baksha (1) and the case Bireswas Mookerji v. Sm. Troilokhya Dasi (2). I do not think, however, that there is any real conflict for it does not appear from the report of the case of Abdul Hakim v. Ellahi Baksha (1), that this element of increase of the value of the land existed in that case; it does not appear in that case that no attempt was made either to eject the tenant or to enhance his rent notwithstanding the increased value of land. I do not think, therefore, that we should be justified in referring the case to a Full Bench. Taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, I think that the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge is right and must be affirmed. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 696 of 1926, Decided on 20th June 1928, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Khulna, D/- 11th September 1925.

Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 17—Appellant absent—Appeal cannot be decided on merits.

By the words "the Court may make an order that the appeal be dismissed" it is meant that the Court may dismiss the appeal or may adjourn it to some other date or pass other order, but the Court is not authorized to consider an appeal in the absence of the appellant and decide it on merits. The law contemplates that the appellate Court must hear both parties to the appeal and then decide it according to its judgment. [P 476 C 1]

Judgment.—There are two plaintiffs in this suit, which is for khas possession of land on the ground of abandonment and transfer of a non-transferable occupancy holding by the original tenant. The trial Court found that so far as plaintiff 1's interest was concerned there was an abandonment and unauthorized transfer. As to plaintiff 2, it found that he had recognized the transferee as a tenant and accordingly it passed a decree in favour of plaintiff 1 for joint possession with the defendant and dismissed plaintiff 2's suit. The defendant appealed and plaintiff 2 cross-appealed or to be more precise filed a cross-objection. On 26th August 1925, the appellate Court passed an order that the pleaders must get ready on the date fixed, namely, 9th September 1925. On 9th, the following order was passed:

"The respondent's pleader does not appear, though he was assured that the appeal would be heard to-day. The appellant heard. Judgment to-morrow."

On 10th, judgment was postponed till the next day, and on 11th, the learned Subordinate Judge passed the judgment appealed against. He dismissed the defendant's appeal and then proceeded to consider plaintiff 2's cross-objection on the merits, although no one was present on his behalf and found that the view of the Munsif that plaintiff 2 recognized the defendant as a tenant was wrong: and, in the result, he dismissed the defendant's appeal, allowed the cross-objection and decreed the entire suit. The appeal is on behalf of the defendant and the only point that is taken before us is that the Subordinate Judge was not justified in deciding the cross-objection of plaintiff 2 when no one appeared on his behalf. This contention has a good deal of substance in it. Under O. 41, R. 17, if the appellant does not appear and the appeal is called on for hearing, the Court may make an order that the appeal be dismissed. The previous Code contained the words "the appeal shall be dismissed."

This portion of the rule has been altered in the new Code in order to give jurisdiction to the appellate Court to pass such order as it thinks proper in the circumstances of the case other than dismissing the appeal and further to make the order of dismissal for default not open to appeal. By the words "the Court may make an order that the appeal be dismissed" it meant that the Court may dismiss the appeal or may adjourn it to some other date or pass other order, but it certainly does not authorize the Court to consider an appeal in the absence of the appellant and decide it on merits. It was not contemplated by the alteration in the rule to invest the Court with power to decide an appeal on the merits in the absence of the appellant and the reason is this. This appeal was not argued by appellant-plaintiff 2 and, therefore, there was no reply to the appellant's argument by the respondent, that is to say, defendant 1. The law contemplates that the appellate Court must hear both parties to the appeal and then decide it according to its judgment. That is the procedure laid down in O. 41, R. 30, Civil P. C. The procedure followed by the Court is wrong and the decree passed by it in favour of plaintiff 2 must, accordingly, be set aside. There are some points in this case which show the impropriety of deciding an appeal in the absence of the pleader for the appellant without giving an opportunity to the other side to reply to such statements as might have been made on behalf of the appellant. The memorandum of cross-objection on behalf of plaintiff 2 was filed on insufficient stamp. That question was not decided by the Court and it should not have been heard without its being properly stamped. Accordingly the order passed with regard to the Court-fee that the plaintiff should get khas possession in the entire lands on his depositing the Court-fee on the memorandum of cross-objection within three days is not the proper order to pass.

There is another point with reference to mesne profits. The Munsif said that no evidence had been given as to what would be the amount of mesne profits. But he gave plaintiff 1 liberty to bring a fresh suit for mesne profits. Now the Subordinate Judge has decreed the plaintiff's whole suit and ordered that mesne profits be ascertained by the lower Court. There is no reason given for it. Besides, as there was no appeal by plaintiff 1, against the order dismissing the claim for mesne profits, the Court was not justified in passing a decree in his favour with regard to mesne profits. All these irregularities are due to the Subordinate Judge taking upon himself to decide the case without having it argued before him by both sides. The decree in so far as it relates to the claim of plaintiff 2 must, accordingly, be set aside. Now the question is as to what order we should pass in this case. If the occurrence had taken place before us and if the appellant was informed of the date of hearing, but was not before the Court on that date the order which we would generally pass was to dismiss the cross-objection. That is the order which the lower appellate Court should have passed. We have jurisdiction to pass such an order in second appeal as we are responsible for the proper disposal of the case according to law.

As regards the defendant's appeal before the lower appellate Court it cannot be heard after the concurrent findings of the Courts below and that portion of the present appeal which relates to the interest of plaintiff 1 must stand dismissed with costs. The result is that this appeal is partially allowed, the decree of the lower appellate Court set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored with costs in all Courts against plaintiff 2.

Appeal No. 44 of 1928, Decided on 12th July 1928, against judgment of Costello, J., in Suit No. 534 of 1927.

(a) Administration—Suit for—Joining party for watching proceedings is a mistake—Civil P. C., O. 1, R. 10.

In an administration suit it is a mistake to make an order for a person to be a party for watching the proceedings. There is neither meaning nor purpose in such an order.

(b) Administration—Suit for—Order for costs should be so made as to relieve persons with unencumbered share—Civil P. C., S. 35.

The correct course in administration suits, when orders for costs are made, is to make them in such a form that the person who has not encumbered his share shall be relieved as far as possible in the matter of costs created by the fact that another cosharer has assigned or encumbered his share: *Greedy v. N. N. Sircar and A. C. Bantra—for Appellants.

B. L. Mitter, S. N. Bannerjee and B. K. Ghosh—for Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an application made by the present appellant before the learned Judge on the original side in the course of an administration suit to administer the estate of one Abraham Ezekiel Gubbay, who died in November 1906, the suit being brought in 1917. It appears that, with the exception of a certain wine business, the testator left all the properties to his executor upon a trust for conversion and for distribution, in the following shares: 7/16th to Ezekiel Abraham Gubbay, who was the executor; 4/16th to Nissim, who, in the administration suit, was the plaintiff; 3/16th to Elias; 1/16th to Seemah and 1/16th to Joseph. In the end, by various assignments, Ezekiel became entitled, in his own right, to 11/16th share absolutely of the fund and, by various transactions made between him and the appellants—the National Insurance Co., Ltd.—the present position is this: The appellants are in the position of mortgagees as regards 11/16th share, where the equity of redemption is in the estate of Ezekiel, who has become insolvent and they are in the position of being sub-mortgagees of the 4/16th share of Nissim. This application was made to enable the appellants to be made parties to the suit and they also asked that they might have the carriage of the proceedings under the order, dated 26th November 1924, directing the sale of certain properties belonging to the estate. It appears that the suit has been going on for a very long time and the order for sale was made almost four years ago. It does not seem as if the parties had been prosecuting the order for sale with any great diligence, because, although the order was completed in January 1925, and summons was taken out on behalf of the unencumbered share of Joseph amounting to 1/16th in March 1926, nothing practically had been done till the time when this application was brought on. In these circumstances, the learned Judge made an order to the effect that the applicants should be added to the suit as party defendants, but he qualified that with various words, to say:

“for the purpose of watching the proceedings in this suit on the condition that the applicant do pay its own costs and be not entitled to any costs as against any of the other parties to this suit: And it is further ordered that the said applicant shall pay its own costs and shall not be at liberty to add its costs of and incidental to this application to its claim as such mortgagee and sub-mortgagee as aforesaid.”

The first question is whether or not the appellants should be made parties to this administration suit. It appears to me to be a mistake to make an order for a person to be a party “for watching the proceedings.” I see neither meaning nor purpose in such an order. In my judgment, the appellants who have sufficiently shown in this case that they have an interest to the extent of 15/16th share in the property ought to be allowed to become parties to the proceedings in order that there may not be any delay in carrying out the order for sale. I have no doubt, therefore, that the words "for the purpose of watching the proceedings in this suit" ought not to be present in this order.

As regards the conditions as to costs: It seems to me that the argument of the appellants is right. The position is that the share of Joseph which is entirely unencumbered ought not to be made to pay a larger share of the costs because another party has encumbered its own share. This appears to be a matter which has often been considered and we have been referred to the case of Greedy v. Lavender (1). In my judgment, there can be no doubt that the correct course, in such a case, when orders for costs are made, is to make them in such a form that the person who has not encumbered his share shall be relieved as far as possible in the matter of costs created by the fact that another cosharer has assigned or encumbered his share. The practice seems to be clearly enough laid down in the following passages in Daniell's Chancery Practice, 8th edn., p. 1075, to which we have been referred:

"Where a person entitled either to a legacy or share of a residue incumbers his legacy or share, or by any act of his own occasions additional expense in respect of it beyond what is necessary for the due administration of the estate, the additional expense will be thrown upon the legacy or share; and only one set of costs will be allowed out of the estate to the person entitled and his incumbrancers, and such costs will in general be made payable to the first incumbrancer, or to the incumbrancers in order of their priorities, and then to the person entitled. Where, however, each of the incumbrancers stood upon some portion of the share included in his incumbrance, the costs were directed to be divided among them equally."

It appears to me that, both as regards the present application and as regards any other future application, that is the principle which the Court would do well to apply. It is not, however, correct that an order should now be made purporting to govern or control future orders for costs, and as any order for costs is made, it will be for Joseph to represent to the Court that this principle is one which is to be applied and in that way to make sure that the Court administers this estate without throwing any improper burden on him. It is not necessary, in my opinion, that the present order should be qualified by a condition purporting to bind the hands of the Court as regards future orders for costs.

The next question is whether or not the second part of the prayer should be granted, namely, that the appellants should be given the carriage of the proceedings under the order for sale. It seems to me that this matter is very largely academical. It will be for the Registrar to effect the sale and so far as the questions of getting proper price, issuing sufficient advertisement, choosing suitable date and so forth are concerned, the matter will be in the hands of the Registrar. What it is necessary to make sure of, is that the person who shall be given the carriage of the proceedings under the order for sale will not make delay in perfecting the order and carrying it out. As to that matter, the position seems to be this: Neither Nissim nor indeed Joseph appears to have been particularly active in insisting upon the order for sale being carried out. Both of them had certain merits at different stages of the suit. Nissim got the order in November 1924, and it is noticeable that he has done nothing since then. In the same way, in March 1926, Joseph's attorney asked for the carriage of these proceedings. But he does not appear to have been prosecuting that matter since then with any particular diligence. We have to consider whether it would not be better that the carriage of these proceedings should be given to those mortgagees who presumably will desire to get back their money within a reasonable time. It is said that these mortgagees are amply secured. But that is no sufficient answer. As regards Nissim, it is said that he is the plaintiff and he has a possible chance—but that is not made out to my satisfaction—of getting something for himself if the sale is properly effected. As regards Joseph, the objection to him is that he is a lunatic, which does not, in itself, go very much against him. In my opinion, for the present purpose, the price to be fetched does not depend upon the person who should have the carriage of the proceedings. That will depend upon the efficiency of the Registrar at the sale. The main thing we ought to look at is to give the carriage of the proceedings to somebody who will carry them out forthwith without any chance of the matter being hung up for a year. On the whole, considering that the appellants have got interest to 15/16th of the property, it appears to me that the best course would be that they should have the carriage of the proceedings. They are given only the carriage of the proceedings under the order for sale. When the sale is effected and the money is brought in this order will have no effect.

As regards costs both before Costello, J., and of this Court, I think the proper order should be that Joseph and Nissim should get their costs out of the general estate and the appellants should add their costs to their mortgage. Costs will be taxed on scale 2 so far as applicable.

Appeal No. 1199 of 1926, Decided on 16th July 1928, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Mindapur, D/- 21st January 1923.

Practice—Judge—Proof of erasure of writing in absence of other party for private satisfaction of Judge is improper.

It is a thoroughly improper proceeding to have something done by a pleader to prove to the private satisfaction of the Court, that it is possible to remove writing from paper without leaving a trace of the writing having been there. The Court should have this performance done in Court and in the presence of the other side. [P 479 C 2]

Sarat Chandra Bose and Gopendra Nath Das—for Appellant.

Santosh Kumar Pal—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This appeal is by the plaintiff in a suit on a mortgage. The mortgagor had sold the mortgaged property to defendant 2, who contested the suit. His defence was that the mortgage had been satisfied. The mortgage bond was produced in Court by the plaintiff and it contains no endorsement of satisfaction. Defendant 2 stated to the Court that the bond had been shown to him by his vendor, that is to say, the mortgagor, defendant 1, at the time of the sale to him, and that at that time that bond contained an endorsement of satisfaction. Both the Courts below dismissed the suit, holding on certain oral evidence that the bond had been satisfied and the mortgage redeemed. The learned Munsif found that he had to explain away the fact that the mortgage bond produced in Court, the genuineness of which was not disputed, bore no endorsement of satisfaction. He, therefore, resorted to the thoroughly improper proceeding of having something done by a pleader, in the way of proof, to his private satisfaction that it was possible to remove writing from paper without leaving a trace of the writing having been there. The learned Munsif should have had this performance done in Court and in the presence of the other side. The learned Subordinate Judge entirely ignored this matter. Therefore, what one finds is that the learned Subordinate Judge, without explaining away a very serious circumstance, professed to rely, not on the testimony of his own eyes, but on the statement of witnesses who could lie. The question being one of fact, we must send this case back, so that the appeal may be reheard.

The judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court are set aside and the case is sent back to that Court for a rehearing. Costs in this appeal will abide the result, Criminal P. C., (5 of 1898), S. 253—Complainant not examined—Discharge order is irregular.

Failure to examine complainant before discharging accused is an error of law. Magistrate's personal knowledge that the complainant's witnesses were untrustworthy is no adequate reason for discharging the accused. [P 480 C 1]

Hem Chandra Dhar—for Petitioner.

Judgment.—This rule was issued calling upon the Chief Presidency Magistrate and the opposite party to show cause why an order of the 4th Presidency Magistrate, Northern Division, Calcutta, discharging the accused Purusattam Shah (now the opposite party) under S. 253, Criminal P. C., should not be set aside. The grounds on which the order is assailed are that the complainant was not examined and that the learned Magistrate ought not to have passed his order of discharge upon his own personal knowledge and certain matters which do not appear on the record; and that he ought to have held that a prima facie case was made out. In the explanation of the learned Magistrate he admits that there was an error of law inasmuch as the complainant was not examined and upon this ground alone the rule should be made absolute because it is clear that the complainant was entitled to have his evidence recorded. The Magistrate then goes on to observe that inasmuch as the prosecution witnesses 3 and 4 had been witnesses in other cases before him and as the modus operandi in those cases was similar to the modus operandi in the present case he viewed their evidence with suspicion. Finally he has observed that without the evidence of the prosecution witnesses 3 and 4 the prosecution case is hopeless, no matter whether the complainant is examined or not. It seems to us that the reasons which have been given for the order of discharge are quite inadequate. We accordingly make the rule absolute; set aside the order of discharge and direct a further enquiry according to law by a Magistrate other than the Magistrate whose order is complained of.

Mallik, J.—This Rule was issued on the District Magistrate of Dinajpur to show cause why the order of the District Judge of Dinajpur dismissing the petitioner's appeal against an order of the Munsif of Thakurgaon making a complaint against the petitioners under S. 476, Criminal P. C., should not be set aside. The rule was issued on two grounds : The first ground is that the judgment in appeal is not in accordance with law ; and the second ground is that the learned District Judge has failed to exercise jurisdiction vested in him by law in refusing in effect to exercise his own discretion in the matter and to revise the exercise of discretion by the Court of first instance, namely, the Munsif of Thakurgaon. The contention before us is that the learned District Judge when the matter came up on appeal before him under S. 476-B, Criminal P. C., did not approach in the way in which he should have approached it. It was said that under that section the learned Judge ought to have gone into the merits of the case as he was bound to do in all appeals before him. This contention seems to me to be well founded. As has been held in Ram Charan Das v. Emperor (1), the legislature intended that an appellate Court in cases of appeals under S. 476-B, Criminal P. C., should reconsider the entire matter on its merits. This the learned District Judge in the present case has not done. From his judgment it appears that according to him there were two distinct views which could be taken of the facts of the case and he disposed of the appeal before him by only holding that the learned Munsif had, before passing his order, duly considered the facts of the case and by saying that he (the District Judge) would not be justified in interfering with the exercise by the Munsif of his discretion. The learned District Judge in his judgment nowhere says what his own view of the facts of the case was. This certainly was not a disposal of the matter after a full consideration of the entire case on its merits.

The result is that Rule is made absolute. The order of the District Judge dismissing the appeal is set aside and it is directed that the appeal under S. 476-B be reheard by the learned District Judge in the light of the observations made above.

Let the stay of proceedings continue pending the disposal of the appeal.

Appeal No. 2383 of 1925, Decided on 11th June 1928, against appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Midnapur, D/- 10th August 1925.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 111-B—Suit under—Time begins to run from publication of Record-of-Rights—Period of 3 months after certificate is only suspended.

A cause of action for a declaratory suit under S. 111-B arises on final publication of Record-of-Rights as a cloud is cast upon the title of the plaintiff, on the publication of the record. But as no suit under S. 111-B shall be instituted within three months from the date of the certificate of final publication the period of limitation is subsequently suspended for three months after the certificate is made: 23 C. Heramba Chandra Guha and Jnan Chandra Ray—for Appellants.

Gunada Chandra Sen and Mani Lal Bhattacharya—for Respondent.

Suhrawardy, J. — The appellants brought a suit for declaration of their nishkar right to the lands in suit on a declaration that the entry in the Record-of-Rights to the contrary was wrong. Both the Courts below have held that the suit was barred under Art. 120, Lim. Act. The Record-of-Rights was finally published on 31st January 1918, and the certificate was signed on 6th June 1918. The present suit was brought on 8th May 1924. It is not disputed that the present suit is one contemplated by S. 111-B, Ben. Ten. Act. The Courts below have held that the cause of action arose on 1st February 1918, and even making allowance for three months as provided in S. 111-B, the suit is barred under Art. 120, Lim. Act. The appellants contend that the date of the signing of the certificate should be reckoned as the date on which their right to sue accrued and, therefore, their suit is within time. The various sections bearing on this point are not happily worded so as to put the matter beyond all reasonable doubt; but there are decisions of this Court as well as of the Patna High Court which seem to have finally settled this matter.

According to the law thus interpreted the cause of action arises on the final publication of the Record-of-Rights. The reason is this. An entry in a finally published record does not create any title in favour of any person. It only raises a presumption that it is correct unless the contrary is proved. As it is only a piece of evidence, it is not necessary for the party against whom it is made to institute a suit to correct it. He may bring a suit for the purpose and if he does so, he is bound by the ordinary law. Ramgulam Singh v. Bishnu Pargash Narain Singh (1). Under S. 103-A (2), after disposing of the objections referred to in that and previous sections, the Revenue Officer shall finally frame the record and shall cause it to be finally published in the prescribed manner. Under S. 103-B (3), every entry in a Record-of-Rights so published shall be evidence of the matter referred to in such entry and shall be presumed to be correct unless it is proved by evidence to be incorrect. The certificate signed by the Revenue Officer stating that the Record-of-Rights has been finally published shall be conclusive evidence of such publication under S. 103-B. A cause of action for a declaratory suit arises when a cloud is cast upon the title of the plaintiff. As under S. 103-B (3), the presumption of correctness at once attaches to an entry on the publication of the record, the right to sue to get rid of the presumption or to remove the cloud from the plaintiffs' title accrues on the date of publication.

Now S. 111-B says that no suit relating to certain matters mentioned therein shall be instituted within three months from the date of the certificate of final publication. If the final publication and the making of the certificate are not simultaneous the result must be that the cause of action arises immediately on the publication of the Record-of-Rights and the period of limitation is subsequently suspended for three months after the certificate is made. The position does not appear to be happy, but this is the only conclusion that can be drawn from the various sections of the Act and the interpretation put upon them by judicial decisions. A suit for alteration of rent or the determination of the status of any tenant cannot be brought under S. 111 until three months after the publication of the Record-of-Rights. This provision indicates that every other suit can be brought as soon as the Record-of-Rights is published. This seems to be the plain intendment of the law as contained in the several sections as understood by Courts. In Rajani Nath Pramanik v. Monaram Mandal (2) it is observed that a certificate signed by the Revenue Officer is conclusive evidence of its publication; but the presumption as to the correctness of the entry arises from the publication which is provided by S. 103 A.

The same view was taken in Prodyat Kumar Tagore v. Balgobinda (3). Though that was a case under S. 111, the law, so far as it related to the point of limitation, was similarly laid down. The result of these considerations is that in the present case the plaintiffs' right to sue for the declaration that they had nishkar right in the land in suit arose immediately on the final publication of the Record-of-Rights, namely, on the 31st January 1918. But as the right to bring a suit for this purpose was suspended for three months from the 6th June 1918, the date when the certificate was signed, they are entitled to an extension of the period of limitation provided by S. 120, Limitation Act, by three months under Cl. (4), S. 111-B. The last day, therefore, on which the suit should have been filed was the 30th April or 1st May 1924. The suit, having been filed on the 8th May 1914, is barred by limitation. This appeal, accordingly, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Jack, J.—I agree with the conclusion arrived at by my learned brother in this case, but would like to add a few remarks. It is true that in a suit for a declaration that an entry in the Record-of-Rights is wrong, the cause of action starts from the date of publication of the Record-of-Rights, since the presumption of the correctness of the entry then arises and it is that presumption that clouds the plaintiffs' title, but this is a suit under S. 111-B, Ben. Ten. Act which lays down that no such suit shall be instituted within three months of the date of final publication. Under S. 120, Lim. Act, the period of limitation starts from the date when the right to sue accrues. The right to sue accrues from the date of final publication since there is no prohibition in the Bengal Tenancy Act against the institution of the suit immediately after final publication of the Record-of-Rights; at the same time I think it can hardly have been the intention of the legislature to allow the institution of a suit between the date of final publication and the date of signing the certificate and this is where the difficulty lies.

The case of Prodyat Kumar Tagore v. Balgobinda Ditchit (3) was under S. 111, Ben. Ten. Act and in that section the period during which no suit is to be brought starts from the final publication and not as in S. 111-B from the certificate of publication. The case of Rajani Nath Pramanik v. Monaram Mandal (2) was an Eastern Bengal case, in which it was held that S. 111-B could not be applied to extend the period of limitation, because in that case three months from the date of the certificate of final publication had expired before the East Bengal and Assam Amending Act came into force.

were found damaged by water. The claim in the suit to which this rule relates was for recovery of compensation for the damage aforesaid. The trial Judge dismissed the suit holding that as the consignment was covered by Risk Notes A and B the Ry. Co. were protected from liability. The petitioners have then obtained this rule.

In support of the rule several grounds have been urged. In the first place it has been contended that as the petitioners took delivery after the damages had been assessed and a certificate of such assessments showing the amount of it as Rs. 334-8-0 had been given to the petitioners and after the Chief Station Master at Shalimar had promised to make good the amount the railway Co. are under a disability to plead the Risk Notes. In answer to this contention it is enough to say that nothing has been proved which would go to raise an estoppel of this nature against the Co. Nextly, it has been urged that the goods were not carried in the proper vehicles enjoined by the rules and so there was misconduct on the part of the Co.'s servants which would deprive the Co. of their protection under the Risk Notes. The finding on this point as recorded by the Subordinate Judge is against the petitioner. Thirdly, it has been urged that the conditions under which the Risk Notes could be taken were non-existent and so the Risk Notes are not operative. What is said under this head is that Risk Note form A is to be used when Articles are tendered for carriage in bad condition or so defectively packed as to be liable to damage, leakage or wastage in transit, but that, in point of fact, no packing conditions were in existence at the date of despatch of the goods, and that Risk Note Form B is to be used only when there is an alternative rate quoted for the goods in the tariff and the consignor avails himself of the lower rate while at the date of the despatch there was only one rate. Neither of these matters appears to have been specifically raised in the Court below. In view, however, of the importance of the case we have allowed the parties to go into these matters. We find that the arguments so far as these matters are concerned are based on some erroneous supposition. The Forwarding Note itself bears the endorsement showing that such rules did exist at the time. The tariff rates produced before us show that there were alternative rates and the petitioners availed themselves of the lower rate.

The Risk Notes, therefore, were taken on the basis of existing conditions and in our opinion were operative. Nextly, it has been contended that the agreement to limit the liability of the Co. was void as the Risk Notes were not duly executed within the meaning of S. 72, sub-S. (2) Cl. (a), Railway Act. We find ourselves unable to agree in this contention, because the Risk Notes have been proved to have been signed by the plaintiff's agent at Gondia who delivered the goods to the Ry. Administration. Lastly, it has been urged that the agreement is void in that it was not in a form approved by the Governor-General-in-Council, as it must be, under S. 72, sub-S. (2), Cl. (b). The defect that is pointed out is that whereas in the approved Forms of Risk Notes A and B it is stated that the Risk Notes, the Forwarding Order and the Ry. Receipt must bear one and "the same date", here the Risk Notes bear date 13th July 1926 and the Ry. Receipt, 15th July 1926. Reliance for this contention has been placed upon a decision of Tek Chand, J., in the case of E. I. Ry. v. Jot Ram Chandra Bhan (1), A. I. R. 1928 Lahore 162. With all respect to the learned Judge we must say we are unable to agree with him in the view that he has taken with regard to a discrepancy of this character. The case of Mahabasha Bankapur v. Secy. of State (1) upon which he has relied is, in our opinion, widely different. We are of opinion that so long as it is established that the Risk Notes, the Forwarding Note and Railway Receipt refer to the consignment in question the Co. is amply protected.

As all the contentions urged in support of the Rule fail, the rule must be discharged with costs 2 gold mohurs.

On proof of the signature of the deceased or his acknowledgment that he has signed the will he will be presumed to have known the provisions of the instrument he has signed. This presumption, however, is liable to be rebutted by proof of suspicious circumstances, such as, if the testator from want of education or physical infirmity was unable to read or unable to understand the provisions of the document or his capacity for executing the instrument is doubtful. Then the propounder of the will is bound to remove those suspicious circumstances. [P 489 C 1]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the applicant for probate of a will and a Codicil against a portion of the decree of the District Judge of Hooghly. The will was alleged to have been executed by one Ram Lal Mukherji, dated 6th September 1914 and the Codicil was executed by the same gentleman dated 11th September 1920. Ram Lal died on 9th April 1923. He was a gentleman of considerable properties and died at a good old age. It is said that he was 85 years of age at the time of his death. It is unnecessary to state in detail the members of his family at the time of his death and shortly before that as the facts have been fully set out in the judgment of the District Judge. It is sufficient to say that he was survived by four sons, Mritunjoy, Ganga Charan, Jahnavi Charan and Jahnavi Prosad and two daughters and a large number of grandchildren. He became a widower in the year 1890, and after that he went to live more or less as a recluse in a house built on a rock near the town of Monghyr in the province of Bihar. Previously he was a permanent resident of Boinchee in the district of Hooghly. The house in which he lived at the time of his death was described as Pirpahar. None of his sons lived there and it appears from the evidence that if any of them ever visited him it must have been on rare occasions. The most curious thing is that one of the sons, Ganga Charan, practised as pleader at Monghyr and lived about 2 miles from the house of his father, but even he seems to have seldom visited his father.

It appears that on one occasion when he required some money for the marriage of his daughter, he wrote to his father by post about the money and on another occasion it appears that Ram Lal wanted information from Ganga Charan about the repair of a motor car belonging to himself and the information as to where the motor car could be repaired was intimated by Ganga Charan by a letter written through the post. Again it appears that Jahnavi Prosad one of the sons, who is one of the respondents here, wanted to have some money from his father a short while before his death and he went to Monghyr from the district of Hooghly and lived with his brother Ganga Charan from which place he asked for permission to see his father. Apparently that permission was not granted and from the correspondence it appears that Jahnavi Prosad came back disheartened on account of his father not allowing him to see him. It appears further from the evidence that two of his grandsons by his first son Mritunjoy, named Kashipati and Pashupati used to live with Ramlal, that they were both favourites of Ramlal, but that Pashupati was much more so than Kashipati. One test of this greater affection which Ramlal felt for Pashupati is that in 1904 he made a gift of the house at Pirpahar to Pashupati and the fact that that gift was a genuine gift appears from the statement made by Ramlal in 1920 that the house in which he lived belonged to Pashupati's widow, Pashupati having died at that time. Kashipati died in 1918 and Pashupati died in May 1919 at Benares. Certain other grandchildren had also died about that time. These things must have been as the learned Judge observed, a serious blow to the old man. It will be seen later what effect these bereavements had on his mind as regards his power of discrimination. The will of 1914 was attested by several respectable witnesses including Lt. Colonel Megaw, I. M. S. (then Major) who afterwards became the Director of Tropical School of Medicine in Calcutta, Babu Baidya Nath Bose who was the well-known Principal of the College at Monghyr and his son Babu Hem Chandra Bose, a pleader of the place who was apparently in good practice as he was Public Prosecutor of that place for some time. The will was deposited with the Sub-Registrar under the provisions of the Registration Act, and the usual note was made on the sealed cover by the testator himself, which we have seen. The Codicil was also attested by several witnesses. With this Codicil I shall have to deal in detail, and it is unnecessary to deal with this Codicil alone having regard to what I am just going to say. The application was resisted by two of the sons of Ramlal, Jahnavi Prosad and Jahnavi Charan. The other sons and the grown up grandsons did not take part in these proceedings. But this is a matter of very little importance one way or the other. Those other persons might think that it was not worth their while to fight the case, and no presumption can be made either in favour of the applicant on account of their silence nor against the objectors on that ground.

The grounds on which the two objectors resisted the application of the petitioner, shortly stated were that the will had been executed when the alleged testator was 76 years of age, and the Codicil when he was about 82 years old, that from about 12 years before his death he became weak and infirm both physically and mentally and incapable of managing his own affairs owing to softness of the brain, that other persons wielded considerable influence over his mind and the alleged testator became a mere creature in the hands of these persons. Amongst those persons was his grandson Pashupati and other persons connected with him including Surendra Nath Chatterji, the appellant before us and petitioner before the lower Court. It was alleged specifically that the deceased was not in a sound disposing state of mind at the time of the alleged will or of the alleged Codicil and that therefore the application for probate should be refused. The learned Judge in an elaborate judgment considered all the circumstances of the case and in the result allowed the application of the propounder in part. He made an order granting probate of the will of 1914 and refused probate of the Codicil dated 11th September 1920. From the part of the decree refusing probate of the Codicil the petitioner in the Court below appeals to this Court. The objectors in the Court below, the respondents here, prefer a cross-objection against that part of the decree by which the District Judge granted probate of the will of 1914.

Mr. Choudhury, counsel for the respondents, candidly stated before us that having regard to the nature of the evidence and the findings of the learned District Judge he does not consider it proper to take up the time of the Court in pressing the cross-objection. But at the same time he reserves the liberty for his clients to press their objection before any higher Court if they choose to carry the case further. Our labour has been a good deal lightened by the course which Mr. Choudhury has thought proper to take with regard to this case. We have therefore to look to the propriety of the order made by the District Judge with reference to the Codicil dated 11th September 1920.

The observations of the learned Judge with regard to the Codicil in question are to be found in his judgment at pp. 172 and 173. It is not quite clear although the learned Judge criticized the evidence of the attesting witnesses to the Codicil, whether he found that it was duly executed and attested or not. The learned Judge says that the memory of the alleged testator had been failing and that the contents of the Codicil show that it was not only for the benefit of Pashupati's children but for strengthening the hands of Suren Babu and for his immediate benefit. The two questions in my opinion have not been kept separate by the learned Judge, that is, as to the matter of due execution and attestation and as to the question of undue influence and of sound disposing mind. The learned Judge states in one place in his judgment that the effect of the bereavements on the old man's health and mind, especially the death of the youthful and promising and beloved grandsons, was very great and he seems to think that his mind was so unhinged that he was not capable of understanding what he was doing. He concludes that portion of the judgement by these words:

"At this time (that is, at the time of Pashupati's death) he was more than 80 years old and if as pointed out he had lost his faith in Jahnavi Charan also the old man could not but have been unbalanced."

The learned Judge also seems to have been of opinion that undue influence was exercised on the mind of the testator where he states:

"It may be the old man was a willing victim; but as years passed by and from proved conduct of Suren Babu and Arun, I find that the influence was exercised unduly and improperly," and

"I am convinced from after Pashupati's death in 1919 it does not appear he had power of discrimination or will power which would enable him to make a disposition of his property properly."

The District Judge concludes his finding in this way:

"As regards issue 4 (that is the issue with regard to the will) I find that there is satisfactory evidence of execution and attestation and it has not been proved the will is the outcome of undue influence. The probate therefore may be granted. My conclusion is that this second Codicil has not been proved to have been legally executed and attested and further, I am of opinion that at the time of this Codicil Ram Lal Babu could not have possessed a disposing frame of mind. On the other hand, he was under the influence of Suren Babu which influence has clearly been unduly and unfairly exercised. This is my answer to issues 5, 6 and 7. In answer to issue 8 I say that the conscience of this Court has not been satisfied and the Court declines to grant the probate of this document."

I will first deal with the question of sound disposing mind of the alleged testator at the time of the execution of the Codicil. (His Lordship then discussed evidence and came to the following conclusion). All these facts show that Ram Lal was not deficient in intellectual powers towards the end of 1920 and afterwards and the finding of the learned Judge on the evidence that Ram Lal was quite capable of executing the will, but had no sound disposing mind when he executed the Codicil seems to be inconsistent.

Ram Lal was under the impression that Pashupati had been foully done to death. His belief was that although he had sent medical men to attend on Pashupati, the medicines prescribed by these medical men were not allowed to be administered to him. Further there is a hint that incantations were used for the purpose of hastening his death. Ram Lal was a believer in Occult powers and his letters to Jahnavi Charan show that he thought that Jahnavi Charan was a saint and a seer possessed of occult powers. I may here interrupt myself to say that Jahnavi Charan was a graduate of the Calcutta University and an M. A. If he falsely led his father to believe that he had occult powers that was certainly very wrong. But there are believers in occult powers in the country as well as in other countries among men who are undoubtedly of the keenest intelligence. Although Ram Lal believed in the occult powers of Jahnavi Charan, his letters show that he was very parsimonious about money for acts done by Jahnavi on his behalf for acquiring merit in the other world. As an instance, it appears from certain letters that he used to pay Rs. 25 for saving a cow from slaughter and Rs. 10 or so for saving a sheep and small sums of money for saving fish and putting them back into the river. But these letters show at least in two instances that an extra sum of Rs. 2 was paid to Jahnavi Charan and that money was directed to be kept in deposit although Jahnavi Charan was addressed in these letters as the blessed one, a seer, lord and so forth. There appears to be one reason why Jahnavi Charan was addressed by his father in such honorific terms and the reason seems to have been that Jahnavi Charan led his father to believe that by his pious spiritual exercises he could cure Pashupati of the disease from which he was suffering. After the death of Pashupati the letters do not show that Jahnavi Charan was addressed in the same high flown language although the letters do not show any particular dislike towards Jahnavi Charan. However, it is nobody's case that the fact that Ram Lal believed in occult powers show that his intelligence had suffered in any way in the least. The position therefore after the death of Pashupati was this:—

Ramlal was against all persons who were in some way or other connected with the will alleged to have been executed by Pashupati. He had also suspicions as regards the people who were about him at Benares at the time of his death that they neglected his proper treatment, and these people were the father of Pashupati, Suvankari the widow of Kashipati, and there may be other persons we do not know. After the death of Pashupati the appellant Surendra Nath seems to have come into contact with Ram Lal. He brought down from Benares the widows of Kashipati and Pashupati and their children to Monghyr. The evidence is that Surendra met Ramlal only on a few occasions, 3 or 4, 4 or 5. On each occasion he stayed with Ramlal for a very short time. He undoubtedly went there before the execution of the Codicil. Surendra also went there when Ramlal was examined with reference to Pashupati's will. But he used to live in the town of Monghyr. It further appears that Ramlal felt very much attached towards the son of Pashupati as he would naturally be if he loved Pashupati as appears from the evidence. Pashupati was the person who assisted him in managing the zemindari and as a matter of fact the objectors say that it was Pashupati who had exercised undue influence upon him for the execution of the will of 1914. This was the state of the family and the condition or state of mind of Ramlal at the time of the execution of the Codicil.

The learned advocate for the respondents did not contend and could not contend that there was any evidence of undue influence being exercised on Ramlal for the execution of the Codicil in question. He also had to admit, as I have already stated, that Ramlal had sufficient mental capacity for executing the Codicil. Mr. Choudhury's argument was that the judgment of the District Judge may be supported on other strong grounds and he put his argument as follows: Ramlal was really advanced in years. He was hard of hearing as is natural at his age. His eye-sight was growing dim. He himself stated in his evidence in January 1921 that since two months previous to that date his eye-sight was getting dim. It was his habit to have his work done in the matter of correspondence by Norendra Kumar Biswas who was the tutor of Kashipati and Pashupati when they were young. He acted as a sort of Secretary after they had grown up, and was known as the Master Mohasaya. The Codicil was drafted by a Firm of Attorneys in Calcutta under instructions received from Surendra Nath.

Surendra Nath does not come forward to give evidence as to what instructions he received and what instructions he conveyed to the attorneys. It should also be remembered that the attorneys were the attorneys of Surendra himself and they never previously acted on behalf of the testator. The reason given for Surendra not giving evidence in the case is certainly not satisfactory. The learned advocate argues upon these circumstances that there is a gap in the chain of evidence, and it has not been proved that the Codicil was prepared according to the instructions of Ramlal or that he executed it with full knowledge of its contents. It is evident that the instructions which were sent through Surendra could not have been verbal instructions because the draft contains various dispositions which could not possibly have been given or carried verbatim by word of mouth. Reference is made to the Will of 1914 in the draft and it is quite apparent that a copy of the will must have been in the possession of Ram Lal which was given to Surendra for the use of the Solicitors for the preparation of the draft. The evidence with regard to this is very unsatisfactory. But in my opinion the respondents should have asked the clerk from the attorney's office who produced the Day Book of the Attorneys from what instructions the attorneys had prepared the draft. Now the argument of the respondents resolves itself into this, that the condition of Ramlal should be taken into consideration in judging whether the Codicil was one which was really executed by him with full knowledge of its contents. It is not denied that Ramlal knew English, but it is said that his knowledge of English was very limited. It requires a greater knowledge of English than what Ramlal seems to have possessed in order to understand the draft, and there is no evidence that the draft or the Codicil itself as drawn was ever read over to him. Surendra takes some benefit under the Codicil, although it is small. The greatest benefit is taken by Pashu-pati's son a minor of tender age. The learned Judge has stated that there is no reason why Kashipati's sons should be deprived of what was given to them under the will and Pashupati's son be made the object of bounty of the testator who had 85 lacs from his father. Now the statement of fact by the learned Judge that Pashupati's son had got 85 lacs from his father is not supported by evidence. It would rather seem that if the fact had not been different Ramlal would not have taken such keen interest in getting the will rejected. We cannot dive into the mind of the testator why Kashipati's son was not made an object of his bounty. Nor can we divine why Siva Prosad a grandson was deprived of the four annas share of the dwelling house at Boinchee which was given to him under the will of 1914. If the Codicil is proved otherwise these facts are not sufficient for discrediting the document.

The main question is whether there are such grounds for suspicion as would lead us to hold that it has not been sufficiently proved that Ramlal had really executed the Codicil with full knowledge of its contents. Now I must take the findings of the learned Judge one by one. There is no reason to suppose that the Codicil was not legally executed. It is unnecessary to state in detail the facts which the learned Judge considers as damaging against the witnesses. The Codicil was registered by Ramlal, the execution was admitted before the Sub-Registrar and there is no reason to suppose that the attesting witnesses did not see the testator put his signature to the Codicil or that they had not attested the signature as required by law. True, Arun Deba is a junior pleader and Abinash Babu is the health officer of the local municipality and they were called for the purpose of attesting the document and the other attesting witnesses were the Secretary of Ramlal, Narendra Kumar and a Gomastha, Saukhi Lal. There is no good reason for disbelieving their testimony that the Codicil was executed by Ramlal in their presence and attested by them. There is also no question that Ramlal at the time did possess sound disposing mind. The only question is whether Ramlal executed the Codicil with full knowledge of its contents. The expression of the learned Judge that the conscience of the Court was not satisfied with regard to this Codicil must have been taken from the well-known case of Barry v. Butlin (1). The expression that the conscience of the Court is to be satisfied, I presume, is a heritage from the observations of the Ecclesiastical Courts in England which had formerly jurisdiction with reference to wills. Now what is the evidence that is necessary for the purpose of removing any suspicion as regards wills? In a recent case, Robins v. National Trust Co. (2), Lord Dunedin remarks,

"Now the English Courts have gone what some might think pretty far on the question of what duty lies on those who propound a will."

That was also what appears to have been directly held in the case of Jarat Kumari Dassi v. Bissessur Dutt (3). There the learned Chief Justice, Sir Lawrence Jenkins, observed and it was concurred in by Woodroffe, J., that in India there was only one test or proof with regard to all civil cases. I respectfully agree with the opinion of the learned Judges in that case, and I would say that in all cases whether it is a will case or a case with regard to any other document, the Court must be satisfied upon the evidence in order to make a decree in favour of the party relying on the document. There is no absolute test for weighing evidence, specially as regards oral evidence which is given by the contending parties in a Court of justice. The Judges should try their best to ascertain the truth and that can only be done in the manner provided in the Evidence Act, and the proof necessary to establish a will in this country is not an absolute or conclusive one, but such proof as would satisfy a prudent man.

Moreover, it seems to me that the propounder of a will has to remove only such suspicious circumstances as are suggested by the objectors. The question therefore in this case is what is the suspicion that is raised in this case which must be removed by the petitioners. I have stated the main objections of the respondents put forward in the Court below. The facts alleged by the objectors have not been supported by the evidence. There is absolutely no evidence of undue influence exercised by anybody. The evidence is quite clear that Ramlal had sound disposing mind at the time of the Codicil and long after. The ordinary burden upon the propounder to prove due execution and attestation has in my opinion been discharged. Then the question is whether Ramlal executed the Codicil after knowing its full contents. The general rule, I need hardly say, is that on proof of the signature of the deceased of his acknowledgment that he has signed the will, he will be presumed to have known the provisions of the instrument he has signed. This presumption however is liable to be rebutted by proof of suspicious circumstances, such as if the testator from want of education or physical infirmity was unable to read or unable to understand the provisions of the document or his capacity for executing the instrument is doubtful. Then the propounder of the will, is bound to remove those suspicious circumstances. But as I have already said I do not think wills stand on any different plane from any other instrument which a person is bound to prove in order to succeed. In this case whatever might be the suspicious circumstances alleged on behalf of the objectors here for the first time, these are in my opinion removed by the evidence adduced in this case notwithstanding that Surendra has not given evidence as to the instructions given. The draft of the Codicil has been produced and there is a note on the draft by Ramlal with his own hand that he approved it, and it was sent back to the Firm of Attorneys by post with a covering letter, Ex. 5, dated 19th August 1920. The letter runs thus:

"Dears Sirs, I have received the draft Codicil drawn by you according to my instructions sent to you through Babu Surendra Nath Chatterji. I have carefully gone through the draft and find the same in order and drawn in exact accordance with my instructions. I have made an alteration and I enclose the same herewith. Please have it engrossed and return it to me at an early date for execution. Yours faithfully: Ram Lal Mukherji. Enclosure-Draft Codicil."

This letter is in the hand-writing of Narendra and signed by Ramlal. Narendra was cross-examined on this and his reply was that the whole of the letter was dictated by Ram Lal. No question was put to him as to whether Ram Lal was capable of dictating such a letter as that. If this is believed, and there is no reason to disbelieve it, then Ram Lal had a fairly good knowledge of English. Moreover as the learned Judge observes if his knowledge of English was limited, the sons would not have carried on correspondence with him in English. In any case from the proved fact of the strong will of Ram Lal it cannot be assumed that he ever signed the paper without fully knowing its contents. Narendra says:

"Exhibit 5 is the verbatim reproduction of what Ram Lal Babu dictated. When the Codicil arrived by post the Babu read it through to himself."

From the fact of the note on the draft which was written and signed by Ram Lal with his own hand and the letter, Ex. 5, I have no doubt in my mind that Ram Lal executed the Codicil with full knowledge of its contents.

One other fact should be mentioned here. The letter Ex. 5 states that there was only one alteration in the draft while the draft shows that there are 2 or 3 alterations. But that one alteration was an important alteration that the executor shall not be liable to account to any one and will deal with the property as if he was the malik. It seems that Ram Lal thought that was the only one important alteration which should be mentioned. There is no evidence in whose hand-writing the alterations were made. Jahnavi Prosad, who only of the two objectors gave evidence, says that it was in Surendra's hand-writing. but Surendra does not appear to have been there at the time when the draft reached Ram Lal by post and no question was put to any of the witnesses for the applicant as to the hand-writing of the alterations. I do not therefore attach much importance to the evidence of Jahnavi Prosad that the alterations are in the hand-writing of Surendra. It has also been contended why should a perfect stranger to Ram Lal like Surendra be made the absolute master of the property. It is difficult to understand what motive led Ram Lal to act like that. Apparently Ram Lal had no faith in any member of his family when he thought that Pashupati had been done to death by his own people. He found this stranger Surendra, who is a sort of cousin of Pashupati's widow, had interested himself on behalf of Parijat and her infant son and was conducting the litigation with regard to Pashupati's will. He might have thought that this is the person who would take interest in the affairs of the infant. The provision that Surendra would not be accountable to any person is of no serious consequence, because he would be liable to account to the legatees whether the testator says so or not.

I think I have disposed of all the objections raised and in my view the learned Judge's decision with regard to the Codicil must be set aside and probate granted to the petitioner of the Codicil dated 11th September 1920.

I have not made any observations with reference to another Codicil which the learned Judge has not believed. That Codicil was executed in March 1920, and that has only an indirect bearing on the case. No probate was asked for and it is unnecessary to deal with the execution or proper attestation of that document.

The appeal is allowed, the judgment and decree of the learned Judge with reference to the Codicil of 11th September 1920 is set aside and probate of the same should be granted to the applicant.

The cross-objections are dismissed without costs. Having regard to the fact that the legal heirs of Ram Lal are the objectors and the other circumstances of the case the costs of both parties in both Courts will come out of the estate. We assess the hearing-fee at Rs. 500.

Corporation of Calcutta—Complainant—Opposite Party.

Decided on 22nd May 1929.

Calcutta Municipal Act (2 of 1923), S. 271—Pendency of suit for ejectment of tenant, or existence of injunction against owner of premises or mere application under S. 527 would not relieve owner from liability for conviction for non-compliance with notice under S. 271 but such proceedings cannot be ignored while considering what should be proper sentence for offence of non-compliance.

The pendency of a suit in ejectment against the tenant or the existence of an injunction against the owner of the premises restraining him from taking possession of the premises or even the mere filing of an application under S. 527 would not be sufficient to relieve the owner from a liability for a conviction for non-compliance with a notice under S. 271 requiring him to erect privies connected with the premises. One cannot entirely overlook, however, the existence of such proceedings in considering the gravity of the offence and in determining the proper sentence. [P 491 C 2]

Judgment.—This Rule has been issued to show cause why the conviction of the petitioner under S. 488 read with S. 271, Calcutta Municipal Act, (Act 2 B. C. of 1923) should not be set aside or such other or further order made as to this Court may seem fit and proper. The facts necessary to be stated are the following. The petitioner holds a certain property, to wit, premises No. 7 Gas Street, Calcutta, on a lease. The premises in question were in the occupation of a tenant Kissen Ram Shaw who, it is said, held the same under a registered kabuliati for two years from 8th December 1920 and on the expiry of the term has been holding over. In October 1927 the Corporation of Calcutta served a notice on the petitioner under S. 271, Calcutta Municipal Act, requiring him to erect two connected privies in the premises. The petitioner, having failed to comply with this requisition, was convicted at first on 3rd April 1928, and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 25 and again on 12th June 1928 and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 30. The present conviction against which this rule has been issued was upon an application in which it was stated that the petitioner continued in not complying with the aforesaid notice under S. 271 of the Act from 13th June 1928 to 10th September 1928.

The fact that there was non-compliance with the notice in question between the dates to which reference has just been made was admitted on behalf of the petitioner by the pleader who appeared for him before the learned Municipal Magistrate. The Rule that has been issued by this Court has been sought to be supported by reference to certain proceedings in other Courts and on a reference to which it has been argued that the conviction is not maintainable. I shall presently refer to those proceedings. The petitioner appears to have filed a suit in ejectment against the tenant being title Suit No. 715 of 1927 of the Court of the Munsif at Sealdah. This suit was filed sometime in the year 1927. It ended in a decree against the tenant Sri Kissen Ram on 19th July 1928. The petitioner states that when he tried to execute the ejectment decree for getting khas possession of the said premises, one Jiblal Shaw alleging that he was the tenant's brother filed a declaratory suit against the petitioner on 13th August 1928 being suit No. 209 of 1928 in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Alipore and on 14th August 1928 obtained an injunction against the petitioner restraining him from taking possession of the said premises. On being called upon to answer the charge with regard to which the petitioner has now been convicted he appeared before the Court and on 4th December 1928 placed all the facts before the Municipal Magistrate and upon that he was advised to make an application under S. 527 of the Act in the Small Cause Court of Sealdah in order to obtain facility for getting possession of the premises for the purpose of constructing the privies thereof.

The petitioner states that on his undertaking to make the said application the case was adjourned and on that he on 13th December 1928 did, in point of fact, file the said application in the said Court. That application, the petitioner states, is yet pending. On these facts, the petitioner contends that the order of conviction which was passed against him was one which was not justifiable.

Now, it seems to me upon the provisions of the law as it stands that the pendency of a suit in ejectment against the tenant or the existence of an injunction against the petitioner or for the matter of that the mere filing of an application under S. 527 of the Act would not be sufficient to relieve the petitioner from a liability for a conviction for non-compliance with a requisition such as there was in the present case under S. 271, Calcutta Municipal Act. At the same time, however, it seems to me that in order to consider the gravity of the offence which one commits in not complying with a requisition of this character at a time when proceedings of the nature to which I have already referred are pending, one cannot entirely overlook the fact of the existence of those proceedings. It is true that S. 527 of the Act says in Cl. (3) of it that :

"after eight days from the date of any such order, the said occupier shall afford all such reasonable facilities to the owner for the purpose aforesaid as may be prescribed in the said order ; and in the event of his continued refusal to do so, the owner shall be discharged, during the continuance of such refusal from the liability which he would otherwise incur by a reason of his failure to comply with the said provision or requisition."

But the subsection does not mean that the pendency of an application under S. 527 or for the matter of that, of other proceedings bona fide taken by one for getting khas possession of the property, need not be considered for the purpose of determining what should be a proper sentence to be imposed upon him for his failure to comply with the requisition. I am not oblivious of the fact that the application under S. 527 was made only on 13th December 1928 and not at any time during the period from 13th June 1928 to 10th September 1928 during which the offence is said to have continued.

The fact that it was not made within the period aforesaid only means that the application does not absolve the petitioner from liability. The proceedings that the petitioner took for the purpose of getting khas possession of the property, I am clearly of opinion, were taken by him bona fide and I think he was perhaps wrongly advised in not taking proceedings under S. 527 of the Act in the first instance. Having regard to those proceedings and in view of the fact that that application has been made and is actually pending, some consideration, in my opinion, should be shown to the petitioner in the matter of the sentence that is to be passed on him and in that view of the matter I would reduce the sentence passed on the petitioner to a fine of four annas per diem for the 75 days for which the learned Magistrate has convicted him in other words, that the petitioner should be sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 18-12-0 in default to undergo simple imprisonment for 18 days.

It appears from a perusal of the ordersheet of the case which has been started on the application under S. 527 of the Act that on several occasions the petitioner was ready with his witnesses but on the prayer of the opposite party the hearing of the application was adjourned and it further appears that on the last two days for which the case was fixed, namely, 20th April 1929 and 11th May 1929 the opposite party was ready but the petitioner for some reason or other asked for and obtained an adjournment. The petitioner will be well advised not to apply for such an adjournment again and to have the matter brought to an end in order that if he obtains an order under S. 527, sub-S. 3 in his favour he may get the benefit which that section would confer on him. The Rule will be made absolute only to this extent that while the petitioner's conviction stands the sentence passed on him will be reduced as aforesaid. Balance of the fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 27—Admissibility of additional evidence—Appellant cannot complain if additional evidence is taken for him.

The appellant cannot in second appeal complain that additional evidence received in the lower appellate Court giving the appellant an opportunity of establishing by production of further evidence that the dakhilas given by the landlord were genuine, was wrongly received by that Court: 36 Cal. 833 (P. C.), Rel. on. [P 493 C 1]

Benode Mitter, Radha Binode Pal and Prem Ranjan Roy Chowdhury—for Appellant.Sarat Chandra Roy Chowdhury and Dwijendra Krishna Dutt — for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the defendant and arises out of a suit commenced by the plaintiffs for recovery of possession of the lands described in the plaint about 13½ cottas in area after establishment of their title to the same.

The defence of the defendants was that the plaintiffs or their vendor Harinath had no title to the suit land which originally belonged to one Barani Bewa, defendants' grandfather's sister who made a verbal gift of the land to the defendant's father Jharu Mondal and that the defendant after inheriting the land from Jharu Mondal sold the land to Durga Prasad, who is the appellant before me. The Munsiff decreed the plaintiff's suit. Against this decision an appeal was taken by the defendants to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Rajshahi and the learned Subordinate Judge after taking additional evidence at the appellate stage has affirmed the decision of the Munsiff.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court by defendant 7 who has purchased the interest of defendants 1 to 4 and Sir Benode Mitter appearing for defendant 7 has contended that the case should be remanded to the lower appellate Court on account of various errors of procedure which have affected the merits of the case. It is said that the lower appellate Court having proceeded to decide the appeal by the reception of inadmissible evidence the appeal should be reheard after excluding the additional evidence and other inadmissible documentary evidence. It appears that the plaintiff's case was that the jote in question belonged to one Harinath and that they purchased from Harinath, the said jote on 13th August 1919 and that Harinath and after him plaintiffs possessed the land in suit through their tenant one Chhabuli who is defendant 5 in the present litigation. The case of the defendant, as I have indicated, is that the jote originally belonged to Barani and that Barani made an oral gift to her nephew Jharu Mondal, that defendants 1 to 4 are the heirs of Jharu and that they were possessing the disputed land through defendant 5. There was previous rent suit against Chhabuli which was instituted by the present plaintiffs on the basis of their purchase of the jote from Harinath and on the basis of a re-settlement in Barga of the disputed lands with defendant 5 in the year 1326 corresponding to 1907. In that suit it was decided that there was no relationship of landlord and tenant between the present plaintiffs and defendant 5 and it was held that the plaintiffs were not possessing disputed land through Chhabuli i. e. defendant 5. In that suit it was also held that the entry in the Record-of-Rights that Hari Nath was possessing the land through defendant 5 was a doubtful entry. The learned District Judge who decided the appeal from the decision of the rent suit found that the circumstances were such as to show that there was no relationship of the landlord and tenant between plaintiffs and defendant 5 and there was no agreement to pay Barga rent. The learned District Judge left open the question of plaintiffs' titles.

The grounds taken by Sir Binode Mitter fall substantially under four heads. It is argued in the first place that the Subordinate Judge ought not to have allowed appellants' evidence to be taken at the appellate stage for the purpose of considering as to whether the dakhilas filed by the defendant are genuine or not. It appears that both sides produced dakhilas in the Court of the first instance from the sherista of the landlord and the Munsiff with reference to the dakhilas of the defendants said that they did not relate to the disputed land. The Munsiff said this :

"Thus I must hold that the defendants' dakhilas Ex. B. Series, if they are genuine do not refer to the suit land or that such dakhilas have been manufactured with the help of landlord's gomastha who has nothing to lose by the issue of spurious dakhilas in duplicate."

After hearing the appellant the learned Subordinate Judge on 5th August 1927 recorded the following order :

"Heard the learned pleaders of both sides. It is very important in this case to find out which set of dakhilas is true. The result of the case hinges much upon it. Both parties are to take proper steps for enlightening the Court on the point. After taking evidence on that point I shall hear the appeal."

It appears that in pursuance of this order on 29th October 1927 when the appeal was finally taken up, the appellant examined one of the landlords, Babu Girija Bhusan Rai, who produced a number of documents Ex 9 to 9z, 9z to 9z28 and Ex. 10 which had been used in evidence. It is complained on behalf of the appellant that O. 41, R. 27, Civil P. C., does not authorize the appellate Court to take additional evidence in such circumstances. It appears to me, however, that the additional evidence was taken for the purpose of giving the defendants an opportunity of establishing by production of further evidence that the dakhilas given by the landlord were genuine. It seems to me that in the circumstances the defendant cannot now complain that the additional evidence was wrongly taken. In this connexion I may refer to an observation of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Jagarnath Pershad v. Hanuman Pershad (1). Their Lordships said this (at p. 839).

"On the argument of the appeal it was objected that the examination of three witnesses by the Court of appeal was irregular; but it appears that the examination was taken with the assent of both sides. It is not open, therefore, to any body to complain of it now."

Therefore this ground of appeal must fail. It was argued in the second place that as it was decided in the rent suit as between plaintiffs and defendant 5 that defendant 5's possession was not the possession of the plaintiff that question is res judicata between the plaintiff and defendant 5. I think this contention is sound but even if full effect is given to this contention that does not affect the decision of this appeal for the effect of the decision of the Court of appeal below is that there was no relationship between plaintiffs and defendant 5 in the year 1326 and plaintiffs alleged their re-settlement in the Barga with defendant 5. The present suit was instituted in 1923 within 12 years of 1326 i. e. 1919; consequently, even if plaintiffs cannot show that the possession of Chhabuli was not his possession since 1326 his suit cannot be held to be barred by the statute of limitation.

The third ground taken was that the lower appellate Court has relied on certain recitals in another document which was not inter partes and which was with respect not to disputed land but to some other parcel of land. It appears to me, however, that no reference has been made by the lower appellate Court to this document which is Ex. 3 in the case but the lower appellate Court has not referred to it at all. This ground of appeal must fail.

It was argued in the fourth place that the lower appellate Court was in error in stating that there was no evidence to rebut the khatian whereas, the previous rent decree was good evidence to rebut the entry in the khatian which showed that defendant 5 was a tenant under Harinath through whom the plaintiffs claimed. It appears, however, that the learned Subordinate Judge did consider the effect of Ex. K which is the decree in the rent suit and he said rightly that the effect of that decree is that the Court did not believe the resettlement with Chhabuli by the plaintiffs in 1326 and found the absence of relationship of landlord and tenant between them. As I have said the effect of that is that Chhabuli's possession was not the possession of the plaintiffs from after 1919 and this does not affect the question of limitation.

As all the grounds raised in this appeal fail this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Braja Lal Chakrabarti and Bijan Kumar Mukherjee—for Appellant.

Rupendra Coomar Mitter; Sarat Chandra Bose; Amarendra Narain Bagchi and Hira Lal Chakraborty—for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which these appeals arise are these: One Himadri had a certain share in a certain taluk. He was involved in debt and there were a number of decrees out against him. On 14th June 1921 in execution of a money decree his share in the taluk was sold. He then applied on 14th July 1921 to have the sale set aside on depositing the decretal amount and this was allowed on 18th July 1921. It will appear that the money to do this was supplied by the plaintiff in the present suit, Babu Tarak Nath Mukherji. On 8th July Himadri had entered into an agreement to sell to Mukherji his interest in the taluk and Mukherji paid him in advance some Rs. 26,000 odd of the purchase money and it was this money which was used to satisfy the decretal amount of the decree I have already referred to.

One Kali Nath Bose had meanwhile obtained another decree against Himadri and in execution of the decree attached the same property on 25th September 1921.

On 16th September 1921 two persons Niladri and Sanat had instituted money suits against Himadri and attached the property before judgment in one suit on 10th August 1921 and in the other on 3rd September 1921. On 29th November 1921 the agreement for sale I have already referred was completed and the property sold to Mukherji. The balance of the purchase money Rs. 5,386 odd was paid some time before this date. Mukherji then put in objection to the three attachments under O. 21, R. 58 but was unsuccessful. Mukherji deposited the decretal amount in Kali Nath Bose's case. He has brought three suits. One against Kali Nath Bose asking for a declaration that the property was not liable to be sold in execution of Kali Nath's decree and asking for a refund of the purchase money.

In the other two suits he asked for a declaration that the property was not liable to be sold in execution of the decree.

In Kali Nath Bose's case the Court held that the property was liable for the decretal debt. In the other two cases it was held that the property was liable to be sold in execution of the decrees which had since been obtained subject to a mortgage charge of one Raja Sreenath Roy and subject to the right of the plaintiff to have his claim for specific performance of contract enforced against the auction-purchaser. There were appeals and cross-appeals to the District Court. That Court passed the following decree:

"that the title of the plaintiff to the property would be confirmed but that he would pay certain sums to the defendants which would be charge on the property."

A like cross-appeal in suit No. 71 was dismissed. The plaintiff has appealed and there are also cross objections by the defendants. The plaintiff's case briefly is that the property is not in any way liable for the payment of the defendant's decrees. The question therefore to be decided in these appeals is a simple one, viz., whether the attachment which took place before the sale or the sale itself shall prevail. So far as this point is concerned S. 64, Civil P. C., supplies a complete answer, for any private transfer or delivery of the property attached subsequent to the attachment is void against all claims enforceable under the attachment. Admittedly the sale [was completed on 29th November after the attachment. The section makes no distinction between attachment before or after judgment. The plaintiff appellant however would rely on the agreement of sale of 8th July and would seem to contend if I understand his argument rightly that this agreement to sale would create some obligation on the property which obligation if I understand him rightly would prevail over the attachment.

The obligation presumably referred to here must be such an obligation as is referred to in S. 40, T. P. Act, an obligation which does not amount to an interest in the property or an easement. S. 54, T. P. Act makes it quite clear that a contract for sale does not create any interest or charge on the property.

Therefore at the time of the attachments the appellants had no interest in or any charge on the property which was attached. He had at the most an obligation as contemplated under S. 40, T. P. Act which might allow him go to the transferee and compel the transferee to sell to him the property.

But it is equally clear that as a result of the obligation no charge or interest has been created by such obligation and as far as I can understand nothing can prevail against the attachment except some prior interest or charge. It might be that as a result of the obligation or agreement, Mukherjee might be able to go to the person who had purchased the property at an execution sale and ask that he should perform the contract for sale.

The appellant has relied in support of his contention on the case of Madan Mohan v. Rebati Mohan (1).

If I understand that decision rightly it did not decide or lay down any principle of law but was decided on some principle of natural justice, for, the learned Judge (Woodroffe, J.) concludes his judgment by saying that the natural justice of the case demands that the defendant's purchase should prevail. The facts of that case were that the plaintiff had attached certain properties before judgment on 6th November 1895 and purchased them at an execution sale on 19th August 1897. Before the sale on 28th May 1897 the defendant purchased the property by a kabala in pursuance of a contract executed before the attachment. In deciding this case Woodroffe, J., no doubt discusses S. 64, Civil P. C., and also O. 38, R. 10 and remarks that the creditor can only attach the right, title and interest of his debtor at the date of attachment and cannot complain if his debtor has created an obligation against him prior to the attachment. Perhaps he cannot complain and as far as I can see he would have no grounds of complaint, for, an obligation does not as far as I can see affect the right, title and interest of the judgment-creditor at the time of the attachment. It creates no charge or interest and the very use of the expression obligation shows that the learned Judge realized that it was not a right. Neither would it be title or interest. Obviously therefore the creditor would have nothing to complain about, for as far as I can see, it cannot affect his right to bring the property to sale in execution of his decree. The learned Judge further on states that :

"It seems to me that if we are to hold that a plaintiff creditor can ignore the obligation incurred by a debtor we should use the provision of S. 64 for a purpose which was not intended, that provision being for the protection of the creditor against transaction subsequent to the attachment."

The transactions referred to are transfers or delivery of the property and an agreement to sell is neither. But as it creates no interest or charge in the property there is nothing to protect the the judgment-creditor against. In my opinion he is not affected by anything that creates no charge or interest in the property. But after all the decision of that case depends as far as I can see on no principle of law but on some principle of natural justice and I find some difficulty in applying to the present case some principle of natural justice which was applicable obviously to the particular facts of that particular case.

I am therefore of opinion that the attachment must prevail over the subsequent sale to the plaintiff and that the property is liable for the satisfaction of the three decrees already referred for the execution of which the property had been attached both before and after judgment. The plaintiff-appellant states that if this be our decision he does not quarrel with the form of the lower Court's order and will not contest it.

The cross-appeals in the event of the decision being against the plaintiff-appellant as it is, are not pressed and are dismissed. The result is that the appeals fail and are dismissed with costs.

Pearson, J.—I only desire to add that I am unable to take the same view of the basis of the decision in Madan Mohan v. Rebati Mohan (1), as Cuming, J. I think that decision was given on a consideration of the scope and effect of S. 64, Civil P. C., coupled with O. 38, R. 10 as affecting the circumstances of that case, and that it is not to be disposed of saying that it was rested not upon principles of law but upon natural justice only. For the purpose of the present case however the only question is whether in the circumstances the attachment held good to the extent of the then unpaid balance of the purchase money under the prior agreement of July. At the time of the attachment there is admittedly no question of any transfer of interest in the property, which, therefore, remained in the vendor. Neither the contract for sale nor the attachment created any such interest. Then as regards the argument that the attachment cannot interfere with the pre-existing rights under O. 38, R. 10, the question arises as to what those rights actually were. The vendor's right was to receive the balance of the purchase money, but only upon execution of the conveyance operating as a transfer and from that he was prohibited in terms of the attachment order: see O. 21, R. 54. In my view when the attachment was made it was an attachment affecting the right, title and interest of the debtor in the property at any rate to the extent of any balance then receivable under the agreement: the debtor's existing interest in the property became thereby affected to that extent and the creditor became entitled to have it applied, in the events which happened towards payment of his debt. That, I think, is the fair effect of S. 64, Civil P. C. and O. 38, R. 10 in the circumstances of the present case.

I would therefore agree with the order proposed to be made in this appeal.

Radha Binode Pal—for Petitioner.

Judgment.—The facts of the case out of which this rule has arisen are these: the petitioner is a widow. Her brother-in-law applied for probate of her deceased husband's estate. Notice was duly served on the petitioner. She duly filed her objection and at the same time made an application for the appointment of a Court Officer to inspect and make an inventory of all the moveables left by her husband, which ran the risk of being stolen and misappropriated by the opposite-party. The learned District Judge rejected the application of the petitioner for making an inventory of the movables left by her husband on the ground that there was no provision for such a proceeding in the Succession Act. S. 268, Succession Act provides that:

"the proceedings of the Court of the District Judge in relation to the granting of probate and letters of administration shall, save as hereinafter otherwise provided, be regulated, as far as the circumstances of the case permit by the Code of Civil Procedure 1908."

Under O. 39, R. 7, Civil P. C., the Court may on an application of any party to a suit make an order for making an inventory of properties. Under the provisions of S. 268, Succession Act a probate Court has the same power in ordering an inventory to be made as the ordinary civil Court has. The rule is therefore made absolute. The order of the learned District Judge is set aside and the case sent back to him to be dealt with in accordance with law.

Central Bank of India, Ltd.—Defendant.

Original Civil Suit No. 2626 of 1927,
Decided on 10th August 1928.

(a) Contract Act, S. 229—Member of pledgor firm also member of pledgee's advisory committee for advancing loan—No notice of pledgor's fraud can be imputed to pledgees—Transfer of Property Act, S. 3.

The fact that a person who was a member of the pledgor firm and who applied for the loan and offered a pledge of the goods as security, was also a member of the local advisory committee of the pledgee Bank, to assist their agent in deciding whether to grant loans, does not fix the pledgees with constructive or imputed notice of the pledgor firm's fraud: In re Hampshire Land Co., (1896) 2 Ch. 743; Houghton and Co. v. Nothard Lowe and Wills Ltd., (1923) A. C. 1, Ref.

(b) Interpretation of Statutes — Words should be given widest possible meaning consistent with context unless otherwise intended by the Act.

When construing an Indian Act, words should be given their widest possible meaning consistent with the context, unless there is something in the Act itself to indicate that they are intended to be used in the artificial and technical sense which they have acquired in English law, or in any other restricted sense.

(c) Interpretation of Statutes—Consideration about previous state of law should not influence examination of language of Statute which should be given its natural meaning.

The proper way to approach the construction of a statute which is intended to be a code of law is in the first instance, to examine the language of the statute and ask what is its natural meaning, uninfluenced by any consideration derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with that view: Bank of England v. Vagliano Bros., (1891) A. C. 107, Foll.

(d) Contract Act, Ss. 178 and 108—Word 'possession' must be given fullest and widest meaning—Contract for sale of goods—Possession with vendor—Third party pledgee or vendee acquires good title when he has no notice of original vendee's interest in the goods.

It is impossible even if it were permissible or desirable, to limit or restrict the natural meaning of the word 'possession' in Ss. 178 and 103 in any way which would be consistent with other sections of the Act, or could be based upon any clear, consistent and comprehensive principle. The extent of the sections should be limited only by giving to the word 'possession' its fullest and widest meaning, both natural or ordinary and technical or artificial, and including both actual possession and possession in law, subject to the provisos therein contained. [P 504 C 1]

Where there was a contract of sale of ready ascertained goods upon credit, and both the property in the goods and the right to possession passed to the buyers at the date of the contract but the goods part of which were paid for, remained in the possession of the sellers who pledged some of them to a third party, the pledgee having no notice of the buyer's interest in the goods.

Held: that the pledge, and even if there was a sale, the sale came within the scope of Ss. 178 and 103 respectively and as such passed a good title to the third party. (Case Law discussed.) [P 504 C 1]

N. N. Sircar, T. Ameer Ali and S. C. Mitter—for Plaintiff.

B. L. Mitter, and W. W. K. Page—for Defendant.

Judgment.—Substantially the facts in this case are undisputed. The plaintiffs are a mercantile firm dealing in cutlery and other goods. The firm of Kerr Tarruck & Co. were an importing firm and for a long time prior to 1927 had been used to import such goods in accordance with orders given by the plaintiffs and sell to them under various agreements. It was not part of the business of Kerr Tarruck & Co. to act as warehousemen, nor did they hold themselves out as such. On 15th January 1927 the plaintiffs and Kerr Tarruck & Co. made a typewritten agreement in the nature of giving plaintiffs a monopoly in Calcutta for one year. This agreement needed the assent of the exporters in Germany, and pending the arrival of that, on 16th February the plaintiffs accepted drafts for goods covered by the agreement of 15th January and a verbal agreement was made in case the exporters' consent was withheld, by which the plaintiffs agreed to take the goods already imported and to be imported under the monopoly agreement at 72 per cent less than the invoice price and make payment therefor within five months from the date of a fresh contract which was to be entered into. Kerr Tarruck & Co. were to draw hundis on the plaintiffs and the particulars of the goods were to be set out on the hundis. Delivery orders were to be issued, but the plaintiffs were to take delivery as they required the goods; meanwhile the goods were to remain in Kerr Tarruck & Co's godowns free of rent. Delivery orders were issued sometimes at the time when the hundis relating to the goods referred to in such delivery orders were accepted, and sometimes earlier and sometimes later. The exporters refused their consent and thereupon on 20th July a list of the goods covered by the agreement, which goods had by that time arrived, was made out and on 21st July a contract was made by which the plaintiffs agreed to purchase from Kerr Tarruck & Co. these goods which consisted of 319 cases of cutlery. This agreement is partly printed and partly typewritten. The latter portion is to the effect that the cases were shipped as per an attached statement, dated 20th July 1927. Payments were to be made within five months from date and deliveries were to be taken within that time. The printed portion is inappropriate to some extent as it is intended obviously to apply to a contract for goods to be imported, whereas on 21st July these were ready goods having already arrived in Calcutta. Payments were to be made by hundis to be drawn by Kerr Tarruck & Co. and accepted by the plaintiffs, and these in fact were drawn payable at various dates within the five months mentioned; and delivery orders were issued to the plaintiffs from time to time; meanwhile pending delivery the goods remained in Kerr Tarruck & Co's godowns.

So far as they are material, Cls. 4 and 5 of the contract are as follows:

(4) We engage to accept on presentation and to pay on or before maturity the draft drawn upon us for the goods shipped in execution of this order.

(5) Should we fail to pay for the goods in accordance with para. 4 of this contract, you are hereby authorized to sell the goods on our account without giving us any notice, by private sale or public auction, and we agree to pay you any loss or deficiency arising on such sale, together with all costs, charges and expenses with usual brokerage and interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. We further agree to pay you all local charges and expenses together with 2½ per cent commission.

The effect of this contract, therefore, was that there was a sale of ready ascertained goods upon credit, and both the property in the goods and the right to possession passed to the plaintiffs at the date of the contract. The present action affects only 140 of the cases, of which 75 cases have been delivered to the plaintiff & 65 remain undelivered which are of the value of Rs. 32,500. Nine hundis were accepted and nine delivery orders were issued. These covered the whole of the goods in suit. Two of the hundis were paid by the plaintiffs. One was unpaid and remained in the hands of Kerr Tarruck & Co., and six were negotiated by them and were dishonoured by plaintiffs on presentation. Full particulars of all these matters are set out in Ex. D. No demand for delivery had been refused prior to the dishonour of the hundis. Plaintiffs made a demand from defendants on 1st December but at that time the six hundis had been dishonoured.

On 12th October 1927, Kerr Tarruck & Co. were adjudicated insolvent and towards the end of November plaintiffs discovered that they had pledged these goods to the defendants on 24th and 25th August 1927. The plaintiff's claim against the defendants is for delivery of goods in suit or Rs. 32,500 their value and interest at 6 per cent until realization.

The following are the issues raised:

(1) Was there an agreement for the purchase and sale of the goods in suit as alleged in para. 3 of the plaint?

(2) Have the plaintiffs paid for the goods and the duty and charges in respect thereof?

(3) If not, were the plaintiffs entitled to demand the goods from the defendant bank?

(4) And was the refusal of the bank to deliver wrongful?

(5) Was there a valid pledge as alleged in para. 5 of the written statement?

(6) Are the plaintiffs entitled to maintain this suit in respect of the goods not paid for?

(7) What damages, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled to?

The main issue to be decided is whether there was a valid pledge and whether the defendants can avail themselves of the provisions of S. 178 or 179, Contract Act. At first the goods lay in godowns rented by Kerr Tarruck & Co. in premises belonging to the Bengal Bonded Warehouse Association, the contents of which godowns were pledged by Kerr Tarruck & Co., to the Imperial Bank, who had a sort of floating charge over all goods of Kerr Tarruck & Co., lying in their godowns at any particular time. When Kerr Tarruck & Co. desired to repledge them to the defendants, they removed the goods, then numbering 95 cases, from the rented godowns to godowns in the same premises controlled by the Bengal Bonded Warehouse Association, who issued warehouse certificates for them and these were endorsed in favour of and handed to the defendants as security. Subsequently 30 out of the 95 cases were delivered to the plaintiffs at their request and upon delivery orders previously issued.

The fact that Mr. B. N. Sircar, the senior partner of Kerr Tarruck & Co., who applied to the defendants for the loan and offered a pledge of the goods as security, was also a member of the local advisory committee appointed under article 117 of the articles of association of the defendant bank, to assist their agent in deciding whether to grant loans, does not, in my opinion, fix the defendants with constructive or imputed notice of Kerr Tarruck & Co.'s fraud. It would not be within the region of common sense to presume that Mr. B. N. Sircar would communicate the facts establishing his own guilt to his colleagues on the advisory committee or to the defendants. In re Hampshire Land Co. (1), Haughton and Company v. Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited (2). Nevertheless I consider the episode unfortunate and the practice inadvisable. To allow members of the advisory committee to recommend loans to be made to one another, is to create a conflict between interest and duty, which might easily give rise to a suspicion of malafides.

The main issue which I have to decide is whether there was a valid pledge, and this will depend upon whether the transaction comes within the provisions of S. 178, Contract Act. That section is as follows :

"A person who is in possession of any goods or of any bill of lading, dock-warrant, warehouse-keeper's certificate, wharfinger's certificate, or warrant or order for delivery, or any other document of title to goods, may make a valid pledge of such goods or documents; provided that the pawnee acts in good faith, and under circumstances which are not such as to raise a reasonable presumption that the pawner is acting improperly : provided also that such goods or documents have not been obtained from their lawful owners or from any person in lawful custody of them, by means of an offence or fraud."

And if the ordinary or popular meaning is given to the word "possession," it is clear that Kerr Tarruck & Co., who were persons who had sold goods and continued in possession of them and who held documents of title to them, fulfilled the requirements of the section.

It is, however, argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the word must be construed in a restricted and technical sense, as has been decided in a line of cases beginning as far back as 1873, and that Kerr Tarruck & Co. were not in possession of the goods, within such restricted meaning, at the time of the pledge. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine these decisions. Greenwood v. Holquette (3) was decided in 1873, shortly after the Act came into operation. It was a case referred for the opinion of the High Court from the Calcutta Small Cause Court, and, therefore, not in the nature of an appeal, and it concerned the sale of a piano let out on a hire-purchase agreement. It was a case, therefore, under S. 108 of the Act, which so far as is material to the present discussion, is as follows :

"No seller can give to the buyer of goods a better title to those goods than he has himself, except in the following cases :

"Exception 1.—When any person is, by the consent of the owner, in possession of any goods, or of any bill of lading, dock warrant, warehouse-keeper's certificate, wharfinger's certificate or warrant or order for delivery, or other documents showing title to goods, he may transfer the ownership of the goods of which he is so in possession, or to which such documents relate, to any other person, and give such person a good title thereto, notwithstanding any instructions of the owner to the contrary : provided that the buyer acts in good faith, and under circumstances which are not such as to raise a reasonable presumption that the person in possession of the goods or documents has no right to sell the goods."

The case was not argued by counsel and the decision was probably one of the first under the new Act. Couch, C. J. held that:

"In construing this Act, which is to be the law of contract for India, we must not adopt as a rule of construction, that it was intended to make the contract law of India the same as the law of England. Indeed, there are reasons for thinking that the legislature intended that in some respects there should be a different law for India; and therefore we cannot refer to any English case as a guide" and that the words "notwithstanding any instructions of the owner to the contrary" indicated an unqualified possession and not restricted otherwise than by the owner giving instructions to the person who has it,

"such for example as that of a factor or agent where the owner of the goods although he has parted with possession may give instructions to the person in possession what to do with the goods," which is the kind of possession that an owner has, and that the section did not apply to a person who has only a qualified possession such as a hirer of goods or where the possession is for a specified purpose, because in such cases the owner has no right to give instructions.

I agree respectfully with the method of construction laid down by the learned Judge. We must look at the words of the section itself and of the Act of which it forms part, and apply ordinary and unrestricted meanings to them, unless it is made clear in the section or in the Act that extraordinary or restricted meanings are intended. The word "possession" has an ordinary and natural meaning, and also a restricted and technical meaning. It is a word of ambiguous meaning and its legal senses, meaning thereby its senses in English law, do not coincide with the popular sense. "Possession is said two waies, either actual "possession or possession in law." (Termes de la Ley). It may mean physical control, sometimes called de facto possession or detention or it may mean legal possession, which may exist with or without de facto possession and with or without a rightful origin. It may also mean the right to possession, which may amount to ownership, or may be of a temporary or special character. In my opinion, therefore, when construing an Indian Act, words should be given their widest possible meaning, consistent with the context, unless there is something in the Act itself to indicate that they are intended to be used in the artificial and technical sense which they have acquired in English law, or in any other restricted sense.

But I disagree, as respectfully, with the conclusion which the learned Judge has drawn, that the words to which he referred indicate that "possession" must be restricted to the kind of possession which a factor or agent has. All that they indicate is that such possession is included, not that all other kinds of possession are excluded. That is to say, they indicate that the provisions of the Factors Acts (13 of 1840 and 20 of 1844) are included in Ss. 108 and 178, not that these sections are co-extensive only with those Acts, which referred specifically only to factors and agents entrusted with goods or documents of title to goods: see Ramdas Vithaldas v. Amerchand & Co. (4).; see also Le Geyt v. Harvey (5), where Sargent C. J. says:

"The language of this proviso is, doubtless, very general, and the omission of the expressions 'agent' and 'entrusted with' used in the repealed Factors Acts doubtless gives the section a larger scope than those Acts possessed as construed by the Courts in England."

The learned Judge went on to say that it would be straining the expression "by consent of the owner" beyond its plain meaning if it were held applicable to cases where the possession was entirely beyond the control of the owner of the goods. However, whether I am right in this view or not, the present case comes under S. 178, which contains neither the words referred to nor the words "by the consent of the owner." Moreover, the possession of a person under a hire-purchase agreement is quite different from that of a vendor of goods who remains in possession, so much so, that the latter has been brought specifically within similar provisions in both the English Factors Act, 1889 and the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, whereas the former has not. And lastly it is clear that the possession of Kerr Tarruck & Co. would pass the tests of both Couch, C. J. and Sargent, C. J., for the goods were not entirely or at all beyond the control of the plaintiffs, who had every right to give instructions to Kerr Tarruck & Co. about them, and who could have asked for and obtained delivery at any time up to the date of the insolvency. In Biddomoye Dabee v. Sittaram (6), goods had been left in a house in charge of a servant during the owner's temporary absence, and he had pledged them. These cases therefore came under S. 178 and were stated for the opinion of the High Court by the Judge of the Calcutta Small Cause Court. No one appeared for the defendants. Garth, C. J. observed that S. 178 was intended to embody the Factors Act, 5 & 6 Vic. C. 39 and that it was never intended to alter the existing law, but to meet the case of an agent entrusted with goods. The learned Judge does not state his sources of information upon which this statement is based, and it was not necessary for his decision; as he points out, the distinction between possession and custody is referred to in the section. The servant never possessed the goods but had only the bare custody of them. The goods remained in the possession of the plaintiff. In my opinion this case is clearly distinguishable. No one would think of describing such goods as being in the servant's possession. The goods were kept in the mistress's house, and it would be as great a misnomer to say that they were in the servant's possession, as it would be to say that the house was in the servant's possession while his mistress was out shopping. Both goods and house remained in both the de facto and de jure possession of the mistress, who retained effective physical control over them. Neither the servant nor any one else had any right to prevent her from entering the house and taking the goods at any moment. Sir James Stephen in his Digest of the Criminal Law, 7th Edn., Art. 401, says that a moveable thing is in the possession of the husband of any woman or the master of any servant who has the custody of it for him and from whom he can take it at pleasure.

In Shankar Murlidhar v. Mohanlal Jaduram (7), a buffalo calf had been left to be taken care of and had been sold by the gratuitous bailee. West, J. held that S. 108 does not extend to every detention of chattels with the owner's consent but has particular relation to persons allowed by the owners to have the indicia of property or possession under such circumstances as may naturally induce others to regard them as owners, and constituting some degree of negligence or defect of precaution imputable to the true owners. In this case also the learned Judge advanced no reasons and quoted no authority for putting this extensive gloss upon the plain words of the section. But he held on the authority of Greenwood v. Holquette (3) that detention for a particular limited purpose, as he described the bailment of the buffalo, was not such a possession as is contemplated by the section. It should be noticed, however, that the possession in this case would have fulfilled both the requirements of instructions given by and being within the control of the owner, which Couch, C. J. and Sargent, C. J. had laid down as their reasons for excluding possession taken for a specific purpose. This only shows in what difficulties and desperate devices one becomes involved in trying to qualify the plain words of a section in such a way as to make it fit one's own preconceived notions of what the law ought to be, or what one thinks the legislators ought to have said, or intended to say. It is sufficient, however, to observe that this was a decision under S. 108 and the detention, whether it amounted to possession or only to bare custody, was altogether different from the possession with which we are concerned in the present case.

In Seager v. Hakma Kessa (8), a wife who lived with her husband had pledged jewellery belonging to him. This again was a case stated by the Chief Judge of the Small Cause Court. Jenkins, C. J. held that to come within S. 178 the pledger must have juridical possession and not mere custody. The word "juridical" does not appear in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, but the expression seems to be only our old friend "legal possession" in a more impressive form. In my opinion, the wife in this case never had possession, either de facto or de jure, any more than she could be said to have had possession of her husband's table silver during his daily absence from home. Possession, both in fact and law, was always in the husband, until the jewellery was removed from his possession by means of an offence such as is indicated in the second proviso to the section. The position of the wife was the same as that of the servant in Biddomoye Dabee v. Sittaram (6).

In Naganada Davay v. Bappu Chettiar (9) a jewel had been hired for four days and then pledged. Boddan, J. held that "possession" meant the same thing in both sections in spite of the difference in wording, that "possession" in S. 178 was distinguished from "custody," and meant such possession as an owner has, and not a qualified possession, such as a hirer of goods has; while Subrahmania Ayyar, J., held that, though the hirer undoubtedly had legal possession, it was not the kind of possession contemplated by S. 178. The learned annotators of Contract and Specific Relief Acts, 5th Edn., at p. 638, are driven to admit that the hirer surely had possession and not bare custody, though they think it impossible to hold that the Act meant to authorize a pledge where the hiring was for only four days and they observe that the language of the Act seems incautiously wide. In my opinion, there is nothing to indicate whether its width is due to lack of caution or to intention on the part of those who drafted it and passed it. But the same annotators at p. 523 say that the clauses corresponding to S. 108 in the Contract Bill drafted by the Law Commissioners provided in effect that a purchaser acting in good faith and in the absence of suspicious circumstances might acquire a good title from any person in possession of goods, in other words, that every place in India should be a market overt. The Select Committee to which the Bill was referred objected to this clause, the ground of objection being substantially that the provision would make British India an asylum for cattle stealers from the Native States. The clause, after a good deal of controversy, was ultimately moulded in its present form and in Ramdas Vithaldas Durbar v. Amerchand & Co. (4), their Lordships of the Judicial Committee said that the Act was an amending as well as a consolidating Act, and that they saw no improbability in the Indian Legislature having taken the lead in a legal reform, for which England had to wait for several years. This was said with reference to the inclusion of a railway receipt within the meaning of an "instrument of title" in S. 103, but it would apply equally to the validation of a sale, pledge or other disposition made by a vendor of goods who continues in possession, for which reform England had to wait until the Factors Act of 1889. However that may be, in Administrator-General of Bengal v. Premlal Mullick (10) their Lordships directed that proceedings of the Indian Legislature cannot be referred to as legitimate aids to the construction of the Act in which they result.

In Nandlal Thakersey v. Bank of Bombay (11) a muccadam entrusted with goods had pledged them, and Bachelor, J., while admitting that the language of S. 178 is very wide and that the Judges in trying to define the exact extent of the section had not adopted the same canon in all cases, held that as the legislature had acquiesced in those restrictive interpretations, and the Judges were agreed at least that mere possession is not enough, the principle of stare decisis ought to be applied, and though he thought that the kind of possession intended was such as a factor has, he refused to attempt to lay down the exact limits of S. 178. He relied, inter alia, upon the so-called distinction, which other Judges had observed, drawn by the legislature between possession and mere custody. But it is not easy to discover the exact meanings of "lawful owner" and "lawful custody" in the section. "Unlawful custody" and still more "unlawful ownership" is difficult to envisage, and it seems that possession, whatever meaning is intended, may be obtained not only from the owner, but from any one having mere custody of the goods, in the absence of offence or fraud.

In Leon Saubolle v. K. V. Seyne & Bros. (12), which was another case of hire-purchase, Greaves, J., while he was of opinion that such came within the provisions of S. 178 considered that he was bound by the decision in Greenwood v. Holquette (3), though in Abdul Hassan Khan v. Rangilal (13), where there was no default in the payment of instalments, the Punjab Chief Court had held that the section applied. The learned annotators, above referred to, admit that the possession in this case was certainly "juridical," and say that the terms of the Act make it difficult to hold otherwise, whatever its framers may have intended. The same Court in Framji v. McGregor (14) held that S. 108 applied to a case where a vendor of certain horses was allowed by the vendor to remain in possession of them.

In Profulla Kumar Bose v. Nabo Kishore Rai (15), defendant 1 employed defendant 2 to take delivery of a parcel of jute which defendant 1 had despatched, consigned to himself. The railway receipt was made out in his own name as consignee, and without endorsing it he entrusted it to defendant 2, for the purpose of obtaining delivery. Defendant 2 endorsed it in the name of defendant 1, and pledged it to plaintiffs who took delivery and on the security of the goods made a loan to defendant 2. Defendant 2 was not an agent whose ordinary business it was to sell or pledge goods. The learned Judges, Richardson, J. and Shamsul Huda, J. referred to the "sweeping provisions" of S. 178, and said that apart from authority, and if the section were construed as it stands:

"it would at least be a possible view that the word 'possession' is used in its ordinary and natural sense and that the draftsman or legislature intended to include all possession recognized as such by the law, and to leave it to the two provisos to limit the scope of the general rule enacted in the first clauses" and they held that as defendant 2 had the indicia of possession which he had acquired under such circumstances, that the owner could give instructions to him as to their disposal, he fulfilled the test laid down in Greenwood v. Holquette (3) and came within S. 178. The learned Judges would seem to have misunderstood the tests suggested in that, and the other cases already referred to. It is quite clear that whether what defendant 2 had, was possession or mere custody, it was not possession such as a factor has, nor was it unqualified, nor such as an owner has. If anything, it was a qualified possession or possession given for a specific purpose, or perhaps only the mere custody of a servant.

In Roopchand Jankidas v. National Bank of India Ltd. (16), certain share certificates and a blank deed of transfer were handed by the bank to an employee for the purpose of getting the shares registered, and he sold them. Chaudhuri, J., held that this was qualified possession given for a particular purpose, and according to the authorities, not within S. 108. But, in my opinion, as the certificates were on the bank's premises they were in the bank's possession, both de facto and de jure, and when the employee removed them with the intention of defrauding his employers he brought himself within the second proviso.

In Ramasami Gupta v. Kamalammal (17) jewels were lent gratuitously and pledged by the borrower after having them a considerable time. It was held that the possession was qualified and for a specific purpose and, therefore, according to the authorities, outside of S. 108.

In considering the effect of these cases I make, in the first place, the general observation that however much I may respect the reasoning and decisions of the learned Judges who tried them, none are binding upon this Court. Secondly, that a careful perusal of their judgments indicates how difficult they found the task of construing these sections, and what doubts they felt about the soundness of the conclusions to which they had come. Thirdly, that a large number of the decisions are upon S. 108, which is very differently worded to S. 178; and lastly that in one of the cases was the position of a seller who remains in possession considered, and certainly not the position of an unpaid seller, as in the present case.

In Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers (18), Lord Herschell in the house of Lords laid down in memorable words, the proper way to approach the construction of a statute which is intended to be a code of law.

"I think the proper course is in the first instance to examine the language of the statute and ask what is its natural meaning, uninfluenced by any consideration derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view."

No difficulty is experienced in construing these sections if the natural meaning is given to the words. The difficulties arise when one begins to have regard to the previous law, or to technical and artificial meaning to which the words have been restricted by English lawyers. No definition of the word "possession" is given in the Act itself, and I can find no clear and reliable indication in the context to show that the legislature intended any but the fullest and widest meaning to be given to it. The word appears in the following sections; — Chap. 7: Sale of Goods Ss. 95, 97, 98, 99, 100, 104, 105 and 108, and Chap. 9: Bailment, Ss. 148, 149, 178 and 180. I think it will lead to endless confusion if one meaning is to be placed on the words in S. 178, and a totally different one in Ss. 95, 97, 98, 100, 104, 105 and 108.

According to the argument advanced by counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs, the word should be replaced in Ss. 95, 97 and 98 by "custody" or some such expression, or at any rate that "a seller in possession of goods sold" in S. 98 is not "a person who is in possession of any goods" in S. 178, or a person who is "by the consent of the owner, in possession of any goods" in S. 108."

I am unable to accept such a contention, and in my opinion, the defendants in the present case were persons in possession of goods within the meaning of S. 178.

It is not perhaps strictly necessary for the purposes of this case to decide whether if they had sold, instead of pledged, the goods they would have come within S. 108; but in my opinion, they would, and the word "possession" has the same meaning in both sections. Further, I consider that it is impossible, even if it were permissible or desirable, to limit or restrict the natural meaning of the word in these sections in any way which would be consistent with other sections of the Act, or could be based upon any clear consistent and comprehensive principle. The extent of the sections should be limited only by giving to the word "possession" its fullest and widest meaning, both natural or ordinary and technical or artificial, and including both actual possession and possession in law, subject to the provisos therein contained. I agree with Mr. Sircar's argument on behalf of the plaintiffs that defendants cannot avail themselves of the warehouse certificates. These documents never belonged at any time to the plaintiffs nor to any one except Kerr Tarruck & Co. In my opinion

S. 178 contemplates documents which have a lawful owner other than the pledgor. This is shown by the second proviso, But I do not think that you can read into this section the words "by the consent of the owner" which occur in S. 108.

I have now to consider only the first proviso to S. 178, it being admitted that the second is not applicable to the facts of this case.

The Indian Penal Code, S. 52 defines "good faith" as follows:

"Nothing is said to be done or believed in good faith which is done or believed without care and attention."

and doubtless the standard required is such as is expected of a man of ordinary prudence. The "reasonable presumption" referred to in the proviso may be regarded as explanatory of the words "good faith."

In approaching this question, it must be remembered that Kerr Tarruck & Co. were an old established firm of the highest commercial reputation, that the defendants had had considerable dealings with them for many years, that the senior partner, Mr. B. N. Sircar, who negotiated this pledge, was a man of the highest repute, so much so, that he had been appointed by the defendants to serve upon their advisory committee in Calcutta, and that not a breath of suspicion as to the financial stability of his firm had arisen at that time.

Their application for a loan, though passed by his colleagues on the advisory committee, all men of high commercial standing and business acumen, was referred by them to the head office for confirmation. They applied for a temporary loan of Rs. 50,000 for two months to be reduced as deliveries were taken by buyers, but only Rs. 30,000 were ever taken up, and they already had a lien against piece-goods of Rs. 1,00,000 but had not availed themselves of it. Further defendants had previously lent money to Kerr Tarruck & Co. on pledge of goods and bonded warehouse receipts. It is suggested, however, that the defendants were negligent because the plaintiffs' name appeared upon some of the invoices for these goods and they omitted to make any enquiry to test the truth of Kerr Tarruck & Co's., statement made in their letter of 8th August 1927 that the goods belonged to them.

In the first place it is to be observed that the invoices were not submitted to defendants as documents of title, but merely to show the value of goods upon the security of which the loan was to be advanced. The invoices were those of German firm of cutlery manufacturers at Solingen and were addressed to Kerr Tarruck & Co., who were the purchasers. Upon some of them (eight out of twenty) under the indent number the plaintiffs' name appeared; in the others the space was blank and they bore dates from 19th November 1926, to 14th April 1927. If the indent name had been observed by the defendants, and if they had deduced therefrom that plaintiffs had an interest in the goods, and had made enquiry of Mr. Sircar, it is hardly likely that he would have been unable to give a plausible explanation. Doubtless large quantities of goods are imported by importing firms such as Kerr Tarruck & Co., under indents which for one reason or another are not taken up by the firms ordering them, and it can hardly be suggested that the defendants ought to have communicated with Kerr Tarruck & Co. Moreover, it is very unlikely that defendants' attention would be drawn to the indent name at all; as they had no reason whatever for doubting the integrity of Mr. Sircar or his firm.

Further, it is urged that as the defendants negotiated some of the hundis accepted by the plaintiffs on one at least of which the cutlery case numbers appeared they ought to have connected this circumstance with the invoices and their suspicion ought to have been aroused. These transactions were in respect of what are known as clean bills, as opposed to bills supported by documents. In my opinion, such care and particularity is beyond any standard which ought to be expected from business men of ordinary prudence and I find, therefore, that defendants acted in good faith within the meaning of the proviso.

These conclusions to which I have come really dispose of the case and make it unnecessary for me to consider the other points which have been raised. As, however, they have been argued, and in view of the fact that my conclusions may be upset upon appeal, I will deal with them shortly.

Assuming that Kerr Tarruck & Co. do not come within the protection given by S. 178, then it is claimed that defendants can avail themselves of the provisions of S. 179, which are as follows :

"Where a person pledges goods in which he has only a limited interest, the pledge is valid to the extent of that interest."

I am not sure that the effect of this section is correctly stated by Scott, C. J., in Lakhamsey Ladha & Co. v. Lakhmichand Padamsey (19), where he says :

"Section 179 does not limit the scope of S. 178, but saves a pledge to the extent of the pledgor's own interest notwithstanding the presence of invalidating conditions falling under one of the provisions to S. 178. In other words, whenever he has an interest, the person in possession of the goods or documents has unconditional authority to charge at least that interest."

The section does not refer to "possession" or to documents. But any person, having a limited interest in goods, may pledge them to the extent of that interest.

Assuming, therefore, that Kerr Tarruck & Co., do not come within the provisions of S. 178, had they a limited interest in the goods, which plaintiffs have not paid for, and to that extent at any rate is the pledge valid? They might have had such an interest, by reason of Cls. 4 and 5 of the agreement of 21st July 1927, if such clauses were intended to apply at all to a sale of ready goods, and by reason of their inchoate right of lien as unpaid vendors upon credit and that interest might have passed to the defendants as pledgees.

Gunn v. Blockow, Vaughan & Co. (20), is an authority for the proposition that in the case of a sale upon credit, the vendor's lien revives when the credit expires without payment having been made, and it makes no difference if the vendors have negotiated the bills by means of which credit was given. The plaintiffs having lost their right to immediate possession of the goods not paid for could not have maintained an action for them in conversion or detinue, which is founded upon that right, even against a wrong doer, Lord v. Price (21). But the pledge itself was a wrongful conversion and plaintiffs' right of action arose, therefore, at that time before the period of credit expired : M'Combie v. Davies (22), and the conversion would itself extinguish any right of lien apart from the fact that a right of lien lasts only so long as the lien-holder continues in possession. I am of opinion therefore, that defendants obtained no right or interest by reason of S. 179. Upon the issue raised whether the plaintiffs can maintain the action in view of their non-payment of customs and other charges for which they were liable to Kerr Tarruck & Co., I find on the evidence that such dues were discharged as and when they arose by virtue of an agreement for adjustment of accounts made between the parties.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the defendants ought to succeed in this suit. Therefore, there will be a decree in their favour dismissing this suit with costs.

Criminal Ref. No. 280 of 1928, Decided on 3rd May 1929, Reference made by Addl. Sess. Judge, Noakhali.

Criminal P. C., S. 107—Even after issuing warning notices to the parties concerned a Magistrate can draw up proceeding against a party under S. 107.

On the basis of a police report warning notices had been issued to the parties concerned on 8th September 1928. On 8th October he drew up proceeding against one of the party under S. 107, Criminal P. C.

Held: that as the order of 8th September 1928 was not final order disposing of the police report, the Magistrate did not become functus officio and was competent to take proceedings under S. 107, Criminal P. C.

Mallik, J.—This is a reference under S. 438, Criminal P. C., made by the Additional Sessions Judge of Noakhali recommending that the order passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Noakhali (Sadar), dated 8th October 1928 be set aside. The facts which have given rise to this reference are briefly these. On 1st September 1928 a report was submitted by the Sub-Inspector of Police whereby he asked the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to draw up proceedings under S. 107, Criminal P. C., against Abdul Mannaf and others. This report of the Sub-Inspector came to the Inspector of Police and the Inspector suggested that both parties might be warned. Thereupon on 8th September 1928 the Magistrate issued warning notice on both parties. Nothing further was done in the matter till the 8th October 1928 when the Magistrate passed the following order:

"Read further police report. Draw up proceedings against the 2nd party under S. 107, Criminal P. C."

Whereupon proceedings under that section were drawn up against the petitioners.

The learned Sessions Judge has given two grounds for his recommending that this order dated 8th October 1928 be set aside. The first one is that although the order of the Magistrate dated 8th October purports to have been passed on a second report, there is nothing in the record of the case to show that such a report ever existed. The learned Magistrate in his explanation does not say anything very definitely about the existence of such a report. That the proceeding under S. 107 were drawn up not on a second report but on the basis of the original report of police, dated 1st September 1928 would appear pretty clear from the proceeding itself. In the proceeding that was drawn up against the petitioners there is a clear statement that the basis of the proceeding was the report submitted by the police on 1st September 1928. It must, therefore, be accepted that the order which has been recommended to be set aside was an order passed on the report of the police, dated 1st September. Now the question is whether the learned Magistrate could pass such an order on the basis of that report of 1st September on which he had passed the order for issuing warning notices to both parties? This would depend on whether the order passed by the Magistrate on 8th September should or should not be taken to be an order finally disposing of the matter. I am of opinion that this order of 8th September issuing warning notices to the parties ought not to be taken as an order disposing of the report of the police finally one way or the other. It cannot be said that the learned Magistrate by issuing the warning order on 8th September ber became functus officio because there is no provision to be found in the Criminal Procedure Code whereby such an order can be passed by him.

In view of the aforesaid observation we are unable to accept the reference.

The reference is, accordingly, rejected.

Criminal Revn. No. 1202 of 1928, Decided on 20th March 1929.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 139-A—Omission in exercise of discretion by Magistrate in following the direction of law does not vitiate the entire proceeding but is irregularity covered by S. 537.

Where a Magistrate issued a notice under S. 133 on a person to show cause why he should not remove an obstruction on a public river and the person filed a written statement admitting the public character of the river but claiming that the obstruction was on his zamindar's khas land and not on the river and the Magistrate proceeding under S. 137 and having come to the conclusion that the obstruction was on the bed of the river, made the order absolute and passed orders for removal of the obstruction.

Held: that S. 139-A ought not to apply to such a case, but the language of the section is so general that even in such a case the Magistrate should exercise a good discretion in following the direction of the law and omission to do it does not vitiate the proceeding but is an irregularity covered by S. 537.

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 139-A—S. 139-A applies where public right is denied.

The section applies only in a case where a party wants determination of the public character of the river or way obstructed. The object with which the section was enacted seems to be that where the existence of the public right is denied, the Magistrate has to make an enquiry. If it is not denied, then the section hardly seems to apply.

B. C. Chatterjee and Akhil Chandra Dutt—for Petitioner.

Mrityunjoy Chatterjee and Debabrata Mukherji—for Opposite Party.

Anil Chandra Roy Chowdhury—for the Crown.

Suhrawardy, J.—This rule was issued on two grounds. The first is that the procedure laid down in S. 139-A, Criminal P. C., was not followed in this case. What happened was that the petitioner was charged with obstructing a river called the Margara river by throwing earth into it and raising the land over which the water used to pass. The Magistrate issued a notice under S. 133, Criminal P. C., on the petitioner to show cause why he should not remove this obstruction. He appeared on the date fixed for showing cause and asked for time. On the following day he filed a written statement in which he admitted that the river said to have been obstructed was a public river but that he had not obstructed it but had built his shop on the land which belonged to his zemindar. He claimed that the land over which he was charged with throwing earth and building was a part of his zemindar's khas land. The trying Magistrate thereafter proceeded under S. 137 Criminal P. C., and being of opinion that the obstruction caused by the petitioner was on the bed of a river he made the rule absolute under that section and passed an order for removal of that obstruction. No doubt S. 139-A requires the Magistrate to ask the party against whom a rule has been issued under S. 133, as soon as he appears whether he denies the existence of any public right in respect of the way, river &c., &c., & if he does so, the Magistrate shall proceed under S. 137 if he finds that there is no ground for such denial.

But in this particular case the omission by the Magistrate to comply with the section does not to my mind vitiate the entire proceeding. On the day the petitioner filed his written statement he admitted therein that the river which is said to have been obstructed was a public river; but he contended that the obstruction which was said to have been put up was not in the river and was upon the land which was his khas land and not a portion of the river. In such cases, strictly speaking, S. 139-A ought not to apply. But the language of the section is so general that I am not prepared to hold that even in such a case as this the Magistrate should not exercise a good discretion in following the direction of the law, but the omission to do it does not necessarily vitiate the entire proceeding. It would be an act of superfluity when a party comes before the Magistrate and admits the public character of the river which he is said to have obstructed to ask him whether he denies or admits its public character. This section applies only in a case where a party wants a determination of the public character of the river or way obstructed. It has been conceded on behalf of the petitioner that if on a notice under S. 133 a party appears before the Magistrate and admits that the way or river which he is said to have obstructed is a public way or river and does not deny the existence of a public right over it but says that he has not put an obstruction in the public way or river but has built upon his own land, S. 139-A does not apply. The present case does not seem to be in any way different from the case I have just put. The question therefore left to the Magistrate for decision is not the existence or non-existence of a public right in the river obstructed but to determine if the obstruction was made in the river. The object with which S. 139-A was enacted seems to be that where the existence of the public right is denied the Magistrate has to make an enquiry. If it is not denied, then the section hardly seems to apply. But it may be said that the dispute between the parties is whether the land over which the obstruction is made is part of a public river and thus attracts the application of S. 139-A. Even if it be so, when the petitioner appeared before the Magistrate and denied that it was part of the public river, there was no necessity for putting a formal question to him and the subsequent procedure followed by the Magistrate was as indicated in the Cl. 2 of that section, and the final order passed was U/S. 137 since the obstruction was admitted. The omission at the most is an irregularity which is covered by S. 537, Criminal P. C.

The second ground relied upon by the petitioner is that the order of the Magistrate is vague and incapable of being carried out. The Magistrate passed an order for removal of the obstruction from a particular settlement dag, namely, dag No. 2,573 which is well-defined in the settlement record; and when notice was served upon the petitioner to show cause under S. 133, Criminal P. C., he did not object on the ground of vagueness of the notice. This ground is suggested by certain remarks made by the learned Sessions Judge to whom an application was made by the petitioner under S. 435, Criminal P. C. The learned Judge suggested that in cases like the present the best procedure was to appoint an ameen to relay the site which would give clear indication to the opposite party as to the extent and nature of the obstruction. This was merely a piece of advice given to the trial Court which might help it in enforcing its order, if necessary. There does not seem to be any vagueness in the order passed in this case and both the grounds having failed, in my opinion this rule shall be discharged.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 203—Accused discharged—Notice to accused before ordering further enquiry is not necessary—Criminal P. C., S. 436.

Where after the dismissal of a case under S. 203 further enquiry is ordered, the accused need not be given notice before further enquiry is ordered against him as he has no locus standi and it cannot be said that it is desirable to issue a notice upon an accused person in every case where an order is passed against him. [P 509 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 203 — Further enquiry after discharge—Accused has no right to appear — Magistrate allowing him to appear is illegality which cannot entitle him to appear at every subsequent stage.

When the order is passed, after an order under S. 203, directing further enquiry the accused has no right under the law to appear either before the trial Court or before the revision Court. And if the Magistrate allowed the accused to appear before the trial Court to cross-examine the witnesses he acted illegally and this illegal act of the Magistrate does not create a right in the accused to appear at every stage of the proceeding: 21 C. Suresh Chandra Taluqdar and Radhika Ranjan Guha—for Petitioner.

Suhrawardy, J.—This rule is directed against an order of the District Magistrate of Bogra ordering further enquiry into the complaint preferred by the opposite party before the Sub-Divisional Officer of Bogra. It appears that the Sub-Divisional Officer on receipt of the complaint ordered an enquiry by the Local President. On receipt of the report of the President he examined two witnesses for the prosecution and disbelieving the complainant's story dismissed the case under S. 203, Criminal P. C. The complainant moved the District Magistrate and he passed the following order :

"I think there should be a further enquiry into the complaint. Further enquiry ordered and the papers sent to Sub-Divisional Officer for favour of dealing with it according to law."

In support of this rule Mr. Talukdar has raised several grounds. The first is that the accused should have been given notice before further enquiry was ordered against him. This contention he has not been able to support on the law as laid down in S. 436, Criminal P. C. But he has invoked the desirability of issuing a notice upon an accused person in every case where an order is passed against him. We do not think that we should accede to such a proposition of law. S. 436 as it stands by the amending act of 1923 clearly makes a distinction between a case in which a complaint is dismissed under S. 203 and the case in which the accused is discharged under S. 253 or some other section. In the latter case it is now provided in accordance with the general opinion of all the High Courts that notice should be given to the accused as he was present at the trial Court and no order ought to be passed in his absence by the Court in revision. But when the order is passed under S. 203 not only has the accused no right under the law to appear either before the trial Court or before the revision Court but it has been held in several cases that the accused should not be allowed to appear at that stage. Balai Lal v. Pasupati (1) and Chandi Charan v. Manindra Chandra (2).

In this case we are told that the accused has appeared at the trial Court. There is no other on the record that he did as no vakalatnama was filed on his behalf. But it appears from an examination of the witnesses of the complainant that they were cross-examined, it does not appear by whom. If the Magistrate allowed the accused to appear at that stage to cross-examine the witnesses he acted illegally and this illegal act of the Magistrate does not create a right in the accused to appear at every stage of the proceeding. In some cases no doubt it has been held that even if in a case where the complaint is dismissed under S. 203 it is desirable to allow the accused to appear before an order is passed under S. 436. But these cases were decided before the amendment of the section ; and as has been rightly observed by Sir John Woodroffe in his well-known edition of the Criminal Procedure Code that the Court in this case as in some other case has legislated in view of certain general principles. I do not think that they have any right to legislate however desirable it may be on principle. This ground must fail. Some argument has been advanced to us on the merits. But I do not think that I ought to interfere at present on that ground.

I should have preferred that the District Magistrate gave his reasons for ordering a further enquiry. But on reading the order passed by him it appears that he was right in passing the order because the trial Court had not tried the case according to law which may mean that it had wrongly allowed the accused to appear before it. The learned District Magistrate has submitted an explanation in which he has given reasons for ordering an enquiry into the matter. This rule is discharged.

Graham, J.—I agree that the rule should be discharged. In my opinion there is no substance in the contention which has been put forward on behalf of the petitioner. It is well-settled that at such an enquiry the accused has no locus standi, and he certainly cannot claim to be entitled as of right to notice where an application is made for further enquiry. That this is so, is plain inter alia from the terms of the proviso to S. 436, Criminal P. C. That proviso was added by Act 18 of 1923 and it expressly provides that in the case of discharge such notice shall be given. By implication it seems to be reasonably clear that in case of further enquiry no such notice is required. If the legislature had intended to provide for such notice it would presumably have said so in clear terms.

(a) Railways Act, S. 72—Word 'loss' in risk-notes—Explained.

The word 'loss' as used in a risk-note means loss of the goods by the railway company while in transit and occurs whenever the railway company involuntarily or through inadvertance loses possession of the goods and for the time being is unable to trace them.

(b) Railways Act, S. 72—'Loss' due to theft by servants of railway—Risk-note does not absolve railway company.

Even where the railway company succeeds in proving that there was 'loss' the provisions of the risk-note will not absolve the railway company from liability if it is once proved that the loss was due to theft by the servants of the company.

Judgment.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiff for recovery of compensation for loss of 24 tins of ghee weighing 11 mds. 10 seers and also of one md. 10 seers of ghee abstracted from out of 20 tins of ghee the said 44 tins forming part of a consignment which had been despatched from Sangli station on the M. & S. M. Ry. to Dubrajpur on E. I. Ry. The trial Court decreed the suit in part against defendant 1 only, namely, E. I. Ry. The decree was in respect of 24 tins of ghee and not in respect of one md. 10 seers. On appeal this decree was affirmed by the District Judge. Defendant 1, the E. I. Ry. Co. have then preferred this second appeal. The findings of the learned District Judge appeared to be the following : that the consignment was covered by risk-note H, that the plaintiff by virtue of the contract embodied in the said risk-note cannot recover unless he is able to show that one or more complete packages have been lost due either to the wilful neglect of the railway administration or to the theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants, transport agents or carriers, provided that the term 'wilful neglect' be not held to include fire, robbery from a running train or any other unforeseen events or accidents. The learned Judge was not prepared to hold that there was any admission on behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that there was any loss. He further held that it had not been satisfactorily proved that there was loss. He went on further and observed in his judgment :

"Admitting for the sake of argument that the goods are really lost the evidence seems clearly to point to the conclusion that the contents were stolen by the company's servants at Ondal station."

He referred to several circumstances which supported the conclusion at which he so arrived. The arguments before us have been directed in the first place to establishing that the loss had been admitted on the side of the plaintiff in the plaint which they had filed. It may be conceded that the learned Judge perhaps took a rather extreme view in holding that the defendants had failed to make out that there was loss. In the letter which the Traffic Manager of the E. I. Ry. wrote to the plaintiff it was stated within a few days after the occurrence to which the present case relates that the consignment was loaded in wagon No. 13335 and proceeded correctly as far as Ondal where the seal of the wagon was found to have been broken into by thieves and contents stolen. There is no reason to suppose that at that time the defendant company invented a story of loss in order to account for the non-delivery of the 24 tins of ghee. The word 'loss' as used in the risk-note means loss of the goods by the railway company while in transit and occurs whenever the railway company involuntarily or through inadvertance loses possession of the goods and for the time being is unable to trace them. For the purpose of the present appeal, therefore, I do not think it would be necessary for us to go so far as to hold that loss has not been proved. But then the question that arises for consideration is whether upon the facts that have been found, the mere fact that the defendant company succeeded in proving that there was loss would absolve them from liability by virtue of the provisions of the risk-note. The circumstances upon which the learned Judge has relied for the purpose of coming to the conclusion that the contents were stolen by the company's servants at Ondal station are mainly these. The train carrying this consignment arrived at the station at about 10-15 A. M., and within five quarters, this is to say, at about 11-30 A. M. information was given to an officer of the company who was examined in the case and who went and found that there was no seal and that the goods were missing. The evidence that has been given in the present case shows that there are about 60 men who guard the station premises by day and night and it must be remembered that there were 24 tins of ghee which were removed and so the removal must have taken a fairly considerable time. The evidence further is that under the rules the guard-in-charge of the train has got to look after the train until the wagons are checked and the train is put into the yard. In this particular case there is no evidence whatsoever to show that between 10-15 A. M. when the train arrived and 11-30 A. M. when in point of fact the wagons were checked the guard was looking after the train. These are circumstances from which it is not at all unreasonable to come to the conclusion as the learned Judge appears to have come to that it was a case of theft and that the servants of the company were responsible for or at any rate concerned in it. The case, therefore, in our opinion, is one which is not protected by the risk-note which covers the consignment. Because once it is proved that the loss was due to theft by the servants of the company the risk-note will not absolve the defendant.

It has next been argued before us that if it be found that the risk-note is out of the way then the case will have to be tried on the footing of the liability of the company under the provisions of S. 72, Railways Act. In support of this contention reliance has been placed upon the decision of this Court in the case of

E. I. Ry. Co. v. Shewbux Roy Ghana-shayamdas (1). In that case it has been laid down :

"That the risk-note is merely a contract absolving the Railway Administration in all cases excepting a few cases specified and with regard to the cases so excepted the risk-note itself, apart from the general law, does not create a liability and the effect of it is not that when a case comes within the exception the rights and liabilities of the parties such as they are under the general law are to be regarded as in any way limited, extended or qualified by the risk-note. The effect of that is not that once a case comes within the exception nothing else need be investigated and under the terms of the risk-note itself the Railway Administration becomes liable. A contrary view would militate against the provisions of S. 72, sub-S. 2, Railways Act to which statutory provision risk-notes owe their origin."

Looking at the case from this point of view it would be necessary to consider whether in point of fact the defendant company have succeeded in showing that they took as much care of the consignment as a man of ordinary prudence would do in the circumstances of the case. In this respect it appears to us that no attempt whatsoever was made by the company to establish anything which might absolve them from liability. The learned District Judge has referred to the fact that neither the guard of the train nor the choukidar who informed the checking clerk nor the police officer who was informed by him and who is alleged to have held an enquiry were examined in this case. We have looked into the evidence of the only witness who was examined on behalf of the company and we find that, if anything, that evidence suggests that there was no care taken by the company in respect of this consignment or at any rate that the rules which have got to be obeyed and which if followed would perhaps afford a check upon occurrences of this nature were not adhered to in the present case. For these reasons, we are of opinion that the decree passed by the learned District Judge is correct and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 341 of 1927, Decided on 26th April 1929, against order of Dist. Judge, Birbhum, D/- 12th May 1927.

* Lunacy Act (1912), S. 62—District Court, within whose jurisdiction lunatic is permanent resident, has jurisdiction to direct inquisition under S. 62, notwithstanding that he temporarily resides in mental hospital outside that district.

Where a lunatic is a permanent resident within the jurisdiction of a particular District Court and has properties in that district and his wife applies to the District Court for the appointment of a person as manager of his properties, that District Judge has jurisdiction to take cognizance of the application, and to direct inquisition under S. 62, notwithstanding the fact that the lunatic temporarily resides in a mental hospital outside the jurisdiction of that Court. [P 512 C 1, 2]

Gopendra Krishna Banerjee—for Appellants.

Judgment.—In this case there is sufficient material on the record to show that the alleged lunatic Nibaran Chandra Mukerji has been sent to the Ranchi Mental Hospital and is confined there as a criminal lunatic. His wife, the appellant before us applied to the District Judge for appointment as manager of his properties and did not desire to be appointed guardian of his person as the alleged lunatic was confined in the Mental Hospital. In the course of the proceedings before the lower Court a post card said to have been in answer to a letter written by the pleader for the wife to the Superintendent of the Ranchi Mental Hospital was placed before the learned Judge. That post card according to the view of the learned Judge was ambiguous and as he was told that the alleged lunatic was residing at Ranchi beyond the jurisdiction of his Court he held that he could not order an inquisition under S. 62, of the Act and in that view he rejected the application. It is beyond question that the alleged lunatic is a permanent resident within the jurisdiction of the Court of Birbhum. He has properties in that district and his wife seeks for being appointed guardian of his properties for the purpose of protecting those properties from being sold in execution of decrees obtained by creditors. It is true that the lunatic is at present confined in the Mental Hospital at Ranchi and for that purpose he may be held to be residing at Ranchi which is beyond the jurisdiction of this Court, but a person may have two residences. Because under certain circumstances he has been placed in the Mental Hospital at Ranchi, it cannot be said that he has abandoned his residence within the district of Birbhum. So he must be held to be a resident within the district of Birbhum notwithstanding the fact that he is temporarily residing at Ranchi. The District Judge has, therefore, jurisdiction to take cognizance of the application and to direct an inquisition under S. 62, Lunacy Act of 1912. In our opinion, it would be quite within the competence of the District Judge to direct an inquisition to the Superintendent of the Mental Hospital for the purpose of ascertaining whether Nibaran Chandra Mukerji is a person of unsound mind and incapable of managing himself and his affairs. On the receipt of the report of the Superintendent of the Mental Hospital the learned District Judge would be in a position to pass proper orders. We, therefore, set aside the order of rejection of the application by the learned Judge and send the case back for hearing in the manner stated above. We request the learned District Judge to take up the matter at his earliest convenience as this matter has been pending for quite a long time and it is absolutely necessary that it should be disposed of as quickly as possible, having regard to the fact that the properties belonging to the alleged lunatic require to be preserved. The costs of this appeal as well as of the application in the lower Court will be paid out of the estate provided the learned Judge finds upon such inquisition as directed that Nibaran Ch. Mukerji is a lunatic. Hearing fee 3 gold mohurs.

Civil Revn. No. 1455 of 1928, Decided on 20th February 1929, against order of Munsif, 1st Court, Khulna.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 47, R. 1—Fraud discovered after decree or order is new and important matter.

Fraud practised upon the Court or upon the party may be discovered after the order complained of is made and may be new and important matter which could not be within the knowledge of the applicant at the time when the decree was passed or the order made and an application for review on the ground of such fraud must be considered on merits. A decree vitiated by fraud may be set aside by (i) suit and (ii) by review of judgment, the latter being the more regular procedure: 10 Cal. 612; 2 C. L. J. 503, Foll. A. I. R. 1922 P. C. 112, Dist. [P 513 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C., S. 115—Other remedy open—In case of clear refusal of jurisdiction, High Court should intervene.

Where the lower Court has refused to exercise jurisdiction by refusing to entertain an application for review based on the ground of fraud, the High Court will interfere in revision notwithstanding the existence of another remedy. [P 513 C 2]

Pramatha Nath Mitra—for Petitioners.Bhudar Halder—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—In this case the learned Munsif has clearly refused jurisdiction in not entertaining the application for review under O. 47, R. 1, Civil P. C., and in holding that the petition was not maintainable. The application was made for review of the order on the ground that fraud was practised upon the petitioner. It has been held in the case of Aushootosh Chandra v. Tara Prasanna Roy (1) that in such a case as this:

"there are two available modes of procedure for setting aside a decree on the ground of fraud; (1) by suit and (2) by a review of the judgment sought to be set aside, and the latter is the more regular mode of procedure."

That was laid down in 1884 by Mr. Justice Wilson. This case has been followed by Chief Justice Maclean in 1905 in the case of Ram Gopal Mazumdar v. Prasanna Kumar Sanyal (2). The law as understood by this Court has been uniform during all these years. Of course, if the plaintiff pursued one remedy, he cannot, being unsuccessful, again have recourse to the other. But, as it has been held that an application for review is a more regular procedure than a suit, I do not think the Munsif was right in throwing out the application without deciding it on the merits.

(2) [1905] 2 C. L. J. 503=10 C. W. N. 523.

The learned Munsif has relied on some cases reported in the Indian cases. One of these cases of Allahabad was pointed out to me by the learned advocate for the opposite party. That is a case where the party pleaded that he had entered into a compromise by reason of coercion and undue influence. That circumstance may not be a ground for review, because it would not fall within the phrase "new and important matter." But fraud practised upon the Court or upon the party may be discovered after the order is made and it may be a new and important matter which could not be within the knowledge of the applicant at the time when the decree was passed or the order made. The Munsif is also wrong in holding that the Privy Council case of Chhajju Ram v. Neki (3) has any application to this matter. That case decided that "any other sufficient reason" as contemplated in O. 47, R. 1, Civil P. C., must be of the same nature as the discovery of new and important matter or evidence. Here the applicant did not ask for a review on the basis of "any other sufficient reason" but upon the ground of discovery of a new and important matter. It is not the practice of this Court, as a rule, to interfere in revision where the petitioner has another remedy which he can pursue in order to gain his end. But where the Court has actually refused jurisdiction to entertain an application, I think it is right that we should set aside the order of the lower Court by which he refused jurisdiction and direct it to try the cases on the merits.

This rule is accordingly made absolute and the case sent back to the lower Court for decision on the merits. The petitioner is entitled to his costs which are assessed at one gold mohur.

Appeal No. 1912 of 1926, Decided on 9th August 1928, against decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Jessore, D/- 26th April 1926.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 5 and 103-B—Tenancy exceeding 100 bighas and recorded in Record-of-Rights as tenure—Kabuliyat expressly stating tenancy to be raiyati and all its incidents as given in kabuliyat also being those of raiyati holding—Presumption under Ss. 5 and 103-B being rebutted by kabuliyat, tenancy was held only raiyati one.

A tenancy exceeded 100 bighas in area and was recorded in Record-of-Rights as a tenure. The lease was a confirmatory lease. But the kabuliyat expressly stated that the tenancy was a raiyati tenancy. Further all the incidents of the tenancy as mentioned in the kabuliyat, such as prohibition of sale, of erection of permanent structures, of digging tanks etc., were those of a raiyati holding.

Held : that the presumption under Ss. 5 and 103-B was rebutted by the kabuliyat, and so the tenancy was only a raiyati one. [P 514 C 2]

Hemendra Chandra Sen—for Appellant.Bijan Kumar Mukherji—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against the dismissal of his suit which is for recovery of possession from the defendant after notice of annulment under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act. The tenancy in question exceeds 100 bighas in area and it was recorded in the Record-of-Rights as a tenure but the first Court found on a reading of the kabuliyat, in which the terms on which the lands were held are recorded that the tenancy that was brought to sale was a rayati tenancy. The learned Additional District Judge reversed this finding relying on the Record-of-Rights and on the presumption under S. 5, Ben. Ten. Act that tenancies exceeding 100 bighas in area are tenures. The learned Additional District Judge was in error in refusing to treat the kabuliyat as conclusive of the nature of the tenancy. He says that the lease is a confirmatory one. This is perfectly immaterial. Even if it is a confirmatory lease, that fact would not assist the respondent because the tenancy referred to in the kabuliyat is a rayati tenancy and if the lease be a confirmatory lease it would follow that the tenancy that previously existed was also a rayati tenancy. However, that is beside the point. It is also open to the parties to enter into a fresh contract; and this is a contract embodied in the registered deed. It expressly states that the tenancy is a rayati tenancy. It prohibits the sale of the tenancy by the tenants. It prohibits the erection of permanent structures, the digging of tank or ditches and the cutting of trees, and it further prohibits the tenants from sub-letting the lands permanently. All these incidents are incidents of rayati holdings and not of tenures. The kabuliyat, as it expressly states, and as its terms prove, was for a rayati tenancy. Therefore, the purchaser of that tenancy at a rent execution sale under the provisions of Chap. 14, Ben. Ten. Act, was entitled to annul the tenancy of the under-tenants.

The appeal, therefore, succeeds. The judgment and decree of the Court of appeal below are set aside and those of the Munsif are restored with costs in this Court and in the Court of appeal below.

Criminal Revn. No. 290 of 1929, Decided on 7th May 1929, against order of Municipal Magistrate, Calcutta.

Jurisdiction—Objection to—Magistrate ordering demolition of a structure—Receiver of that property made a party without leave of the Court appointing him—Defect may be cured by application to the necessary Court specially if the receiver had been actively participating in the proceedings.

The Municipal Magistrate of Calcutta passed an order of demolition of a certain structure and made the receiver of the premises in question a party to the proceedings. Held : however as the proceedings had gone on till the final order was passed without any such point of jurisdiction having been raised and as the Receiver had actively participated in the proceedings, the Opposite Party

N.K. Bose, and Pares Nath Mukherji—for Petitioners.

Probodh Chandra Chatterjee and Gopendra Krishna Banerjee—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—This matter has been brought up from the Court of the Municipal Magistrate of Calcutta who passed an order for demolition with regard to a certain structure against the petitioners in these proceedings. The fifth petitioner is the receiver of the premises in question along with various other properties which were the subject-matter of a partition suit before the Subordinate Judge of 24 Parganas. The ground that has been the subject-matter for argument before us is ground No. 5 of the petition which states that the proceeding is without jurisdiction inasmuch as no leave was obtained from the Court which appointed the receiver. It is not exactly a question of jurisdiction but reliance has been placed upon the principle that before a receiver is made a party to a proceeding the leave of the Court appointing him should be taken. Reference has been made to the case of W. R. Fink v. Corporation of Calcutta (1) which was also the case of an order made by the Municipal Magistrate against a receiver where leave had not been taken and it was held that the order was bad. In the present case leave has not been taken although it appears that the original proceedings brought against petitioners 1 to 4 only were withdrawn on the ground that the property was in the possession of the receiver and would, therefore have expected that the opposite party would have been diligent enough in the course of the proceeding to see that the record was in order and to obtain the necessary leave of the Court, to make the receiver a party to the proceedings. On the other hand, these proceedings had gone on until the final order was made without any point of this kind having been raised before the learned Magistrate and the receiver actively participated in the proceedings that were held. Had the point been taken in the lower Court, the defect would have been at once rectified by an application being made to the Court appointing the receiver. The question now is whether the order should be set aside now on this ground or whether the opposite party should still be allowed an opportunity of putting the matter right by making an application. We have been referred to the case of Sarat Chandra Banerjee v. Apurba Krishna Roy (2) which although not a case of demolition proceedings under the Municipal Act is an authority which goes to show that even at this stage of the proceedings an opportunity may be given to the opposite party to rectify the defect which now appears and although that was a case only of rateable distribution, we think that the present is a case where this procedure ought to be followed.

Let the application, therefore, stand over for a fortnight to enable the opposite party to take this step and subject to that being done let the matter come up on the list after the lapse of that period. The Court will then be in a position to see what has been done. It will be open to the petitioners to urge the other ground on which this Rule was granted.

Appeal No. 2646 of 1925, Decided on 23rd May 1928, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Nadia, D/- 30 June 1925.

Civil P. C., S. 11—Plaintiff claiming rent at Rs. 16—Record-of-Rights in 1918 in plaintiff's favour—Cess-return filed in 1912 showing jama to be Rs. 5-2-5—Plaintiff having previously in 1917 sued for rent at Rs. 16 and obtained full decree ex parte—Suit in 1917 was res judicata and presumption under Record-of-Rights was not rebutted by cess-return.

Plaintiff in a rent suit claimed rent at the rate of Rs. 16 and the entry in the Record-of-Rights of 1918 was in his favour. But in a cess-return filed in 1912 under the Cess Act the jama was Rs. 5-2-5 gandas. The plaintiff in 1917 had sued for rent at the rate of Rs. 16 and had obtained an ex parte decree in full.

Held: that the suit in 1917 was res judicata and the entry in the Record-of-rights was not rebutted by the cess-return of 1912. [P 516 C 1]

Sarat Chandra Bose, Tarakeswar Pal Choudhury and Jnan Chandra Roy—for Appellant.

Khitindra Nath Bose for Rupendra Kumar Mitra—for Respondents.

S. K. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit for rent. The plaintiff claims rent at the rate of Rs. 16 a year. The defence is that the jama is Rs. 5-2-5 gandas. In the trial Court the suit was decreed. The lower appellate Court held that the presumption of correctness of the Record-of-Rights, which is in favour of the plaintiff, had been rebutted and decreed the suit at the rate admitted by the defendants. The plaintiff appeals.

The point in this appeal is whether the lower appellate Court was justified in holding that the presumption of correctness of the Record-of-Rights had been fully rebutted. In coming to his decision the learned Subordinate Judge has relied on a cess-return Ex. 4. It appears that this was filed by the plaintiff as there was an issue whether he got his name registered and lodged cess-return. In Ex. 4 the rate of rent mentioned is Rs. 5-2 5 gandas. The learned Subordinate Judge thinks that under S. 20, Cl. (b), Cess Act, the plaintiff is precluded for claiming rent at a higher rate. Under the Cess Act, returns are filed only at certain times in compliance with notices served by the Collectorate. Ex. 4 was filed in 1912. But in 1917 the plaintiff brought a suit for rent claiming rent at the rate of Rs. 16 and obtained an ex parte decree. Subsequently, the defendants paid up the entire decretal amount and filed a petition alleging full satisfaction. It is contended that this is not res judicata. But that is not the point. The result of the rent suit of 1917 shows that the rent which was mentioned in the previous cess-return had been varied and that for the period in suit the rate of rent was Rs. 16 as now claimed by the plaintiff. Then comes the Record-of-Rights which was finally published in 1918. In this state of the evidence it is wrong to say that the presumption of correctness of the Record-of-Rights has been fully rebutted.

The result is that the decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the trial Court restored with costs in all Courts.

Appeal No. 2361 of 1921, Decided on 10th September 1923, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Third Court, Dacca, D/- 24th June 1927.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent fixed in lump—Tenant not given possession or dispossessed of part of tenancy—Whole rent can be suspended.

The doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely upon this that the rent due is an entire sum in respect of the land demised. Where, therefore, the rent is fixed in a lump there would be suspension of rent on the grounds of dispossession of the tenant by the landlord from a part of the demised premises. So also, if a tenant is not given occupation of the whole of the land demised, the landlord has no right to the entire rent and unless he has a right or some equity to an apportionment he can recover nothing on the contract: *A. Phanibhusan Chakravarti—for Appellants.

Bhagirath Chandra Das—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs and arises out of a suit commenced by them for recovery of rent in kind for the years 1328 to 1331 B. S.

The defence of defendant 2 to the suit is that there ought to be a suspension of rent as he has been dispossessed from a portion of the holding by some of the landlords. The Munsif who tried the suit disbelieved the story of dispossession and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. On appeal the lower appellate Court remanded the suit

“so far as it relates to the claim in respect of the years 1329-31, for fresh trial after a local enquiry by a Commissioner, as to whether any part of C. S. dag 1066 has been in possession of the plaintiffs or their cosharers, as alleged by defendant 2.”

A Pleader Commissioner was appointed to investigate if the plaintiffs had enencroached on a portion of the holding and he found that the tenant defendants have been dispossessed from 1 katha 1 dhur out of their holding; the Commissioner also found that the defendants dispossessed the plaintiffs from a portion of their own land. The Munsif after remand held that there had been a dispossession of the defendants from a very small area and he decreed the suit in part.

An appeal was taken to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Dacca and he found that the plaintiffs admitted before the Commissioner that defendant 2 was in possession up to the line joining stations Nos. 1 and 2. He further found that the plaintiffs have erected a privy on a portion of the land coloured yellow in the Commissioner's map and that they throw refuse matter on the land and night soil from the privy comes over a portion of the defendant's land. The Subordinate Judge said:

"as I am satisfied on the evidence on the record that the defendants have been dispossessed from a portion of the holding I hold that the rent should be suspended till the tenants are restored to the possession of the land upon the principle clearly defined in Dwijendra Nath Roy v. Aftabuddin Sardar (1)."

The evidence of the defendants shows that defendants have been dispossessed from an area which may be either one-fourth of a kani or half of a kani which is said to be approximately equivalent to a bigha. The defendants also deposed that the plaintiffs throw refuse on that portion thereby rendering cultivation absolutely impossible. The Subordinate Judge after arriving at the findings to which I have referred dismissed plaintiff's suit for rent.

The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court. It has been contended on behalf of the appellant that there has been no proper reversal by the lower appellate Court of the finding of the trial Court that there has been no dispossession by the plaintiffs. It has also been urged that the dispossession by the plaintiffs was not of such character or extent as to attract the principle of entire suspension of rent. It is not disputed in this case that the rental was a lump rental and not at so much Aris of paddy per bigha. Plaintiffs who are cosharer landlords to the extent of six annas share (remaining ten annas share belonging to the other pro forma defendants) allege that their collections are separate and that the defendant tenants did not deliver paddy which was due to be delivered to them in their share. With regard to the ground urged viz. that there has been no proper reversal of the finding of the first Court on the question of dispossession I think there is no substance in it for the lower appellate Court has found on an examination of the evidence that the defendants had been dispossessed from a portion of the holding. That finding is binding on me in second appeal. The evidence shows that the dispossession has been from at least  $\frac{1}{4}$ th of a kani i. e., nearly 5 kattahs in a holding which is said to be about 2 bighas in area. This is a substantial dispossession and as the rental was a lump rental the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Katyayini Debi v. Uday Kumar (2) applies. In that case their Lordships of the Judicial Committee said:

"The doctrine of suspension of payment of rent, where the tenant has not been put in possession of part of the subject leased, has been applied where the rent was a lump rent for the whole land leased treated as an indivisible subject. It has no application to a case where the stipulated rent is so much per acre or bigha."

As I read this case where there is lump rental and there has been a dispossession from a part of the holding it is the view of their Lordships that the entire rent must be suspended.

The Munsif agreeing with the Commissioner found that there has been dispossession of defendants from about 1 cottah 1 dhur of land of dag 1066 which was leased to the defendant. But the Commissioner found that the defendant encroached on some other plot of plaintiff's land to the extent of 1 cottah and from this the Commissioner and the Munsif thought that the encroachment on the demised premises was only to the extent of  $\frac{1}{20}$ th dhur. The Subordinate Judge was right in pointing out that the question of encroachment by the defendant on some other land of the plaintiff was not raised by the plaintiff and the Munsif and the Commissioner made a new case for the plaintiff in considering this act of the defendant in encroaching on some other land of the plaintiff as having a bearing on the question of plaintiff's dispossession from the demised premises. Indeed it seems to me that the question of encroachment by the tenant on some other land of the landlord is foreign to and is not relevant to the controversy as to the extent of dispossession of the defendant by the plaintiff from the demised premises. The Subordinate Judge did not accept the Commissioner's boundary line between plaintiff's dag 976 and defendants' dag 1066. He found the ridge dividing the two plots to be the boundary between the two plots and that the plaintiffs admitted that the defendants were in possession up to the line joining stations 1 and 2. He found on the evidence that the dispossession was from a portion of the holding and the evidence shows that the dispossession was  $\frac{1}{4}$  kani in an area of  $1\frac{1}{4}$  kani. I think this was dispossession of such a substantial portion of the disputed area as entitled the defendant to suspension of rent in a case where the rent was a lump rental of 3 aris (each ari—2 mds) of paddy.

The learned advocate for the appellants argued that there ought to be proportionate abatement of rent. It has, however been held in this Court for a long series of years that in the case of lump rental, there ought to be suspension and not proportionate abatement of rent. On 14th May 1869 Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J. referred to the following statement of the law in Bacon's Abridgment Tit, Rent (M)

"Where a lessor enters forcibly into part of the land, there are variety of opinions whether the entire rent shall not be suspended during the continuance of such tortious entry, and it seems to be the better opinion and the settled law at this day that the tenant is discharged from payment of the whole rent till he is restored to the whole possession, that no man may be encouraged to injure or disturb the tenant in his possession whom, by the policy of the law, he ought to protect and defend."

The principles to be gathered from the earlier cases is that if even the landlord dispossesses the tenant from a portion of the demised premises there should be no apportionment of rent, the whole rent being equally chargeable on every part of the land, demised. See Dhunput v. Mahomed Bazim (3). In the case of Harro Kumari v. Purna

Chandra (4), Sir Francis Maclean, C.J. and Banerjee, J. extended the principle of suspension of rent to a case where the tenure was held under a lease which reserved rent at a certain rate per bigha applying the principles laid down in the English and Indian cases referred to in the case in Dhunput v. Mahomed Kazim (3). In view of the decisions in Uday v. Katyani (2) to which I have referred, this decision cannot be held to be good law now. In Ananda Prasad v. Mathura (5), Chitty, J., for the first time questioned how far the technicalities to be found in English law should be allowed to affect the relations of landlord and tenant in this country. Even in 1919 in the case of Manindra Chandra v. Narendra Chandra (6), Fletcher, J., with whom Cuming, J., concurred held following the case of Neale v. Mackenzie (7), that where the landlord having let out a portion of a land to an earlier lessee lets it out again to a subsequent lessee and fails to deliver to the subsequent lessee possession of the entire land leased to him the entire rent is suspended. Fletcher, J., pointed out in that case that the case of Neale v. Mackenzie (7) has always been considered good law and with reference to the argument that the decision of the English Court should not be applied to the system of law in this country observed as follows:

"But the rule that rent is suspended on account of the dispossession of the tenant by the landlord from a portion of the holding has been recognized in a number of cases in this Court and, in my opinion it is not open to question now."

It was in this state of the authorities that the matter came up for consideration before their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Katyani v. Uday (2), and their Lordships said in the passage already quoted that:

"the doctrine of suspension of payment of rent where the tenant has not been put in possession of part of the subject leased, has been applied where the rent was a lump rent for the whole land leased treated as an indivisible subject."

In my opinion these observations recognize the rule laid down by the Indian decisions that where the rent is fixed in a lump there would be suspension of rent on the ground of dispossession of the tenant by the landlord from a part of the demised premises. In the case of Sushil Kumar v. Rajani Kanta (8), B. B. Ghose and Roy, JJ., thought that these observations of their Lordships were no authority for the proposition that there should not be any apportionment in any case of dispossession by the landlord of the tenant from a part of the demised premises, where the rent is a lump rental. With great respect to the learned Judges I am unable so to read the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee. As I read the judgment their Lordships intended to lay down that the rule of suspension of rent would apply in the case where the rent was a lump rental and not to a case where the rent was so much per bigha. Besides the observations of B. B. Ghose and Roy, JJ., are obiter as they were made in a case where the rent stipulated was at the rate of Re. 1-10-0 per bigha. It is also to be noticed that B. B. Ghose in an earlier case Bisweswar v. Kali Charan (9) expressed himself thus :

"It is true the rule of suspension of rent on account of eviction by the landlord of the tenant from a portion of the demised premises has been adopted in this Court in a series of cases and it is too late to question the adoption of that rule in our Court now."

The true rule is laid down in the case of Sajjed Ahamad v. Trailokya Nath (10) a decision to which I was a party where the learned Chief Justice said

"But the doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely upon this that the rent due is an entire sum in respect of the land demised. If, therefore, the tenant is not given occupation of the whole of the land demised, the landlord has no right to the entire rent and unless he has a right or some equity to an apportionment he can recover nothing on the contract. But the whole basis of the doctrine is that rent due is one entire sum."

I can find no right or equity in this case in favour of plaintiffs so as to entitle them to an apportioned rent.

I think the lower appellate Court has taken the right view and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

* (a) Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 33—Suit for ejectment dismissed — Pending appeal one plaintiff dying and his representative not brought on record — Although other plaintiffs have no absolute right to go on with appeal, still, in proper cases, Court should allow amendment of plaint so as to pray for joint possession instead of khas possession and should go on with appeal — Civil P. C., O. 6, R. 17.

Where a suit for ejectment is dismissed and pending the appeal from the trial Court's decree, one of the plaintiffs-appellants dies and his representative is not brought on record, the other plaintiffs-appellants have not an absolute right to go on with the appeal, but the Court, in a proper case, should give liberty to them to amend their plaint by seeking for joint possession only instead of khas possession ; for the difference between relief of khas possession claimed and the relief of joint possession subsequently sought is not in itself sufficient to debar the Court from permitting the plaint to be amended, if that would enable the appellants to go on. Where one of the plaintiffs-appellants died pending the appeal from a simple dismissal of the suit, the appeal cannot abate on the ground that the decision with reference to the deceased plaintiff in the trial Court would be contradictory to the decision as regards the other plaintiffs if the appeal should succeed. Bijan Kumar Mukherji for Rupendra Coomar Mitter and Parmananda Lahiri—for Appellants.

Tarakeswar Pal Choudhuri and Nirmal Kumar Sen—for Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case, three plaintiffs brought a suit in ejectment against certain defendants making the case that the defendants were occupying the land in suit by erection of huts and living therein by permission of the plaintiffs, that they had been in the plaintiffs' employ but that the defendants had procured an entry to be made in the Record-of-Rights in which they were recorded as tenants of defendant 3. Accordingly, it appears that the permission for continuing the occupation had been determined and the plaintiffs brought their suit for ejectment of defendants 1 and 2. The first Court dismissed the plaintiffs' suit holding that the defendants had been in possession adversely for a sufficiently long period to bar the plaintiffs' claim. An appeal was taken by all the three plaintiffs to the lower appellate Court and then one of the plaintiffs died. No steps were, however, taken by the other plaintiffs-appellants to have the representatives of the deceased plaintiff added as parties appellants. In these circumstances, time having elapsed so that the appeal as regards the deceased plaintiff had abated, a question arose in the lower appellate Court whether the whole appeal had become incompetent; and the learned Additional District Judge of Jessore being of opinion that the whole appeal had become incompetent dismissed it without entering into the merits.

In this appeal, it is argued before us that the whole appeal had not become incompetent and that it was possible for the surviving plaintiffs to proceed with the appeal in order that they might in the appellate Court obtain a decree for being put in possession jointly with the defendants of the land in suit. The main principle on which they rely is the principle laid down by Sir Richard Garth in the case of Radha Prosad Wasti v. Esuf (1). On the other hand, it has been contended on behalf of the respondents that the cases of Kali Dayat v. Nagen- dra Nath (2), Manindra Chandra Nandi v. Bhagabati Debi (3), Naimuddin Biswas v. Maniruddin Lashkar (4), Mindapur Zemindari Co. v. Amulya Nath Roy (5), as also the earlier case of Dharanjit Narayan Singh v. Chandeshwar Prosad Narain Singh (6), show that this appeal had become incompetent and for two reasons, first of all, because the suit as framed would have been defective in the absence of the deceased plaintiff and secondly, because, if the judgment of the trial Court must stand so far as regards the deceased plaintiff, then should this appeal be entertained and be successful, there would be conflicting and contradictory decisions in the same suit about the same subject-matter.

The question is one which is likely to arise in many cases and it is necessary to decide the matter on principle. It appears to me to be strictly speaking true that the suit as framed would have been defective in the absence of the deceased plaintiff. That is because it was a suit in ejectment and the joint title of the three plaintiffs and the right of the three plaintiffs to possess were clearly not vested in two of them alone. On the other hand, it is to be remembered that in a suit for ejectment by two out of three persons entitled remedy may be given by a decree for joint possession. It often happens that a plaintiff sues for khas possession and gets a decree for joint possession, particularly, where it is possible to specify the share. I think, however, that it is clear that, in the absence of the deceased plaintiff's representatives, the other plaintiffs had not an absolute right to go on with the appeal. They could only go on with the appeal, if it seemed fit to the Court to allow them to go on to get a somewhat different form of relief to that which they originally claimed. I see no difficulty in the matter. I do not think that mere difference as regards the relief claimed in the plaint and the relief now sought, the difference between khas possession and joint possession, is in itself sufficient to debar the Court in a proper case from permitting the plaint to be amended, if that would enable the appellant to go on.

It is said, however, that there is another reason why the appeal could not be entertained. That is because the decision with reference to the deceased plaintiff in the trial Court would be contradictory to the decision as regards the other plaintiffs if this appeal should succeed. I am not impressed with that argument. It appears to me that this is a case where the claim has simply been dismissed. What has been determined as regards the deceased plaintiff is that he is not one of three persons entitled to eject the defendants. In my opinion, this is not a case where there would be such a contradiction as would make it impossible to proceed with the appeal. It is a different matter when the suit is for a declaration that a certain entry in the Record-of-Rights should be corrected from one thing to another. In that case, it may well be that much anomaly would be produced by endeavouring to prove one state of things for one purpose and another state of things for another purpose. All that happened here was that, as the result of the trial Court's decision, the deceased plaintiff was held entitled to no relief at all as against the defendants. I see no practical reason why this appeal should not go on.

It will be observed from the cases referred to above that not one of them is a case where one of the plaintiffs appellants died pending the appeal from a decree of simple dismissal of the suit. It is a very different matter when complaint has to be made that the party has not impleaded one of his adversaries. In all the cases to which I have referred, except, I think, in the case reported in 32 Calcutta Weekly Notes 299, the defendants were appealing and one of the plaintiffs-respondents had died without his heirs being substituted. In my judgment, it is not necessary or desirable that the law should regard the appeal as incompetent unless there is sound reason in principle.

In this case, it seems to me that the correct order would be to give liberty to the appellants to amend their plaint by seeking for joint possession only and to do that on terms that they must pay costs in all the Courts including this Court. On these terms, it seems to me that there is no reason why the appeal should not be allowed to proceed as an appeal in a case where the claim is for joint possession. I do not think that the mere fact that there has been no enquiry as to the extent of the surviving plaintiff's share would be any difficulty. The plaintiffs may, if they succeed, be given joint possession and then it will be a matter of no great difficulty if it becomes necessary to bring a partition suit to ascertain that share. I think this appeal should be disposed of in that way. The case will be sent back to the lower appellate Court with these observations. The appellants will have a month's time from the date of the arrival of the record in the lower appellate Court to pay the costs. In the event of their not paying the costs within the time limited, this appeal will stand dismissed with costs.

Buckland, J.—This is an application to admit an appeal which it is sought to prefer against the judgment and order of Page, J., dated 14th August 1928, whereby he recorded a finding that it was expedient in the interests of justice that an enquiry should be made into certain offences specified by him and ordered that a complaint thereof be made in writing signed by himself and forwarded to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta.

The Registrar has endorsed upon the memorandum of appeal :

"I am unable to admit this appeal. It is open to appellant to apply to the appeal Court."

The reason given for this is that the requisition for office copy was given after the expiry of 20 days. Prima facie the registrar would appear to be right and to have correctly applied the well known rule applicable, but this application does not depend on any such consideration and no useful purpose would be served by reciting the several dates upon which the various steps customary between the making of an order and the presentation of an appeal were taken.

The learned Judge on 30th August, pursuant to his finding and order of 14th August, signed the complaint which he had ordered to be made. That document, of which we have been shown a copy, recites the suit in which the alleged offence took place, the fact that it was heard and determined before him, the application made to him under S. 476, Civil P. C., in circumstances and based upon materials which the complaint sets out in detail, his order thereon, and concludes as follows :

"Now I being the Judge who heard and determined the said suit No. 2178 of 1927 do make a complaint against the said Ramjan Ali pursuant to S. 476, Criminal P. C., that he the said Ramjan Ali has committed the said above mentioned offences ; and I annex to this complaint a certified copy of the judgment which was delivered by me in the said suit, and which is marked Ex. A."

In his procedure and the terms of his order and complaint the learned Judge has been careful to observe the provisions and language of the section and no exception can be taken to the course which he has followed.

An appeal is allowed by S. 476-B, Criminal P. C., which provides :

"Any person on whose application any civil, revenue or criminal Court has refused to make a complaint under S. 476 or S. 476-A or against whom such a complaint has been made, may appeal to the Court to which such former Court is subordinate within the meaning of S. 195, sub-S. (3)."

The arguments submitted by learned counsel on either side turn upon the question whether an appeal against an order made by a Judge exercising the original jurisdiction of the Court to a Division Bench of the Court, lies under S. 476-B or under Cl. 15 of the Letters Patent. If the latter, it is submitted that nothing in the terms of S. 476-B can avail the applicant to save limitation, for Art. 151, Lim. Act would apply and time would run from 14th August, the date of the order appealed against. If on the other hand the appeal is under S. 476-B, the section furnishes a starting point for limitation in the date of the complaint, for until a complaint has been made no appeal can be preferred under the section. In that case a further point arises, whether the article of the Limitation Act applicable is Art. 151 or Art. 155, for while the contention advanced on behalf of Mr. Sircar's client leaves no room for any such question, that advanced on behalf of the applicant leaves it still open.

These two views depend upon the interpretation to be placed upon the words "may appeal to the Court to which such former Court is subordinate within the meaning of S. 195, sub-S. (3)."

The sub-section there referred to provides that a Court shall be deemed to be subordinate to the Court to which appeals ordinarily lie from the appealable decrees or sentences of such former Court. Ordinarily appeals lie from a single Judge of the Court to a Division Bench, but as the language of S. 476-B and S. 195(3) contemplates two Courts it is contended that they have no application. No doubt both a Judge sitting singly and a Division Bench both exercise the jurisdiction of the same Court, though the one exercises the original and the other the appellate jurisdiction of the Court. But it would be entirely contrary to the spirit of the Act to hold that by reason of this the sections are inapplicable. The definition of subordination is an arbitrary or conventional definition intended in my opinion to meet all cases where the Court of first instance is not subordinate to the appellate Court in the ordinary sense of the word, and it must, therefore, be taken to comprise the case in point. To hold otherwise would lead to a most anomalous position. Though, if Mr. Sircar's contention is correct, it would be open to a Judge exercising original jurisdiction to make an order, as Page, J., has done, under S. 476 in respect of one of the offences specified in S. 195, the Bench which heard an appeal from the judgment and decree made in the suit would have no power to do so.

Authority on the point is not, however, lacking for it arose in Munisamy Mudaliar v. Rajaratham Pillai (1). In that case a single Judge on the Original Side of the High Court, under S. 195, Criminal P. C., granted sanction to prosecute in respect of an offence specified in that section. An appeal was preferred and it was contended that under S. 195, Sub-Ss. (6) and (7), which for the immediate purpose are indistinguishable from S. 195 (3) of the Code as since amended, no appeal lay to the Division Bench of the High Court. A Full Bench of the Madras High Court, though the learned Judges guarded themselves against expressing any opinion as to whether a single Judge is subordinate to a Bench in any other sense, decided that as appeals ordinarily lie to a Division Bench from a Judge sitting alone the Division Bench of the Appellate Side of the Court had power to revoke the sanction. The same test of subordination was applied by the Bombay High Court in Abdul Latiff v. Haji Tar Mahomed (2) and it was decided that an appeal lay to a Division Bench from an order made by a single Judge on the Original Side granting or refusing sanction to prosecute.

In my judgment the view taken by the Madras and Bombay High Courts is correct and the appeal lies under S. 476-B, Criminal P. C. The question whether any appeal would lie under Cl. 15, Letters Patent does not arise and indeed, in the present state of the law, it is difficult to see how it ever could arise.

In this view it becomes apparent that limitation must be held to run from the date of the complaint, for the words of the section make it clear that it is only on the refusal to make a complaint or on a complaint being made that an appeal is possible. But for this it would undoubtedly be open to argument that time ran from the date of the finding and order that a complaint should be made. As it is, though the order to be appealed against is that directing a complaint to be made, in this case the order of 14th

August, nevertheless, for the reasons stated and contrary to the usual rule, time does not begin to run until the complaint has actually been made. It was suggested that time did not run until the complaint reached the Magistrate to whom it was directed to be sent under S. 476, on the ground that until it reached him there was no complaint, but this cannot be the case because S. 476 says that ;

"such Court may . . . . . make a complaint . . . . . and shall forward the same to a Magistrate . . . . ."

On this point also there is authority. For the same reasons as I have given already the Lahore High Court in Fitzholmes v. Emperor (3) held that time runs from the date of the making of the complaint. This was followed by the Bombay High Court in Emperor v. Daga Devji Patil (4) in which Fawcett, J., observed that until the order, being the finding under S. 476, is supplemented or completed by an actual complaint it is for the purpose of S. 476-B incomplete.

This brings me to the final point, viz., the period of limitation applicable. Both Arts. 151 and 155 have been referred to, the two periods of limitation prescribed being 20 and 60 days, respectively. The order to be appealed against is dated 14th August, but the complaint is dated 30th August. The Court closed for the vacation on 14th September and as the Memorandum of appeal was presented on the day upon which the Court reopened it was presented within time whichever may be the Article applicable. The question, which is by no means free from difficulty, need not, therefore, be decided on this application. If as has been held Nasaruddin Khan v. Emperor (5) the procedure relating to appeals under S. 476-B is governed by the Civil and not the Criminal Procedure Code, the point is one which cannot be determined exclusively upon the wording of the two Arts and as it has not been argued fully, though we were referred to Budhu Lal v. Chattu Gope (6) and Chunder Kumar Sen v. Mathuria Debya (7), I express no opinion in regard to it.

In my judgment the appeal must be admitted as it is within time and the respondents must pay the costs of this application, but I desire to add a few observations as to the practice. S. 476 requires a finding and complaint. I have known, indeed I have done it myself, a direction given that the judgment in the suit out of which the matter arises shall be treated as the complaint, in which case a copy of the judgment has been signed by the Judge and sent by the registrar to the Magistrate. Unless the judgment has been framed with that end in view, this may lead to a want of precision and ambiguity which should be avoided at all times, but especially in a criminal matter. The example set by Page, J., of a separate order containing the requisite finding, setting out in detail specific matters extracted from the proceedings, and directing a complaint to be made in respect thereof, this being followed by the complaint which conforms to the terms of the previous order, is greatly to be preferred. Such a course avoids the possibility of any mistakes as to what is intended. In a matter which recently came to my notice when one of a Division Bench it appeared that another Division Bench of the Court when deciding an appeal under S. 476-B directed that a complaint should be made against a particular individual. The case then went back to the Chief Presidency Magistrate who himself made a complaint after a lapse of time. This was certainly wrong. The Division Bench had intended that their judgment should take the place of the complaint. In the circumstances of that case no one was ultimately prejudiced, but the case affords an illustration of the advantage to be gained by a procedure such as Page, J., adopted in the present case.

Appeal No. 28 of 1928, Decided on 5th March 1929, against original order of Dist. Judge, Rajshahi, D/- 20th September 1927.

When on account of the claim being allowed under O. 21, R. 60, a property is released from attachment and the decree-holder brings a suit as provided under O. 21, R. 63, and that suit is decided in his favour the result is that the attachment is revived although the property was released from attachment: 23 Cal. 829; 33 Cal. 1158; A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 101; A. I. R. 1922 Mad. 176, Foll. [P 525 C 2]

Attachment does not create any title in favour of the attaching creditor. It merely prevents private alienations.

The position of the attaching creditor does not confer any title upon him in the property in question and he is only entitled to be classed with other creditors all of whom are entitled to rateable distribution of the assets in the hands of the receiver. Such creditor has no higher right than that of any other unsecured creditor and he is not entitled to have his decree satisfied in full out of the sale proceeds of the property attached by him.

* (c) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 52—Section contemplates both moveable and immovable properties attached.

The opening words of S. 52 refer to attachment of any kind of property which is saleable and need not be confined to moveable properties alone. Where immovable property is attached in execution of a decree it is commonly stated that the property is in custody of the Court and there is no reason to suppose that the legislature meant that the attaching decree-holder would have a charge for his costs where moveable property is attached but he would be entitled to no such relief if immovable property is attached by him although the proceedings relating to the attachment of the property are taken at considerable cost of money, and trouble. The true construction is that S. 52, refers to the case of attachment of all kinds of property and is not confined to moveable property alone.

* * (d) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 52—"Costs of execution" include costs for suit under O. 21, R. 63.

Where attachment has been revived under O. 21, R. 63, Civil P. C., the proceedings in suit which led to the order of attachment should be considered as proceedings in furtherance of execution and the expression "costs of the execution" should have a liberal interpretation so as to include the costs of the suit brought under O. 21, R. 63 of the Code in which the creditor succeeded in having the order under R. 60 releasing the property from attachment set aside.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by a creditor who is described as creditor No. 4 against the order of the District Judge of Rajshahi dated 20th September 1927, made in an insolvency proceeding. The appellant had obtained a decree for over Rs. 5,000 on 16th July 1914. In 1915 he attached a house as belonging to his judgment-debtor, since adjudicated insolvent. Four claim cases were started by the sons of the judgment-debtor who alleged that the property attached did not belong to the judgment-debtor but to themselves. Those claims were allowed on 23rd August 1915 and the property released from attachment.

On 18th May 1916 the appellant brought a suit as provided under O. 21, R. 63, Civil P. C. for a declaration that the property belonged to his judgment-debtor and not to the claimants. In this suit the claimants and the judgment-debtor were made defendants. The suit was decreed in the trial Court on 30th September 1921. The claimants appealed against that decree to this Court and the final decree of this Court was made on 22nd March 1924. In the meantime on 5th November 1921, the judgment-debtor was adjudicated insolvent and a receiver was appointed of his properties. The property which was the subject-matter of the suit brought by the appellant was not included in the schedule of the properties of the insolvent. The receiver did not take possession of the property nor did he take any interest in the litigation relating to that property. After the decree of the High Court setting aside the order releasing the property from attachment and declaring that the appellant could proceed in execution against the property in suit as belonging to his judgment-debtor, the insolvent judgment-debtor applied in the insolvency proceeding on 30th July 1924, for including the property in question in his schedule. After that date the receiver took possession of the property and proceeded to sell it. The present appeal arises out of an application made by the appellant that the whole of his decretal amount should be paid first out of the assets realized by sale of the disputed property on the ground that as the property was made available for the creditors of the judgment-debtor at his instance he was entitled to a first charge on the property. The argument was based upon the fact that the result of the decree in the suit brought by him was that the attachment that was effected in 1915 in execution of the appellant's decree was revived and it should be considered as having continued throughout and this attachment constituted a charge on the property. He is therefore entitled to preference to other creditors. The learned Judge rejected that contention holding it to be wholly untenable and that the appellant must rank equally with other unsecured creditors in the distribution of the assets. The appeal is against that order and the appellant claims that the whole of his dues should be paid first out of the assets realised by the sale of the property in question.

It is true that when on account of a claim being allowed under O. 21, R. 60, Civil P. C., a property is released from attachment if the decree-holder brings a suit as provided under O. 21, R. 63, and that suit is decided in his favour, the result is according to the authorities that the attachment is revived, although the property was released from attachment under R. 60. The authority for this proposition is to be found in the cases of Bonomali Rai v. Prosonno Narain Choudhury (1), Ram Chandra Marwari v. Mudheswar Singh (2), Protap Chandra Gope v. Sarat Chandra Gangopadhyaya (3) and Anthaya v. Manjaiya (4). It may, therefore, be held that the property was subject to attachment at the time when it was included in his schedule by the insolvent on 31st July 1924 and when the receiver took possession of it. But the effect of this attachment is surely not what appellant claims it to be. Attachment does not create any title in favour of the attaching creditor. It merely prevents private alienation: see the cases of Moti Lal v. Karrab-ul-din (5) and Raghunath Das v. Sundar Das (6). The position of the appellant as an attaching creditor did not, therefore, confer any title upon him in the property in question and he is only entitled to be classed with other creditors all of whom are entitled to reteable distribution of the assets in the hands of the receiver. The rights of an executing creditor are defined in S. 51, Provincial Insolvency Act, which provides that where execution of a decree has issued against the property of a debtor, no person shall be entitled to the benefit of the execution against the receiver except in respect of assets realised in the course of the execution by sale or otherwise before the date of the admission of the petition. The appellant, therefore, has no higher right than that of any other unsecured creditor, and he is not entitled to have his decree satisfied in full out of the sale proceeds of the property attached by him.

It is, however, contended on behalf of the appellant that under S. 52, Provincial Insolvency Act, he is at any rate entitled to the costs awarded to him in the suit in which the decree was made and to the costs of the execution. His contention is that the release of the property from attachment under O. 21, R. 60, Civil P. C., and the period during the continuance of his suit and the appeal in the High Court should be considered as one proceeding in attachment and as under the authorities referred to above the attachment that was made in 1915 should be considered to have revived, he is entitled to all the costs under S. 52 of the Act. It is contended on the other hand on behalf of the respondents who are the other creditors of the insolvent, that S. 52, Provincial Insolvency Act, applied only to cases where the attachment is of moveable properties and the contention is based upon the words

"the Court shall, on application, direct the property, if in the possession of the Court, to be delivered to the Receiver."

As immovable property attached by the Court cannot be said to be in the possession of the Court which could be delivered to the Receiver, this section must be confined to cases of moveable properties which were taken possession of by the Court in attachment. I do not agree with this contention. The opening words of S. 52 refers to attachment of any kind of property which is saleable and the words on which the respondents rely need not be confined to moveable property alone. Where immovable property is attached in execution of a decree, it is commonly stated that the property is in the custody of the Court and there is no reason to suppose that the legislature meant that the attaching decree-holder would have a charge for his costs where moveable property is attached but he would be entitled to no such relief if immovable property is attached by him although, as in the present case, the proceedings relating to the attachment of the property are taken at considerable cost of money and trouble. The true construction, therefore, in my opinion is that S. 52 refers to the case of attachment of all kinds of property and is not confined to moveable property alone.

The next contention on behalf of the respondents is that if the appellant is held to be entitled to any costs as first charge then it must be confined to the costs in the decree for money and those of the execution proceedings which led to the release of the property from attachment; or in other words, the costs incurred by him up to the 23rd August 1915 and not the costs of the subsequent proceedings in the suit which he brought in order to substantiate his right to attach the property as belonging to his judgment-debtor. That argument does not seem to me to be acceptable. The object of the suit under O. 21, R. 63, is to maintain the attachment and get rid of the order of release (Bonomali's case) (1). If it is held that the result of the subsequent suit was that the attachment was revived as it must be held in accordance with the cases cited above, it seems to me difficult to avoid the conclusion that the proceedings in the suit which led to the revival of the attachment should be considered as proceedings in furtherance of execution, and I think that the expression "costs of the execution" should have a liberal interpretation so as to include the costs of the suit brought under O. 21, R. 63 of the Code in which the appellant succeeded in having the order under R. 60 releasing the property from attachment set aside. In Phul Kumari v. Ghanshyam (7) their Lordships expressed an opinion that such a suit is the only mode of obtaining a review of the order in such cases and also as if it were "simply a form of appeal." Having regard to the fact that it was only after the appellant succeeded in his suit finally, the insolvent included the property in his schedule and the Receiver took possession it is only just and proper that the appellant should get all the costs as a first charge on the property. It is by reason of the effort of the appellant that this property has been made available to the entire body of creditors. The Receiver never stirred to take possession of the property as belonging to the insolvent. Having saved the property for the benefit of the creditors as against the claims of third persons, it seems to be wrong that he should not be allowed to claim a charge for the expenses incurred by him on the property.

The order of the learned Judge, therefore, should be varied to this extent that the appellant shall have a first charge on the property for the costs of the suit in which the decree was made and of the execution proceedings including the costs of the suit brought under O. 21, R. 63, Civil P. C. in the trial Court and in the appellate Court and after the charge is satisfied, the balance of the assets realized will be distributed rateably amongst the several creditors including the appellant for the rest of his claim. Having regard to the fact that the success has been divided, there will be no order as to costs of this appeal.

Civil Revn. Case No. 526 of 1928, Decided on 22nd February 1929, against order of Dist. Judge, Khulna, D/- 30th January 1928.

* Civil P. C., O. 22, R. 9—Decree in favour of dead person is not nullity.

An order passed against a dead person would be a nullity; but where an order was passed in favour of a dead person it is not altogether and in all circumstances a nullity.

If a party is dead the records stand good so far as the living parties are concerned and that any disposal of the case notwithstanding the death of one of the parties will be valid subject to its being vacated at the instance of the legal representatives of the person who had died.

A sale in favour of R, the decree-holder, was set aside but the sale was confirmed on appeal. The objector to the sale petitioned to the High Court in revision. The rule was pressed on the ground that the decree of the appellate Court was a nullity inasmuch as R was dead before the date of judgment. The Official Trustee of Bengal was substituted in R's place.

Held: that decree of the lower appellate Court was not a nullity and rule was discharged: 39 Mad. 386; Duke v. Davies, 2 Q. B. 260, Foll.; 33 Mad. 167 and 38 Mad. 682, Ref. [P 528 C 2; P 529 C 1]

Judgment.—This is a rule calling on the opposite party to show cause why the order of the lower appellate Court complained of should not be reversed and the sale set aside as prayed for in the petition. The rule was prayed for on two grounds. But neither of them has been urged before us now. The only ground on which the rule is pressed is that the order of the lower appellate Court was passed in favour of a dead person, namely, Major Raily who died in England on 1st January 1928 and that, therefore, it is a nullity. The rule was obtained on 27th April 1928 against Major Raily of whose death neither party was aware and also against another person. There is no doubt that an order passed against a dead person would be a nullity, but there are authorities showing that where an order was passed in favour of a dead person, it is not altogether and in all circumstances a nullity. In the case of Vellayan Chetty v. Jothi Mahalinga Aiyar (1), the practice in England on which our law is based is referred to. The learned Judges who decided that case in referring to the decision of Bowen, L. J., in Duke v. Davies (2) stated as follows:

"The learned Lord Justice points out that if a party is dead, the records stand good so far as the living parties are concerned; and that any disposal of the case notwithstanding the death of one of the parties will be valid subject to its being vacated at the instance of the legal representatives of the person who had died."

Judgment.—In my opinion S. 132 (1), Civil P. C., does not apply to examinations under S. 36 (1), Presidency Towns Insolvency Act and that the Court in a suitable case may summon before it a pardanashin lady who is known or suspected to have in her possession any property belonging to the insolvent. S. 37 gives the Court power, if it thinks fit, instead of summoning such a pardanashin lady to Court, to issue commissions or letters of request. That power is discretionary. Further, I am of opinion that the correct meaning of S. 132 (1), Civil P. C., that a lady who according to the customs and manners of this country ought not to be compelled to appear in public shall be exempt from personal appearance in Court that is, from being exposed to the public gaze, such a person is exempt not from attendance in Court but from appearance in Court. I think "appearance" means that she shall not be compelled to come forth into view or become visible to the public gaze. A method is provided in this country by which such ladies can be moved from place to place, in a palki, and in my opinion they may be compelled to come to Court in a palki so long as they do not become visible to the public gaze. It follows therefore, that if the examination of the ladies be taken by the registrar in his private room, the public being excluded therefrom, and they being concealed from the gaze of the registrar the parties and the solicitors and counsel appearing in the enquiry their feelings and sentiments will be considered sufficiently. Therefore, I order that these ladies be examined in the manner which I have indicated.

With regard to the question of costs, I have dealt with this matter on the footing that these ladies are not in contempt but in my opinion they are in contempt. The order was made properly by the registrar for their attendance. They have taken no steps to set that aside or to appeal from it. The result is that they are in disobedience to an order properly made and are in contempt. I believe that those who have advised them have misconstrued the provisions of these sections. Therefore, I do not inflict any penalty upon them for their contempt but they must pay the costs of this application. I certify for counsel.

Appeals Nos. 161 and 162 of 1928 and Revn. No. 513 of 1928, Decided on 25th February 1929, against original orders of Sub-Judge, 24 Parganas, D/- 11th and 19th April 1928.

Civil P. C., S. 39 (1), Cl. (a)—Scope.

The Court passing a decree can send it for execution to another Court within the jurisdiction of which the judgment-debtor resides, irrespective of the mode in which the decree is sought to be executed and it would be necessary for the decree-holder to satisfy the Court that the judgment-debtor has not sufficient property within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree sufficient to satisfy the decree.

N. N. Sircar, T. Ameer Ali and Ambica Pado Chowdhury—for Respondent.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the judgment-debtor against an order of the Subordinate Judge dated 11th April 1928, rejecting the objection of the judgment-debtor to the execution of the decree which was transferred from the original side of this Court to the Court of the Subordinate Judge. The objection of the judgment-debtor in the Court below was this: The decree-holders had attached certain properties consisting of shares in some companies which they allege belong to the judgment-debtor in execution of the decree under an order of the High Court. They asked for transfer of the decree in the Alipur Court under S. 39, Civil P. C. The decree-holders gave an undertaking to the High Court that the properties attached by that Court shall not be sold until the properties attached by the Alipur Court have been sold. The objection of the judgment-debtor was that the High Court had no jurisdiction to send the decree for execution to the Alipur Court under the provisions of S. 39, Civil P. C. His contention was that under Cl. (b), sub-S. (1), S. 39 Civil P. C., the decree-holders could only ask for the decree being sent for execution to another Court, if the judgment-debtor had no property within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree sufficient to satisfy such decree. The Subordinate Judge rejected that contention on the ground that under Cl. (a), S. 39, sub-S. 1 of the Code, the Court which passed the decree was entitled to send it for execution to the Alipore Court as the judgment-debtor actually and voluntarily resided within the jurisdiction of the Alipore Court. The contention before the Subordinate Judge and also before us was that Cl. (a) only applies if the execution of the decree is sought to be made by personal arrest of the judgment-debtor and not as against his property. In our opinion, this contention is not sound. When the decree-holder asks for sending the decree for execution to another Court, it is not necessary for him to specify the manner in which the decree is intended to be executed either by arrest of the person of the judgment-debtor or by attachment and sale of his properties, moveable or immovable. It is sufficient for him to satisfy the Court that the application falls within one or other of the clauses of sub-S. (1), S. 39, Civil P. C. If a decree-holder satisfies the Court which passed the decree that the judgment-debtor resides within the local limits of the jurisdiction of another Court he may ask for sending the decree for execution to that Court without stating anything more in his application and under such circumstances the Court which passed the decree has jurisdiction to transfer it for execution to that other Court. This contention, therefore, on behalf of the appellant cannot in our opinion, be accepted.

It was next urged that a decree cannot be sent for execution to another Court unless all the properties attached by the Court which passed the decree are sold in satisfaction of the decree. It was pointed out that in the two cases referred to in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge, viz., the cases of Sarada Prosad Mullick v. Luckmeeput Singh Doogar (1) and Krishto Kishore Dutt v. Ruplal Das (2), the properties within the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree had either actually been sold or were shown to be not sufficient to satisfy the decree. Under those circumstances only it was held that simultaneous execution could be had in several Courts. It was contended that simultaneous execution can be had in several Courts if there is no execution pending in the Court which passed the decree or in other words no execution can be levied simultaneously in the Court which passed the decree and other Courts. If simultaneous execution in different Courts is allowed we do not see on what principle it can be said that simultaneous execution in the Court which passed the decree and the Court within the local limits of which the judgment-debtor resided is illegal. We are of opinion that under Cl. (a), S. 39 (1) the decree may be sent for execution to a Court within the local limits of which the judgment-debtor resides. No doubt under Cl. (b) if the decree is sought to be sent to a Court within the jurisdiction of which the judgment-debtor does not reside it would be necessary for the decree-holder to satisfy the Court that the judgment-debtor has not sufficient property within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree sufficient to satisfy the decree. We, therefore, agree with the decision of the Subordinate Judge that the High Court was quite competent to transfer the decree for execution to the Court below.

We are however of opinion that the procedure adopted by the decree-holders in this case calculated to work oppressively and the reason for our thinking so is this: Suppose the judgment-debtor has properties of sufficient value within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree. The decree-holders have attached those properties the result of which is that the judgment-debtor cannot sell them and pay off the decree-holders. The decree-holders have undertaken not to sell those properties till properties within the jurisdiction of the Court below are sold. The decree-holders desire to execute the decree there by attachment of moveable properties or it may be by arrest of the judgment-debtor. The judgment-debtor is prevented from selling his properties by the sale of which he could probably pay off the decree-holders by reason of the attachment. The decree-holders also do not proceed to sell those properties. The result of this procedure would be that although the judgment-debtor may have sufficient properties within the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree by the sale of which the decree might be satisfied, he may be put into trouble by execution of the decree at the place where he resides while his properties remain under attachment. Such a situation should be avoided, if possible. We, therefore, direct, while dismissing the appeal, that the lower Court will not proceed with the execution of the decree unless the decree-holders produce an order from the Court which passed the decree that all the properties which had been attached by the decree-holders within the jurisdiction of that Court have been sold and the decree remains unsatisfied or that those properties have been released from attachment. Only under those circumstances the decree-holders would be allowed to proceed with the execution of the decree within the jurisdiction of the Alipore Court.

With regard to Appeal No. 162 of 1928, it is not necessary for us to say anything in detail. It seems that although the words of the application are "stay of proceedings", the application was simply for adjournment of the execution of the decree till the decision of the question of adjustment of the decree. The Subordinate Judge refused to allow adjournment on the grounds stated by him. Having regard to the nature of the order, we do not think that there is an appeal against such an order. The question whether we could interfere under S. 115 or not is now purely academic because there has been as a matter of fact stay of proceedings up to this date. This appeal is dismissed and we direct that the Subordinate Judge should take up the question of adjustment as soon as practicable and dispose of the matter.

As we have given the judgment-debtor some relief in Appeal No. 161 of 1928, we make no order as to costs of these appeals. No order is necessary on the application for revision which is also dismissed without costs.

Let the records be sent down without delay.

The principle embodied in the maxim De minimis non curat lex cannot be applied to a case where the statute (such as S. 29, Ben. Ten. Judgment.—In these two appeals by the plaintiffs landlords, the only question which has been raised is as to whether Courts below were right in refusing to grant the plaintiffs a decree at the enhanced rate, because the enhancement contravened the provisions of S. 29, Ben. Ten. Act. In the suit out of which S. A. 2314 has arisen, the enhancement is 9/80th of a pie and in the suit out of which S. A. 2315 has arisen, the enhancement is 3/16th of a pie. It is argued by Mr. Sanyal the learned advocate who has appeared for the plaintiffs appellants that the enhancement is so small that it might be disregarded, having regard to the well-known maxim of law De minimis non curat lex. It is argued that the enhancement is so small that it is not capable of realization and that, consequently, for all practical purposes, the enhancement must be regarded as falling within the limits of two annas in the rupee. I have already stated that in the two cases respectively the enhancement exceeds two annas by 9/80th of a pie and 3/16th of a pie. It is argued on behalf of the respondent, however, that although the amount for one year is very small when the rent for four years for which the suit has been instituted is taken into account, it swells into an amount which is capable of being realized. What I have to consider is the language of S. 29, Ben. Ten. Act. S. 29, Cl. (b) runs as follows :

"The money rent of an occupancy-raiyat may be enhanced by contract, subject to the condition that the rent must not be enhanced so as to exceed by more than two annas in the rupee the rent previously payable by the raiyat."

There can be no doubt that the enhancement in these two cases exceeds more than two annas in the rupee, although the excess might be a very small one and, for all practical purposes, might be disregarded. The maxim De minimis non curat lex has been held to justify Courts of justice not to take trifling and immaterial matters into account, except under peculiar circumstances, such as the trial of a right or where personal character is involved. It has been applied also to cases where trifling irregularities or even infractions of the strict letter of the law are brought under the notice of the Court. It has been applied to support a rate in the assessment of which there were some comparatively trifling omissions of established forms. It has been applied with reference to proceedings for an infringement of the revenue laws. My attention has been drawn to a remark made by a learned English Judge that :

"the Court is not bound to a strictness at once harsh and pedantic in the application of statutes, and that the law permits the qualification implied in the ancient maxim, de minimis non curat lex."

I have not been given reference to any case where the law in the interests of the tenant states that the enhancement shall in no case exceed more than two annas in the rupee that even a slight variation could be permitted. Once a departure is made from the strict language of the statute it may be difficult to draw the line. The question as to what is a negligible variation may vary according to the different circumstances of each case. In this state of facts it would be difficult to make any departure from the strict language of the statute and to apply the principle embodied in the maxim to which I have referred, to a case where the statute has laid down a mandatory provision fixing the limit of the enhancement of rent. I think the view taken by the Court below is right. The appeals, therefore, fail and must be dismissed with costs.

Bansari Burmani — Complainant — Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. Case No. 211 of 1929, Decided on 24th May 1929, against order of District Magistrate, Dinajpur.

Criminal Trial—Where defence is disclosed on behalf of accused, appellate Court should deal with defence case in the same way as in the case of prosecution.

In a case where the defence is disclosed on behalf of the accused it should be stated as such by the appellate Court and the evidence if any upon which it is founded is to be discussed and a conclusion is to be arrived at by the appellate Court in the same way as in the case for the prosecution. It is not enough to say that the prosecution has been proved and that, therefore, it is unnecessary to deal with the defence case. [P 532 C 2]

Sures Chandra Taluqdar and Radhica Ranjan Guha—for Petitioners.

Judgment.—This Rule is directed against an order of the District Magistrate of Dinajpur whereby the conviction of the petitioners was maintained. The petitioners were charged under Ss. 456, 352, 354 and 447, I. P. C. The complaint in the case was made on 5th September 1928 alleging that accused 1 Samru entered into a neighbour's house and attempted to outrage the modesty of the complainant. She cried out and various people came to the scene and the other accused participated in rescuing the first accused from the hands of the people who had already seized him. The learned Magistrate on appeal has dealt with the case in a manner which is all right so far as it goes. But it is said that he has not dealt with the case of the defence and it is quite true to say that reading the judgment of the lower appellate Court we do not gather either what the defence was or that it was supported by any witnesses. In fact, however, it appears that the defence case was that on 3rd September that is two days before the occurrence, there had been something of a dispute between the first accused and the complainant's husband over a matter of some land, which resulted in an assault upon Samru who thereupon actually lodged a complaint in a criminal Court. It appears further that this case was in a measure spoken to as being substantiated by the evidence of the three witnesses who were called for the defence, one of whom was an eye-witness of the occurrence and who if believed might lead to the failure of the prosecution case. So far as the judgment of the lower appellate Court is concerned it appears that there is really no explanation forthcoming and it is only necessary for us to say that in such a case as the present where the defence is disclosed on behalf of the accused it should be stated as such by the lower appellate Court and the evidence if any upon which it is founded is to be discussed and a conclusion is to be arrived at by the lower appellate Court in the same way as in the case for the prosecution. It is not enough to say that the prosecution has been proved and that, therefore, it is unnecessary to deal with the defence case. For these reasons we make the Rule absolute and send back the case so that the appeal may be reheard by a Sessions Judge if there is no other Magistrate in the district. The petitioners will remain on the same bail pending the rehearing of the appeal.

Abdul Aziz Bepari—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Appeal No. 267 of 1923, Decided on 6th March 1929, against original order of Addl. Sub-Judge. First Court, Naokhali, D/- 30th March 1928.

* (a) Civil P. C., O. 22, R. 9—Order under O. 22, R. 9 in appeal is not appealable.

There is no appeal against an order under O. 22, R. 9 refusing to set aside an abatement of an appeal. [P 533 C 2]

Word 'suit' in O. 43, R. 1 (k) does not include an appeal. [P 533 C 1]

Bhagirath Chandra Das—for Appellants.

Hem Kumar Bose—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the heirs of the appellant in the Court of appeal below against the order passed by that Court under O. 22, R. 9, Civil P. C., refusing to set aside the abatement of the appeal pending in that Court. The original suit was for some money valued at less than 500 and the decree was passed against the appellant in the trial Court. Against that decree there was an appeal to the lower appellate Court. During the pendency of the appeal the original appellant died and the appeal abated under the provisions of O. 22, R. 11, Civil P. C., which provides that R. 4 of that order should apply in the case of an appeal. A preliminary objection has been taken as to the maintainability of the appeal on behalf of the respondents on two grounds. It is first urged that there would have been no appeal against the final decree made by the lower appellate Court, if the appeal itself had been heard, under S. 102, Civil P. C. There should therefore be no appeal against an order passed by the lower appellate Court. It is next urged that under O. 43, R. 1 (k) an appeal is allowed against an order under R. 9, O. 22 refusing to set aside the abatement of a suit.

There is no provision under the Code for an appeal against an order refusing to set aside the abatement of an appeal made by the Court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. The learned advocate for the appellants argues that the expression 'suit' in R. 1 (k), O. 43 includes an appeal and reference is made to the provisions of O. 22, R. 11, Civil P. C., which provides that in the application of O. 22 to appeals, so far as may be, the word "plaintiff" shall be held to include an appellant, the word "defendant" a respondent, and the word "suit" an appeal; and he contends that as in that rule the word "suit" is said to include an appeal, the same construction should be put to the word 'suit' in the rule of O. 43. We do not think that this contention is sound. O. 22, R. 11 only provides for the application of that order to appeals and in doing so states that the word 'suit' shall be held to include an appeal. There is nothing in O. 43 (1) (k) which enables us to apply the word 'suit' to an appeal. Moreover, by reference to S. 105, sub-S. (1) of the Code it would appear that no appeal is allowed against an order such as this made by the Court in its appellate jurisdiction : That subsection runs as follows :

"Save as otherwise expressly provided, no appeal shall lie from any order made by a Court in the exercise of its original or appellate jurisdiction"

Nothing has been shown to us which can be considered as an express provision that an order such as this made by a Court in its appellate jurisdiction is appealable. It is argued on behalf of the appellants that if the lower appellate Court makes an order refusing to set aside an abatement in an appeal, the party against whom the order is made if not allowed an appeal from it would be left absolutely without a remedy ; but the remedy is provided in the last part of sub-S. (1), S. 105, Civil P. C., where any order affecting the decision of the case may be attacked by an appeal from the decree. As we are of opinion that there is no appeal against the order made by the lower appellate Court, this appeal must stand dismissed with costs; hearing fee, two gold mohurs.

Newaj Ahmed Khan—Defendant—Respondent.

Appeal No. 1618 of 1926, Decided on 3rd September 1928, against appellate decree of Dist. Judge, 24 Parganas, D/- 27th March 1926.

(a) Mahomedan Law—Wakf Property—In deciding if a property is wakf, evidence of facts and circumstances leading to an inference "user and reputation" is more important.

Direct evidence of user in wakf property, e. g., using the water of the tank or plucking and appropriating the fruits of the trees is necessarily of very little value as being equally consistent with user by permission or license as with user by right on the part of members of the Mahomedan public in property forming an adjunct to a mosque and a part of the endowment itself. On the question of user, therefore, what must be of greater value is not direct evidence, but evidence of facts and circumstances as leading to the inference, one way or the other, whether and to what extent the property has been treated as wakf property during the long period that has elapsed. [P 535 C 2]

(b) Evidence Act, S. 32—Admissibility of ante litem motam declarations of dead per- sons on questions of general interest are admissible.

Declarations made ante litem motam by persons who are now dead in respect of a question relating to a matter of general or public interest, even if they be no more than evidence of reputation or hearsay evidence, are admissible. [P 536 C 1]

(c) Mahomedan Law — Wakf property — To decide title by user, physical features of the property ought to be considered.

In cases of user of wakf property physical features may be taken into consideration in order to determine whether different parcels may be deemed parts of one waste or common, so as to make evidence of user of one part, evidence of title to the whole: *Deo v. Sarat Chandra Roy Choudhuri and Abdul Ali—for Appellants.

Braja Lal Chakrabarti and Prokas Chandra Majumdar—for Respondent.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit which was instituted by three persons as plaintiffs under the provisions of O. 1, R. 9, Civil P. C. as members of, and for and on behalf of, the local Mahomedan Community.

The subject-matter of the suit is described in the plaint as a plot of land about 3 bighas 10 cottas in area. On this land stands a mosque, close to which there is a large tank with some sort of masonry structures and steps leading up to it, and the rest of the land is said to be a quantity of garden land with some fruit trees standing thereon, and it is also said that there are pucca godowns etc., erected on a portion. The entire area is, or rather was, enclosed on all sides by a compound wall with an opening for gates. The wall is now more or less in ruins and on the east side has been completely demolished. There is some sort of an out-house standing near about the opening. The defendant Munshi Newaz Ahmed Khan is, according to the plaintiffs, the Khatib of the mosque. The entire property is alleged, on behalf of the plaintiffs, to have been made a wakf by one Misri Begum, a lady of the Mysore family, long ago. A strip of land, out of the premises, on the side of the road on the east having been acquired by the Corporation of Calcutta for the purpose of 'Set back' in connexion with the said adjoining road of Rs. 1,200 was awarded as compensation and was still in deposit. The defendant had claimed the money as his own personal property and had also been of late setting up a title hostile to the endowment in respect of the remainder of the lands. The plaintiffs accordingly instituted this suit for a declaration that the entire property including the sum of Rs. 1,200 belongs to the wakf of Misri Begum.

The defence, in substance, was that the lands belonged not to Misri Begum but to the defendant's ancestor, one Faizulla Jemadar, that the mosque was constructed by the said Faizulla Jemadar with the aid of contributions received from the public including Misri Begum, and that the said Faizulla Jemadar and after him one Ghasi Khan (a brother of the defendant) and after him the defendant himself were mutwallis of the mosque, but that the lands and tank etc., were never used as wakf and on the other hand continued to be secular property and have ultimately devolved on the defendant in his personal right.

The suit was decreed by the Subordinate Judge. He declared the entire property in suit including the amount of Rs. 1,200 deposited with the Calcutta Corporation, as wakf property. The District Judge has, on appeal, reversed this decision and dismissed the suit. Hence this second appeal by the plaintiffs.

One of the grounds on which the District Judge has dismissed the suit is that the suit being for a mere declaration when consequential reliefs were available was not maintainable. On the facts of the case this ground is not well-founded and indeed the respondent has not sought to support the decree on this ground.

From the pleadings already set forth it would appear that the parties were at variance upon the following points: The plaintiffs' case was to the effect that the lands belonged to Misri Begum, that she erected the mosque, excavated the tank, planted the trees, built the compound wall and created the wakf, that Ghasi Khan was appointed Khatib of the mosque and that after Ghasi Khan the defendant succeeded to the office. The defendant's case on the other hand was that the lands belonged to Faizulla Jemadar and not to Misri Begum that Misri Begum as well as the Mahomedan public helped Faizulla Jemadar with contributions to build the mosque, that after the mosque had been built the remaining lands continued to be secular and remained the personal property of Faizulla

Jemadar and that the compound wall was built partly by Faizulla Jemadar and partly by Ghasi Khan. The defendant claimed that he and his ancestors had rights higher than that of a mere Khatib and asserted that they were all mutwallis which pre-supposes that there was a wakf. It is an admitted fact in the case that the Mahomedan public of the vicinity have a right to go to and say their prayers in the mosque. That some lands were dedicated for the purposes of the mosque or of a wakf is therefore an admitted fact in the case. Even if the plaintiffs fail to prove that the lands belonged to Misri Begum and even if the defendant succeeds in proving the lands belonged to his ancestor Faizulla Khan, the plaintiffs would still be entitled to a declaration that the property is wakf property, provided a dedication thereof for the purposes of a wakf is established. The mosque was erected, and the wakf was created, whatever the exact nature thereof may have been, and whatever the quantity of lands it may have comprised, close upon 80 years ago or perhaps even earlier. There was no deed. Not much direct evidence of the creation is available. What little has been produced, is, in the opinion of the District Judge of not much worth. His view is final on this question. He has held "that it is very probable that the lady contributed largely towards the cost of the erection of the mosque, but that it is not proved, nor likely that the mosque was erected or dedicated by any member of the Mysore family, nor that the lady was the owner of the surrounding lands or had dedicated them to the service of the mosque."

These findings need not be disputed, but the real question that remains, and has still to be considered is whether the property in suit is wakf property. The issue that was framed on this point—and that, in my opinion, is the right form in which the issue should have been framed, was

"Is the property in suit or any portion of the same, or the money in the hands of the Calcutta Municipality, wakf property?" (Issue No. 9).

The Subordinate Judge was able to find that Misri Begum created the wakf. The District Judge has held otherwise but has not gone into the broader question which the issue involves. This question evidently has to be determined before the suit can be disposed of. I cannot see my way to agree in the contention urged on behalf of the respondent that for the determination of this issue a further opportunity should be given to him to adduce further evidence.

The plaintiff has mainly relied upon a number of facts and circumstances, as establishing, by what is alleged in the plaint as "user and reputation," that the property in suit is wakf property. Direct evidence of user in a property of this nature, e.g., using the water of the tank or plucking and appropriating the fruits of the trees is necessarily of very little value as being equally consistent with user by permission or license as with user by right on the part of members of the Mahomedan public in property forming an adjunct to a mosque and a part of the endowment itself. On the question of user, therefore, what must be of greater value is not direct evidence, but evidence of facts and circumstances as leading to the inference, one way or the other, whether and to what extent the property has been treated as wakf property during the long period that has elapsed.

The evidence which the plaintiffs adduced, excluding that which is no longer of any importance, may be conveniently grouped under six heads: 1st, Deeds relating to transactions in respect of neighbouring lands; 2nd, Documents relating to the property itself showing how the lands in suit have been treated; 3rd, Evidence afforded by a certain tablet which is said to have been on the wall near the main door of the mosque and of the existence of four metal guns which were on the premises; 4th, Direct evidence of user of the lands; 5th, Admission made by defendant 1 himself; and 6th, The physical features of the lands.

Item 1. The documents under this head are Exs. 6, 5, 7, 9 and 10. These documents relate to plots of land lying on the boundary of the lands in suit. In Ex. 6 dated 1845 the lands are described as the "land of Misri Begum;" and in Ex. 5 dated 1878 and Ex. 7 dated 1887 the premises are described as the "Maijidbari of Shahjadi Misri Begum" and in the former of these two documents the compound wall is described as the "Wall of Shahjadi Misri Begum's Musjidbari." Exs. 8, 9 and 10 are of more recent dates and perhaps not ante litem motam, but the older documents contain declarations made ante litem motam by persons who are dead (vide the judgment of the Subordinate Judge as regards the ages of the executants of Exs. 5 and 7 at the dates of these documents.) The learned District Judge has disposed of these document in these words :

"These deeds are sought to be made relevant on the ground that they contain expressions of opinions regarding a matter of public interest by persons having knowledge of the matter. It is impossible to say what knowledge the executants of these deeds had. The mosque was undoubtedly known as Misri Begum's mosque ; and by speaking of the lands surrounding the mosque, and enclosed within a wall, as Misri Begum's mosque the executants of these deeds were not necessarily expressing their belief that the lands were part of the dedicated property. The description was intelligible and that was all that was needed."

He has thus treated the documents as more or less irrelevant. Now whatever may be said as regards Ex. 6 and the knowledge of the executant thereof as regards the right or Misri Begum to the lands, there can be no question that Ex. 5 and Ex. 7 contain declarations made ante litem motam by persons who are now dead in respect of a question relating to a matter of general or public interest, and that such declaration even if they be no more than evidence of reputation or hearsay evidence are admissible. (Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 3, "Boundaries" p. 284). It is urged on behalf of the respondent that the documents merely say that the premises were the musjidbari of an individual and, therefore, the statement does not relate to a matter of general or public interest. With this contention I am unable to agree as it is the common case of both parties that the Mahomedan public of vicinity have the right to use the mosque. It is said in the passage above referred to that such evidence is admissible on the question of boundaries between a reputed manor and land belonging to a private individual [Doe Molesworth v. Sleeman (1), or between old and new land in manor (Barnes v. Mawson (2), per Lord Ellenborough, C. J. at p. 81)]. The reason of this exception in favour of hearsay evidence is partly necessity since without such evidence ancient rights could rarely be established and partly that the public nature of the rights minimises the risk of mis-statement. As Mr. Taylor has put it in his Law of Evidence, where the matter is of public concernment, all the Queen's subjects are presumed to have knowledge of it (Taylor Ss. 546 and 811). The Evidence Act follows the English rule of Evidence in this respect and has enacted it in S. 32, sub-S. 4. In treating these documents as irrelevant the learned District Judge has been in error and the statements contained in these documents and referred to above must in my judgment, be taken into consideration in dealing with the case.

Item 2. In the Municipal Assessment registers for 26 years from 1880 to 1906 the lands were recorded under one entry viz., Premises No. 11 Mayarpur Road which described the property as mosque, tank, and garden, the recorded owner being Misri Begum and as property exempted from municipal rates and taxes. In 1906, the holding was divided into 2 parts No. 12 was the number given to a part which was described as mosque, tank and garden with an annual value of Rs. 514 and remained exempted, while a part was numbered as 12/1 and described as Bustee land and made into a separate holding with an annual value of Rs. 28 and was assessed to rates and taxes. The defendant was recorded as owner in the Municipal Assessment Register as regards No. 12/1 in 1906 and as regards No. 12 in 1908. The annual values aforesaid were increased in 1914, to Rs. 557 and 43 respectively. The property was thus divided into 2 parts one consisting of the mosque, tank and garden, and the other a piece of Bustee land bearing a small annual value. This division, as far as may be gathered, has continued upto the present. The District Judge seems to have misapprehended the situation. He does not seem to have appreciated that what was exempted from municipal rates and taxes in 1906, 1908 or 1914 was not merely the mosque but the mosque with tank and garden, and what was assessed was not the tank and garden but only a small piece of Bustee land constituted into a separate holding with a fresh No. 12/1, and carved out of a No. 12 which was formerly No. 11. The District Judge evidently was under the impression that all that the assessment register proved was that though exempted till 1906, the entire property with the exception of the mosque was assessed in that year. It is this misconception which made him feel disinclined to draw an inference adverse to the defendant.

(1) [1846] 9 Q. B. 298.

(2) [1813] 1 M. & S. 77.

The defendant has succeeded in proving that he and his ancestors have been paying rent to certain landlords in respect of a plot of about three bighas of land in the vicinity of these premises. The documents that he has filed, notably the thokas dating from 1275 and the rent receipts dating from 1297, establish this fact. The important question however, is whether this plot of land constitutes or at least forms a part of these premises. On this point there are only three items of evidence, besides of course the oral testimony of the defendant himself. One such piece of evidence is to the effect that the defendant has only one plot of land in the locality. This may be accepted as true. The other two pieces of evidence are Ex. G and Ex. M. Ex. G shows that during the survey of the added area which began in 1903 and was completed in 1907, in premises bearing Municipal No. 12 Mayerpur Road the defendant was a maurashi tenant in respect of a quantity of rented land about three bighas in area. Ex. M is the decision of the Superintendent of Survey of the added area in a case of 1905 relating to premises No. 12, Mayerpur Road which in the opinion of the District Judge showed that a strip of land lying to the north of a culvert and by the side of premises No. 12 formed a part of the defendant's maurashi tenancy. Now we have no evidence when No. 11 was altered to No. 12; all that we know is in the assessment register what was shown as No. 11 in 1880 appeared as No. 12 in 1906. Moreover we have no evidence where the culvert was in those days. In this state of the evidence I am far from satisfied that the premises we are concerned with in this suit have been proved to be a part of the defendant's maurashi tenancy. Assuming however that the finding of the District Judge on this point is correct, namely that some part of the tenancy was within the wall, the finding does not assist the defendant in the matter of the issue as to whether or not the premises in suit are wakf property. I am not at all impressed with the argument that no wakf may be made of rent-paying lands or that a masjid may not be built thereon, because even upon the defendants' case the mosque stands upon Faizulla's land which was a part of this tenancy.

Item 3. The plaintiff's case was that there was a tablet near the main door of the mosque bearing an inscription showing that the property was the waqf of Misri Begum, and that it had been removed after the institution of the suit. Evidence was also given of the fact that there were four guns on the premises, which would indicate that the property was waqf as such guns are invariably placed in the more important waqf mosques of the Mysore family. The learned District Judge has not considered this item of evidence at all, though upon it the trial Court had come to a finding in plaintiffs' favour.

Item 4. This evidence ordinarily, as I have already said, is not likely to be of much value, and if the learned District Judge was not impressed with it the appellant can hardly complain in second appeal.

Item 5. This item of evidence has not been referred to at all by the learned District Judge, while the Subordinate Judge appears to have relied upon it. The evidence, relating as it does to an admission made by the defendant against his own interest, is important and, if true, certainly deserves consideration.

Item 6. This item of evidence appears to have been specially brought to the notice of the learned District Judge because he has observed thus :

"The plaintiffs also rely on the fact that the lands in dispute including the mosque, are surrounded by a wall."

They argue from that the entire property must be dedicated property. He however does not appear to have given any consideration to the matter at all. The plaintiff's argument was that it was exceedingly unlikely that a whole area surrounded by a compound wall on all four sides and one gate should be the subject of two conflicting interests and that a tank with a pucca ghat adjoining the mosque and a paved way between the ghat and the steps of the mosque are necessary adjuncts of a mosque, that out-houses of the description that there are on the premises are also the usual appurtenances for the accommodation of the Khatib, etc. and that the ornamental work on the back of the mosque pointed to the lands situate on that side as being appurtenant thereto. The argument was dealt with very fully by and found favour with the learned Subordinate Judge. The District Judge, it is true, was entitled to take a different view, but not ignore it altogether as he has done. The real question is one of boundary of the dedicated property. That in such cases physical features may be taken into consideration in order to determine whether different parcels may be deemed parts of one waste or common, so as to make evidence of user of one part evidence of title to the whole is a proposition that cannot be disputed. Lord Denman, C. J. in Deo v. Kemp (3) said,

"But the case is very different with respect to these parcels, which from their local situation may be deemed parts of one waste or common, as acts of ownership in one part of the same field are evidence of title to the whole."

Whether a large tract of land, where there is no safe guide to determine the boundaries, should or should not be recognized as a whole for inferring existence of unity of title would depend upon circumstances: for instance, in Stanley v. White (4), this recognizable whole consisted of the woody belt surrounding a large tract. There is no evidence in the present case of distinct enjoyment of the different parts, except within recent times by acts which are challenged in this suit as being in violation of the wakf. In Jones v. Williams (5), at p. 331 Parke, B. said.

"In ordinary cases, to prove his title to a close the claimant may give in evidence acts of ownership in any part of the same enclosure; for the ownership of one part causes a reasonable inference that the other belongs to the same person though it by no means follows as a necessary consequence, for different persons may have bulks of land in the same enclosure; but this is a fact to be submitted to the jury."

Moreover if the entire premises can upon its various physical features, be regarded as one whole lying within the compound wall and if the evidence suggests the inference that the members of the Mahomedan public have exercised acts on parts of it in assertion of their right to the whole as forming the endowment, the defendant's original rights whatever they may have been must be held to have been extinguished. This principle will be found discussed in the case of Siva Subramaniya v. Secy. of State (6) which was affirmed on appeal by the Judicial Committee in the case of the Secy. of State v. Nellakutti Siva Subramaniya (7). As I have already said, this aspect of the case has not at all been considered. The aspect is all the more important as upon the defendant's case it was his predecessor Ghasi Khan, a mutawali had enclosed the whole premises by this compound wall.

On the whole I am clearly of opinion that in dealing with this case the learned District Judge, apart from the other errors that I have attempted to point out has taken each fact separated from the rest of the facts and has proceeded to demonstrate that it is consistent with the position that the property was not Misri Begum's or with the position that it was not dedicated by her and has arrived at his conclusion by this process of reasoning. This being a case depending largely on the inference to be drawn from circumstances, the method adopted was in my judgment erroneous and in such a case, to quote the dictum of the Judicial Committee,

"it is essentially necessary that the facts should be considered in relation to each other and weighed as a whole."

The defects pointed out above have rendered it necessary for us to go into the facts which are on the record as bearing upon issue 9. Having heard the parties fully upon the evidence I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have succeeded in making out that the property involved in this suit is a wakf and not the personal property of the defendant, and that though some of the findings recorded by the Subordinate Judge especially the finding that it was Misri Begum who created the wakf are not fit to be upheld, there was no good reason for the learned District Judge to reverse the decree passed by the trial Court.

I would allow the appeal and reversing the decree of the lower appellate Court restore that of the trial Court with costs in this Court and in the lower appellate Court.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Appeal No. 748 of 1928, Decided on 1st February 1929.

(a) Evidence Act, S. 21—Distinction between "Admission" and "Confession" enunciated — Admission in civil suit about genuineness of document is not confession of forgery—Penal Code S. 465.

Admission is usually applied to a civil transaction, and to those matters in criminal cases which do not involve a criminal intent. While the term confession is usually used in criminal Court as denoting an acknowledgment of guilt. Admission in a civil suit that a document is genuine cannot in the forgery case be regarded as confession at all: 37 Cal. 467, Ref. [P 540 C 2, P 541 C 1]

(b) Evidence Act, S. 24—Question of admissibility of confession comes when statement is made to police officer or while in police custody.

The question whether or not a statement is to be regarded as admissible as being a confession or not usually arises in the case of a statement made to a police officer or in the case of statement made to a man while in custody of the police. [P 540 C 2]

(c) Criminal Trial—Evidence—Value of—Evidence by accused in civil Court as to genuineness has high evidentiary value to jury as evincing intention of conspiracy—Evidence Act, S. 14.

The accused in a case of forgery and conspiracy had previously given evidence in a civil Court as to the genuineness of the document.

Held: that though the statement could not be admitted as confession, the jury if independently satisfied that the documents are not genuine, the evidence is to be regarded as having high evidentiary value upon the question of intention whether or not they are in conspiracy. [P 541 C 1]

(d) Criminal P. C., S. 195 (1) (c)—Application.

Section 195 (1) (c) applies only to forgery when committed or alleged to have been committed by a party to the proceedings before the civil Court. [P 541 C 2]

(e) Penal Code, S. 467—Person attesting forged document with knowledge of its character is guilty of forgery.

If a person falsely puts his name down as an attesting witness to the signature of somebody who he knows has never signed at all, he is guilty of forgery just as well as the scribe. The persons attesting like the above must be put on their trial on a charge under S. 467 read with S. 120-B. [P 542 C 1]

Probodh Chandra Chatterjee and Priya Nath Dutt—for Accused.

Khondkar—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the four accused were put upon their trial in connexion with a charge of forgery. The instrument charged as forged is a kabuliati (Ex. 1) dated 21st September 1921, which purports to have been executed by Md. Sabdar the complainant and his brother Md. Malik recently deceased and to be a conveyance of one Malaem of five annas share of land near Malaem's house.

The first accused Ambar Ali was charged with forgery of the document, he being the scribe of the document. The other three accused Bidyananda Das, Har Mohan Das and Abdul Hakim were committed by the Magistrate on a charge of forgery but were charged before the Sessions Court with abetment of forgery under S. 467/109, I. P. C. These three accused purport to have been witnesses to the document.

The signature of Sabdar on the document purports to have been put by accused 1 as scribe. The signature "Md. Malik" in the document purports to have been written by Md. Malik himself.

The complainant's case as to the land in question would appear to have been fully proved by the documents and it is as follows: that the five annas share which as the kobala the subject of this charge purports to transfer was the share which Sabdar and Malik had inherited from their father, that there was another five annas share which had belonged to one Noaz whose representatives, that is to say, son and grandson are Md. Fakir and Abdul Hashim, that this five annas share had been transferred in the lifetime of Noaz to the complainants' father so that the complainant Sabdar and his brother Malik owned at the time in question not five annas share, that as regards the remaining six annas that had belonged at one time to a man called Abbas who appears to be a brother-in-law of accused 1 but Abbas had sold it to Niamatulla and this man Niamatulla appears to have taken a lease of the share of Sabdar and Malik and in addition to his own charge possessed the land as a whole.

The complainant denies that he ever executed the document, that he can sign his own name and he does sign his own name. He says that his brother Malik is illiterate and cannot sign his name. He gives evidence that he has plenty of land and was in no need to sell this land and it is quite clear that from the moment this kobala came to his notice he objected at once and registration was never made. These facts sufficiently explain the circumstances that against all the four appellants the jury brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty; and we have to consider whether the learned Judge's charge is one which enables this Court to uphold that verdict.

As part of the history of the case I will mention this point, that when the complainant discovered that this kobala had been brought into existence, he at the same time discovered that another kobala had been brought into existence purporting to be dated on the previous day. This second kobala is Ex. 11 and that kobala purports to have been made by accused 1 as the scribe and to be witnessed by the other accused with the exception of accused 3. That Kobala is one by which Fakir and Abdul Hashim the representatives of Noaz purport to have transferred to Molaem the five annas of this land, which as already explained, Noaz had in 1910 parted with in favour of the complainant's father.

These two documents being discovered registration was opposed. The registration appeal resulted in two suits before the Munsif. These two suits were tried together, one set of evidence being given with reference to both, and all the accused gave evidence for the plaintiff in those suits. They describe (how at Fakir's house the first document, (Ex. 11 was executed), how the complainant Sabdar had come along and said "what about selling my land" and how, in consequence, on the next day Sabdar and Malik entered this kobala transferring their share to Molaem.

In this appeal Mr. Chatterjee for the accused persons says that the course taken is open to objection. The course taken was first of all that the deposition of each of those persons was put in evidence for the prosecution. Not only so but Abdul Hashim was called to deny that Ex. 11 was a genuine document or had been executed by the alleged executants.

The story as regards the forgery of Ex. 11 was put before the Jury and the learned Judge told the Jury that if they had reason to believe that there was a conspiracy on the part of all these accused to forge the kobala Ex. 1 then they could use the evidence given in the Munsiff's Court by one of the accused against the other. The defence of the accused in the case was that this kobala was genuine and under S. 342 of the Code one and all of them said that the evidence which they had given before the Munsiff was true.

The first point that is taken for the accused in this appeal is that the depositions before the Munsiff were not admissible evidence for the prosecution in this case. The question is why are they not admissible evidence for the prosecution in this criminal case? The argument as I understand it is that these depositions are really confessions and it is said that as they were given before a Court of law they were not really voluntary and for those reasons the depositions are not evidence. The Evidence Act proceeds to my mind upon a principle which has often been referred to before now that the term "admission" is usually applied to a civil transaction and to those matters in criminal cases which do not involve a criminal intent, while the term "confession" is usually used in a criminal Court as denoting an acknowledgment of guilt. From time to time it has been contended—and I understood Mr. Chatterjee to contend that for the purposes of criminal law "admission" and "confession" are much the same thing, and there are no doubt, as the cases show, circumstances in which it is difficult to say whether or not a statement is to be regarded as admissible as being a confession or not. That question usually arises in the case of a statement made to a police officer or in the case of a statement made by a man while in custody of the police.

Then it becomes important to see whether the statement is to be regarded as a confession or may be proved in evidence on the footing that it is not a confession but is an admission. In my judgment, there can be no doubt at all that the idea that the criminal law as regards evidence makes no difference between a "confession" and "admission" is erroneous. Any such doctrine is much too broad and I will refer in this connexion to the judgment of Carnduff, J., in the well-known case of Barindra Kumar Ghosh v. Emperor (1). In the present case it would to my mind be almost extravagant to say that these statements are confessions, if only for the reason that every one of these accused as his defence has said that these statements are true, they constitute his defence. I have no doubt further that, as the story told by these people is a story which means that they are honest and the document is genuine, it cannot in a forgery case be said to be a confession at all. I need not therefore enquire into the question whether evidence given before a Court of law is evidence of such a character that it is not voluntary so as to make a document which is a confession, inadmissible under S. 24. That question does not arise.

Again, these depositions may be considered from the point of view of admission. It may be said that these depositions are put in to show that these people did make these documents between them. That is an important fact for the prosecution to prove, and these documents are therefore admissible. On that view, it appears to me that these documents are admissible as admission, but in point of fact these documents are really admissible or inadmissible in this case from another point of view altogether.

There is ample evidence that these people made the documents, took part in the making of the documents, and that was not contested before the Sessions Judge. But the real use of these documents to show conduct on the part of the accused persons from which conduct, as matter of fact, the jury are enlightened as to what happened at the time these documents were brought about. Here you have four people purporting to take part in the making of the documents. You find them afterwards insisting before a Munsif that the documents are genuine telling the same story and doing their best to act as if the documents are genuine. That in some respect tells in their favour. In other respects, if the jury are independently satisfied that the documents are not genuine, this conduct on their part has a high evidentiary value upon the question of intention, upon the question whether or not they are in conspiracy. I have no doubt, therefore, that these documents were rightly exhibited by the prosecution as evidence in the case.

The next objection taken is that no complaint by the Munsif has been made in respect of any of these four accused who gave evidence before him. As to that I cannot find that there is any necessity in this case, on a charge of forgery or abetment of forgery, to get a complaint from the Munsif. As a matter of fact, the Munsif has taken the view that S. 195 (1) (c), Criminal P. C. applies only to forgery when committed or alleged to have been committed by a party to the proceedings before him. That view is, in my opinion, correct and it is nothing to the point to say that these people might have been accused of something else, namely, under S. 193 of the Code, and that then it would have been necessary to get a complaint from the Munsif. For the purpose of this charge, no complaint from the Munsif is necessary.

The third point is that it is said that it was not admissible for the prosecution to give evidence with reference to the kobala Ex. 11 of the previous day, that is to say, the kobala which purports to be a conveyance by Md. Fakir and Abdul Hashim of the other five-annas in the land. If that were a just criticism it would indeed be one which would have rendered it almost impossible to set before the jury the facts with reference to the kobala Ex. 1 at all. I find, for example, that in the evidence of the main accused Ambar Ali, accused 1, the two things are throughout treated together "I wrote these two documents executed by the defendants in this suit," and the whole story given before the Munsif is a story which affects both and cannot be cut into branches. In the present case it makes all the difference whether or not Molaem who is said to be taking 5-annas from the complainant and his brother was a person who already had 5-annas share or was a person who had not 5-annas share. The execution of these two kobalas, if it was done as alleged and as the jury have believed, points to two steps towards the same end, and the one is closely connected with the other. Nobody supposes that the law would permit a jury to infer that Ambar forged Ex. 1 merely because there is reason to suppose that on the previous day he had forged something else. But that is not the case with reference to this matter. These two documents are so connected that it was necessary and right, in my judgment.

that the whole story should be put before the jury.

It is said, however, that there is in the charge of the learned Judge a direction to the effect that if they had reason to believe that the accused were conspiring together, the evidence of one before the Munsif would be evidence against the other; and on that it is pointed out that there was no charge of conspiracy at all. I certainly think, though it may be not without some room for argument, that if person falsely puts his name down as an attesting witness to the signature of somebody who he knows has never signed at all he is guilty of forgery just as well as the scribe. There may be room for argument, but I should have thought that these persons ought to have been put on their trial on a charge under S. 467 and also on charges under S. 467 read with S. 120-B. However they were not. Three of the accused, however, were put upon their trial under S. 467 read with S. 109 and that certainly includes, as S. 107, I. P. C. plainly says, a charge that they were engaged with one or more persons in a conspiracy for doing an illegal thing. So far as those three accused—accused 2, 3 and 4 are concerned I cannot see that there is any objection to the direction which the learned Judge gave to the jury. The only difficulty is as regards accused 1. He may say:

"I was charged under S. 467. I knew that the other accused were charged with having conspired with me because they were charged under S. 103, but I did not know that I was charged with having conspired with them."

That is not a very sensible objection, but, in point of fact, in this case one finds, when one looks at the evidence before the Munsif, that the main story is told by Ambar Ali accused 1 himself, and that even if it be supposed that it was a wrong direction to tell the jury that what the other three people had said was evidence against Ambar Ali it is quite clear that so long as his own evidence given before the Munsif was evidence against him in the Sessions trial there is no reasonable possibility that that can have resulted in any prejudice at all.

For these reasons it appears to me that the conviction can be sustained and, in my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed.

Mallik, J.—These two appeals are against the same judgment. They arise out of a suit for a declaration of title and issue of a permanent injunction—a declaration that the defendants have no right to irrigate their lands with the water of a certain tank known as Chata tank and an injunction restraining the defendants from drawing water from this tank for that purpose. There were two sets of defendants the Dubey defendants who are defendants 1 to 5 and the Pal defendants who are defendants 6 and 7. Plaintiffs' claim was resisted by the defendants on the allegation that the defendants had acquired a right of easement by prescription as also from a lost grant. The Court of first instance found that all the defendants had acquired a right of easement and on that finding dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. On appeal by the plaintiffs, the lower appellate Court modified the decision of the trial Judge and holding that while the Pal defendants had not acquired any right of easement, the Dubey defendants had acquired such a right, decreed the plaintiffs' suit in part. Against this decision, the Pal defendant as well as the plaintiffs have appealed to this Court the Pal defendants in Appeal No. 2587 of 1926 and the plaintiffs in Appeal No. 229 of 1927.

It appears that the lower appellate Court found as a fact that all the defendants, the Pals and the Dubey, had been using the water of the tank for the purpose of irrigating their lands for a very long time. But finding that this user was not peaceable from 1925 which was more than two years before the institution of the suit, the learned District Judge held that there could be no acquisition of a right of easement by prescription under S. 26, Lim. Act. Mr. Mukherji for the Pal defendants contended that the learned District Judge was wrong in holding that the user must be for 20 years, up to within two years of the suit. This contention, in my opinion, is not tenable. Para. 2, S. 26, sub-S. 1, Lim. Act, lays down that the period of 20 years required for creating a right of easement shall be taken to be a period ending within two years next before the institution of the suit, wherein the claim to which such period relates is contested. Mr. Mukherji in support of his contention drew our attention to the concluding portion of the para. 1, S. 26 (1) where it is stated that where there is a user for 20 years, the right shall be absolute and indefeasible. But para. 1, of the subsection, where the absolute and indefeasible character of the right is mentioned, seems to be clearly controlled by the provisions of para. 2 of the subsection because the latter does nothing but explain how the period of 20 years necessary under the para. 1, is to be computed. It has been authoritatively held that a title to easement is not complete merely upon the effluxion of the period mentioned in the Statute viz. 20 years and that however long the period of actual enjoyment may be, no absolute or indefeasible right can be acquired until the right is brought in question in some suit, and until it is so brought in question, the right is inchoate only and in order to establish it when brought in question, the enjoyment relied on, must be an enjoyment for 20 years up to within 2 years of the institution of the suit. I am therefore, of opinion that the learned District Judge was perfectly right in holding, on the fact found by him, viz. that the long user had not been peaceable from 1925, that the defendants had not acquired any right of easement by prescription under S. 26, Lim. Act.

The finding of the lower appellate Court that the user had not been peaceable from 1925 was also assailed before us. Whether the user had been peaceable or not is a pure question of fact and I do not think, the correctness of the finding that it was peaceable can be questioned before us in second appeal.

The contention of Mr. Mukherji that the finding of the lower appellate Court that there had been user for a very long time was sufficient for an easement by prescription, is untenable on another ground. For the creation of a right of easement by prescription, there must not only be a peaceable and open enjoyment without interruption for 20 years, but that enjoyment must be an enjoyment as of right. In the present case, there is no finding that the enjoyment was of that character. It was contended on behalf of the Pal defendants that long user was sufficient for a finding of an enjoyment as of right. This is a proposition of law to which I am unable to accede. Whether an enjoyment is as of right or not, is, in my opinion, a pure question of fact—and enjoyment as of right cannot be inferred as a matter of course from a finding of user only.

Mr. Mukherji next contended that the lower appellate Court should have dismissed the plaintiffs' case against the Pal defendants, when there was a finding in their favour on the question of a lost grant. But as I read his judgment, the District Judge's finding on the question of lost grant refers to the Dubey defendant only and the learned District Judge never found the point in favour of the Pal defendants as well. In view of what I have stated above, the judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court, so far as the Pal defendants are concerned, cannot, in my opinion, be successfully assailed.

I come now to appeal No. 229 of 1927 the appeal which the plaintiff has filed against that portion of the decree of the District Judge, whereby the learned District Judge dismissed the plaintiff's case as against the Dubey.

The District Judge has found that the Dubey, although they failed to substantiate their title to an easement by prescription, succeeded in establishing it on a lost grant. Mr. Chakravarti, for the plaintiff appellant, contended that long user was, by itself, not sufficient for a finding of lost grant. That may or may not be so. But a long user was not the only evidence on the point, so far as the Dubeyas were concerned. There was in their case the further fact that the land of the Dubeyas as also the Chatta tank were held under the same landlords, the Bannerjees of Ajodhya. The question whether there was lost grant or not is a question of fact and the lower appellate Court in the present case on a consideration of the fact of long user, coupled with the fact that the lands of the Dubeyas and the tank are held under the same landlords came to the conclusion that so far as the Dubeyas are concerned the story of a lost grant had been established.

In view of the aforesaid observations, both the appeals, in my opinion, must fail. They are accordingly both dismissed with costs.

Civil P. C., O. 34, R. 2—Co-mortgagee refusing to join in suit for money recovery, but made defendant—His costs are to be provided for just as plaintiff's.

Where in a suit for recovery of mortgage money a co-mortgagee has not joined as plaintiff, but has been joined as a defendant, the rule is that his costs should be provided for out of the security just as the plaintiff's costs: Davenport v. James, (1848) 7 Hare 249, Foll. [P 544 C 2]

Rankin, C. J.—In this case it appears that there were two mortgagees each of whom appears to have lent a sum of Rs. 12,500 on the security and the plaintiff Nanda Lal Roy brought the suit for enforcement of his mortgage. He impleaded as defendant his co-mortgagee Pulin Krishna Roy on the allegation that he had asked him to join as a plaintiff, but that he refused to do so. The co-mortgagee in his written statement appears to have admitted that he was asked to join as plaintiff, but that for various reasons he refused to do so. The suit was not contested before the learned Judge and the mortgage was proved. Thereupon the learned Judge considered the question as to costs against the absent mortgagor. He considered the English case of Davenport v. James (1) and came to the conclusion that that case was an unsatisfactory authority as it did not give the reasons for its decision and would not apply to the present case because he thought that the co-mortgagee should have reasonably joined as a plaintiff and should not have put the mortgagor to unnecessary expense by his being joined as a defendant. We have had the authorities examined before us and it does appear to me that the appellant by his learned counsel has made good his point that in a case of this sort he is not bound to join as plaintiff. He need not sue until he wants to sue. The law is that where the co-mortgagee has not joined as plaintiff, but has been joined as a defendant his costs should be provided for out of the security just as the plaintiff's costs. The learned Judge was wrong in not following the case of Davenport v. James (1) on principle. That case has been referred to and approved by authorities in various text books on mortgage, namely, Fisher on Mortgage, Coote on Mortgage, Vol. II. and Ghose on Mortgage, Edn. 4, Vol. 1, and we find that it has more than once been followed in Indian Courts. In the circumstances, I am of opinion that on a question of principle it cannot be said that a failure on the part of the co-mortgagee defendant to join as plaintiff should deprive him of the costs which he has in fact incurred. That being so, the appeal must be allowed and the appellant will be given costs in the Court below. As regards the costs in this appeal, although the mortgagor is not responsible for the appellant having to come to this Court, I do not see how the appellant can be deprived of his costs against the mortgagor. His costs in this appeal will also be added to his security.

There will be no order for costs of this appeal in favour of the plaintiff.

Appeal No. 635 of 1927, Decided on 22nd February 1929, against appellate decree of 1st Addl. Dist. Judge, 24-Per-ganas, D/- 10th January 1927.

Bengal Tenancy Act (8 of 1885), S. 193—Land let for residential or other non-agricultural function coupled with fishing—S. 193 does not apply.

If looking at a letting it is found that it was a letting for residential purposes of certain land coupled with letting of a right to fishery with single rent reserved for both the cases it would not come within the purview of S. 193. In the same way if it was open to the tenant to use the embankment for non-agricultural purposes paying a consolidated rent for the whole thing, it would not come under S. 193. But where the right created in the soil refers to the user of land and water for the purpose of fishing or if it refers to liability undertaken by the grantee to repair the embankment in the interest of fishing the case is covered by the expression "right over fisheries" to be found in S. 193. [P 546 C 2]

Rishindra Nath Sircar, Nasim Ali, and Diptendra Mohan Ghose—for Appellant.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the question is whether the claim by the plaintiff must be deemed to be subject to the special rule of limitation laid down by the Bengal Tenancy Act. That rule of limitation gives three years only for the bringing of the plaintiff's claim. Now the claim is in respect of rent of a jalkar. But the question before us depends to some extent on whether that description is adequate and sufficient and we have to turn in this case to the language of the memorandum of agreement between the parties. That agreement is an agreement in writing dated 4th January 1918, and according to the English translation before us it is called a memorandum of agreement for lease for a term of three years in respect of the right to fishery over two pieces of bheri land. The first of these two pieces of bheri land is described as Gobardanga bheri surrounded on all sides by embankment. The second piece of Bheri land is described as Santi-ram Nashkar bheri land surrounded on all sides by embankment. The document goes on to describe the two pieces of land as bheri jami jalkar and it recites that these two pieces of bheri land jalkar are in the possession and enjoyment of the grantees under a previous lease. Then it recites that a proposal has been made for granting a lease of the said bheri land jalkar and the terms of the agreement are these: that for the right to fishery over the first bheri Rs. 500 shall be paid in advance as selami and the rent shall be fixed at Rs. 3,000 per annum and that for the right to fishery over the other bheri land Rs. 500 shall be paid in advance as selami and the rent shall be fixed at Rs. 1,500 per annum. In this way the total annual rent of the said two pieces of bheri land jalkar is fixed at Rs. 4,500. It then recites:

"On the aforesaid understanding we take lease of the said two pieces of bheri land jalkar running from a certain month and having the right of possession over the said two pieces of bheri land jalkar as nij-jote execute this kabuliat."

in terms therein described. The document then recites:

"We shall at our own cost make necessary and regular repairs of the sluices and the embankments surrounding the bheri during the term of the lease and we shall make other necessary expenses. We will be in possession by growing fish and catching them."

There are various provisions as to the payment of rent. The grantees further covenant in these terms:

"We shall keep intact the boundary and shall make regular repairs of the embankment on all sides to keep them as strong and durable as they were previous to our taking the lease."

Now we have to consider whether the provisions of S. 193, Ben. Ten. Act, are applicable to the claim by the plaintiff for rent contracted for in this agreement. The language of the Act we have to deal with is this:

"The provisions of this Act applicable to suits for the recovery of arrears of rent shall, as far as may be, apply to suits for the recovery of anything payable or deliverable in respect of any rights of pasturage, forest rights, rights over fisheries and the like."

Now the first thing that is argued before us by the learned advocate for the respondent is that the general principle of the matter is this that jalkar rights do not come under the Ben. Ten. Act unless they are part of agricultural holdings. That principle I shall for the purposes of this case accept. Then we have the particular provision in S. 193. The argument on that section is not that we have to read into this section a provision that the section shall apply in respect of rights of pasturage, forest rights, rights over fisheries "being parts of agricultural holdings" but that in order to come within this section the rights over fishery must be pure incorporeal rights and that if for any purpose there is any right in the land itself whether it is purely ancillary to the purpose of fishing or not the section does not apply. It is said that if we apply the section to a case of this sort we would be violating a principle governing these matters, and making the Bengal Tenancy Act applicable to cases where certain rights are granted in the land which are not rights granted for agricultural purposes. In my opinion, that is not the way in which this section is to be looked at or to be considered for the purposes of the present case. The learned Additional District Judge has held that S. 193, Ben. Ten. Act does not apply to this case because the tenant was expressly given certain rights in respect of the embankments, outlets, etc. He says:

"This to my mind created some sort of right in the soil and in the attached land (the embankments) although the right be confined to the raising of it or repairing of it according to the necessity of the tenants and although the same was to be restored in its original condition to the lessor on expiry of the term of the lease."

In other words it is stated that if there is any right given in the land then S. 193 cannot possibly be applied. In support of that contention the case of Krishnalal Choudhury v. Salim Muhammad Choudhury (1) is cited to us. It appears that there it was contended that the lease not merely conferred a right over fishery but also created an interest in the land and that accordingly it did not come within the purview of the Bengal Tenancy Act. In that particular case the Court was in no difficulty in finding an answer to the contention because on an examination of the lease it turned out that it did not convey any interest in land over and above the mere grant of a right to fishery and on that view it was not necessary to struggle with any difficulty at all. We have also been referred to the case of Mahananda Chakravarti v. Mongala Keotani (2), where for reasons which do not appear to be very cogent to me it was argued that because the rent was a definite rent per annum the tenant taking the risk of being able to get enough fish from the tank, the letting was not the letting of a mere jalkar. On looking at the agreement before me it appears to me that it is a question of fishery and nothing but fishery throughout. The language of the section is not right of fishery but rights over fisheries and that expression comes after such special rights as pasturage and forest rights and is succeeded by the general phrase "and the like." I have to refer to this document to see whether this is a case of rights over fishery or something more.

I need not say that I quite agree that if you look at a letting and find that it is a letting for residential purposes of certain land coupled with a letting of a right to fishery with a single rent reserved for both, the case would not come within the purview of S. 193. In the same way if in this case it was open to the tenant to use the embankment for non-agricultural purposes with no reference to fishery e. g., for industrial purposes, paying a consolidated rent for the whole thing, it would not come under S. 193. When I come to the agreement in this case it appears to me perfectly true as the learned Additional District Judge says that some sort of right in the soil may be created by the grant. But what sort of right in the soil? If it refers to the right of user of the land and water for the purpose of fishing, or if it refers to the liability undertaken by the grantee to repair the embankment in the interest of fishing, it does not seem to me that it in any way conflicts with principle to hold that the case is covered by the expression "rights over fisheries" to be found in S. 193. One of the conditions upon which the considerable amount of rent was agreed to for the right of fishing over this water was that the grantee should be entitled to use the embankment for the purposes of growing fish or catching them and also to use the embankment for the purpose of keeping their obligation to repair the embankment in order that their fishing rights might not be affected. There is no suggestion in this document of the grantee having a right to use the embankment for purposes unconnected with fishing and unconnected with agriculture.

I, therefore, think that the special rule of limitation does apply to this case and that this appeal must be allowed and that the suit must be dismissed with costs in this Court and in the Courts below.

Appeal No. 2215 of 1926, Decided on 15th August 1928, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Asansole, D/- 23rd August 1926.

(a) Contract Act, S. 20—Mining lease for plot of 100 bighas—Plot actually less than 100 bighas—No common mistake held to exist.

Where in a suit to recover rent due under a mining lease the mistake alleged by the defendant was that whereas under the patta the subject-matter of the lease was a plot of land measuring by reputation one hundred bighas while it turned out that it was actually less.

Held : that the exact area of 100 bighas more or less was not essential for the colliery purpose for which the agreement was arrived at and that there was no common mistake with regard to an essential fact. [P 548 C 1]

(b) Practice—New Plea—Entirely different and inconsistent defence in second appeal is not sustainable.

Where the defence in the lower Court was fraudulent misrepresentation as to the area concerned and in second appeal S. 20, Contract Act, was pleaded for the first time, the defence was held to be unsustainable as the plea was inconsistent. [P 548 C 2]

Page, J.—This is a suit brought to recover royalties or rent due under a mining lease. The defence which was urged before us in this appeal was that the lease was void under S. 20, Contract Act, which reads as follows :

“ Where both the parties to an agreement are under a mistake as to a matter of fact essential to an agreement the agreement is void. ”

The question that falls for determination is whether having regard to the facts proved in this case, the defendant could sustain such a defence. It appears from the evidence of the defendant himself that he had acquired possession of certain plots in this mauza with a view to being in a position to enable an assignee from him to carry on mining operations. There is no finding and it does not appear from the terms of the patta that it was intended by the parties to the patta that the colliery should actually be situate on the land which was the subject-matter of the lease and under the terms of the lease, if the defendant at any time so selected, he could surrender the lease on giving six months' notice and liquidating the dues that had accrued up to the date of surrender. The lease was effected in 1920 and uptill August 1923 and so far as we are aware, up to the present time the defendant has not surrendered the holding. That would have been an easy way in which he could have got out of any difficulty that he felt in having under the lease obtained possession of the lesser area than he could profitably use for colliery purposes. I have asked myself why did not he surrender this holding under the terms of the patta, if he felt that it had imposed upon him grievous obligations without commensurate compensation. I think the answer may well be that as the defendant himself admitted in the course of his evidence that he was proposing to resell this land and to assign the benefit which he could obtain under the patta to some other person the reason why the defendant has retained possession of the land under the patta was because he was waiting to see whether the market might not turn in his favour and he was not prepared either to surrender the holding or after two years to pay rent because the coal industry had become in a less satisfactory condition. I cannot help believing that if there had been a boom in the coal trade, there would have been no necessity for this suit to have been launched. Now, in order to bring the case within S. 20 it was incumbent upon the defendant to prove inter alia that there was a common mistake of facts and that that common mistake was with respect to a fact essential to the agreement. The common mistake which is alleged before us is that whereas under the potta the subject-matter of the lease was "a plot of land measuring by reputation one hundred bighas" it turns out that it measures considerably less than 100 bighas. According to one estimate it measures 20 bighas and odd, according to the Settlement Khatian it measures 66 bighas and a gentleman employed in the coal trade called as a witness stated that on the 20 bighas it was not feasible to erect a colliery. Now, what was this plot of land which was the subject-matter of the potta? It is stated in the lease to be: a plot of land measuring by reputation one hundred bighas commonly known as the field of Kayattala in touzi No. 3522 of the Collectorate of Burdwan in the village of Mouja Kumardihi included in Pergannah Shergarh Police Station Ondal Sub-Registry Raneegange Chowki Asansole in the Collectorate District of Burdwan and in the recent settlement it has been recorded in our name from dag No. 1 to Reg. No. 9."

and later it is described as a plot: "which has been presently measured from dag No. 1 to dag No. 9 in the recent settlement."

Now what this land consisted of could have been ascertained by any body who elected to take the trouble to make the necessary inquiries from the office of the collectorate. But the complaint of the defendant is that he knew nothing about this, he never measured it and he made no enquiries for 3 years. Why not, if he really was placing reliance upon the exact measurement being 100 bighas? To that question no satisfactory answer has been given. In those circumstances I approach the issue whether there was a mutual mistake as to the fact essential to the agreement. I am not satisfied that the exact area of 100 bighas more or less was essential for the colliery purposes for which the agreement was arrived at. But be that as it may, until the suit was argued in second appeal before this Court, there had never been any allegation or suggestion on that the agreement was void upon the ground of the mutual mistake of the parties as to the extent of area leased. Mutual mistake is not a ground set out in the memorandum of appeal, and not only has it never been the case presented on behalf of the defendant in the lower Courts, but it is inconsistent with the case upon which he sought to defeat the plaintiff's claim for rent, for in the lower Courts the defendant contended that he was the innocent victim of a fraudulent misrepresentation as to the area on the part of the plaintiff. Both the Courts have negatived the charge of misrepresentation, fraudulent or otherwise, but such an allegation is inconsistent with the contention that both the plaintiff and the defendant were executing the potta under a common mistake of fact as to the extent of the area. In those circumstances, to my mind, the contention that the contract was void upon the ground of mutual mistake of fact essential to the agreement cannot be sustained and the defence fails. It was further contended that in any case the plaintiff was only entitled to a proportionate sum for royalty or rent in respect of those premises inasmuch as minimum royalty was Rs. 2,000 and that was based upon the area being 100 bighas at the rate of Rs. 20 a bigha.

For the reasons I have given I do not believe that the exact area leased was of the essence of the contract and from a perusal of the terms of the potta, in my opinion, a royalty of Rs. 2,000 was to be paid irrespective of whether the area in fact turned out to be 100 bighas or more or less than that area. In those circumstances, the claim for proportionate abatement also fails and, in my opinion, the defence which was presented before us was misconceived and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Garlick, J.—The facts of the case are these. The plaintiff's grandfather Madu Sudan took Rs. 400 from his relatives Ratneswar Mallik and Guru Dayal Mallik and executed in their favour a deed of sale of about 24 bighas of land. The deed was executed in the name of their benamdar Gopi Nath Sarkar. At the same time Gopi Nath executed in favour of Madu Sudan an ekrarnama in which the fact of sale was recited and it was agreed that if Madu Sudan repaid Rs. 400 at any time the property would be reconveyed to him. In pursuance of this arrangement the purchaser had possession of the land for nearly sixty years. The document was executed in January 1862. In 1918 the plaintiffs claimed the right to redeem the property by repaying Rs. 400. The original parties to the transaction were all dead. Six of the descendants of the original purchasers consented to reconvey their shares of the property to the plaintiffs. Six others refused to do so. Defendants 7 to 12 are those who did execute a deed of reconveyance. Defendants 1 to 6 are those who refused to do so. The plaintiffs filed this redemption suit on 24th January 1922 which was about a week before the sixty years period of limitation expired. It was contested by defendants 1 to 6. Both the lower Courts have held that as the two documents were executed at the same time they must have constituted one transaction and that that transaction was a mortgage by conditional sale. They have therefore allowed the plaintiffs to redeem by a repayment of the original money that was borrowed. Defendants 1 to 6 have appealed against that decision. They assert that the transaction was an out and out sale and that the agreement in the ekrar for reconveyance was a purely personal agreement between Madhu Sudan and the purchasers and was not binding on the purchaser's heirs. The kobala (Ex. A) taken by itself is a deed of out and out sale.

The ekrarnama also recites that the transaction was an out and out sale transferring to the purchaser absolute rights over the property including all powers of alienation. But the learned Subordinate Judge says that unless there was an intention to treat the transaction as a mortgage by conditional sale there was no object in executing the ekrarnama (Ex. 3) at all. He also found circumstantial evidence to show that the transaction was intended to be a mortgage. He pointed out that in 1901 the sons of Ratneswar and Guru Dayal in a transaction between themselves described the property in suit as bandaki. He also pointed out that in a cess return filed by the defendants' predecessors in 1905 this property was omitted. He mentioned again that the heirs of Ratneswar and Guru Dayal once tried to establish their independent right to this property by a suit for possession against a third person but they withdrew the suit. He points out again that the heirs of the purchasers have not produced any of their collection papers to show that the property was treated by them as their own. He comments on the fact that six of the heirs of the purchaser have recognized the transaction to be a mortgage and have reconveyed their shares in the property. Two other points in the plaintiff's favour were mentioned in the judgment of the Munsiff. He pointed out that the stamp of the kobala was paid for by Madhu Sudan and he expressed the opinion that the price of Rs. 400 for 24 bighas of land must have been inadequate even 60 years ago. But the learned Subordinate Judge does not attach any importance to these last two points. He says that Madhusudan probably paid for the stamp of the kobala because he was in urgent need of the money and the stamp on the ekrar-nama was paid for by the purchaser. He says that it is impossible to say now whether Rs. 400 was an adequate price for 24 bighas of land 60 years ago or whether it was not.

In this Court the respondents' advocate has supported the judgment by urging other reasons also why the transaction must have been a mortgage and not an out and out sale. He argues that Madhusudan was in urgent need of money and took a temporary accommodation from his relatives and gave the land as security for the loan. As the money was advanced by his relatives no period was fixed for repayment of the loan and there was no provision for interest nor was there any bargaining over the price. He argues that all the circumstances show that the intention of the parties was that the property should be given back if the money was repaid.

The kobala taken by itself is a deed of out and out sale. It cannot be held to be a mortgage unless there is strong evidence that it was the intention of the parties that the transaction should be only a mortgage. The property was in the possession of the purchasers for nearly 60 years and the presumption from long possession is that it was their property. What was both nominally and in effect a sale cannot be lightly set aside after the death of the contracting parties on an assertion that the land was given as a mere security for the small sum borrowed. One would think that if 24 bighas were given as security for Rs. 400, the mortgagor would have redeemed the mortgage long ago. The learned advocate for the respondents quotes rulings in which it has been held that the Courts always lean strongly in favour of the persons who claim the right to redeem. The reason for this is historical. In England in the Courts of common law mortgages were not originally recognized at all. It was the Court of Chancery which compelled the mortgagee who had accepted land as security for a loan to give up the land when the money was repaid. The Courts are wont to lean in favour of persons who claim the right to redeem because the common law gave them no such right and the Courts of Equity took upon themselves to protect them. But in this case there is no reason why the Court should lean strongly in favour of the plaintiffs who have waited 60 years before asserting their claim. They have not paid any interest for the money.

There seems to be no equity in their favour. If the transaction was a mortgage they could have redeemed the property any time within the last 60 years. The fact that they waited until a week before the expiry of 60 years before instituting a suit is a strong reason for suspecting that the transaction was not a mortgage. During the 60 years the heirs of the purchaser have been enjoying the profits of the property, have been paying the rent, have received no interest and have had the full right of alienation. They could have sold the property to some one else at any time during these two generations. We cannot treat the transaction as a mortgage unless there are clear signs of the existence of the relationship of the creditor and debtor between the parties. I do not find any signs of the existence of the relationship of debtor and creditor except the apparent admission by certain heirs of the purchaser which are mentioned by the lower appellate Court. An agreement which has not been asserted for 60 years must be strictly construed. In my opinion the agreement of the learned vakil for the appellants that the agreement in the ekrar for reconveyance was a purely personal argument between the purchaser and Madhusudan should be accepted. The kobala purports to be an out and out sale and the ekrar-nama taken by itself is a document for which no consideration at all was given. It must, therefore, be strictly construed. It describes the transaction as a sale which is to bind the heirs of both the parties and then it goes on to say that if Madhusudan repays the money at any time a reconveyance will be made in his favour. It says nothing about redemption by Madhusudan's heirs. If the document is strictly construed the right to redeem is confined to Madhusudan himself. And he is dead. In my opinion there is no reason whatever to disturb a transaction which ostensibly was an out and out sale and which has had all the effects of a sale for nearly 60 years. For these reasons I would allow the appeal and set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court with costs.

Suhrawardy, J.—I fully agree with the view expressed by my learned brother. I would only add a few words in order to explain the true nature of the transaction as evidenced by the two documents executed on 14th Magh 1268 B. S. (February 1862). The first is described as a deed of sale. It recites that on account of the expenses for the Sradh of the mother of the executant the vendor is in need of funds and, therefore, on receipt of Rs. 400 as purchase money he sells out the lands in suit. Then follows the usual term in a deed of sale that ;

"the purchaser, his heirs, etc., will be entitled to sell or make a gift of the lands without any objection by the executant or his heirs, etc. The purchaser and his heirs and successors shall enjoy and possess all the lands with all their appertenant rights by either cultivating the same or settling tenants on the lands."

It concludes by saying that on receipt of the consideration of Rs. 400 the kobala is executed in favour of the purchaser. The second document is headed ekrarnama or a deed of agreement. It is executed by the purchaser in favour of the vendor. It recites that on account of funds for the Sradh, the vendor has sold to the purchaser the lands and relinquished all right, title and interest in the said property.

"I have become entitled to sell the said properties and can enjoy with my sons and grandsons and possess the said properties either by cultivating the same in khas or by settling tenants on them. In that you or your heirs can never lay claim to it and if you do so that will be void and shall be refused."

This clause is followed by the following clause :

"In future if you pay the consideration money at any time I shall on acceptance of the same return to you the kobala and take back the agreement. Nobody will object to this."

Reading the two documents it is clear that the intention of the parties was to effect an absolute sale, the vendee promising to return the property on receipt of the purchase money and nothing more, i. e., a sale with option of repurchase. It is conceded by the learned advocate for the respondents that in every case where there is a conveyance and a promise to reconvey, it cannot be presumed that the transaction is not a sale but is a mortgage. But the learned advocate has pointed out certain circumstances which he says show that the transaction was really a mortgage and not a sale. (1) That the vendor and the purchaser were near relations and that the vendor was in need of money at the time. I do not see how this fact goes to support the view that the transaction was a mortgage and not a sale, as it is as much consistent with the transaction being a sale. The parties were related, one of them was in need of money and the other probably in order to avoid the property going out of the family or to oblige his relative offered to purchase it. (2) In the ekrarnama there is a condition that on return of the purchase money the purchaser will return the kobala and take back the agreement. There is no condition that the purchaser should execute a reconveyance which must be necessary if the transaction was a sale. The absence of this condition does not necessarily signify that the transaction was anything but a sale. The parties might not have been so well versed in law as to invest the transaction with all legal character. It might also be that it was their idea that the return of the kobala executed by the vendor to him and the return of the agreement by the vendor to the vendee would constitute a good transfer. (3) It does not appear that there was any bargain for the price. A deed of sale does not ordinarily show that there was any bargain for the price. We do not know what happened at that time and there is no finding by any of the Courts below on this point.

Reference has been made to several cases which have dealt with the question as to whether a certain transaction was really a mortgage or a sale. It is not necessary to go into the cases decided by the Indian Courts for we have so many pronouncements of the Judicial Committee on this question that there can hardly be any difficulty in finding the real nature of a transaction like that in the present case. The earliest case which was referred to in this connexion is the case of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (1). It seems to me that this case has the greatest resemblance with the case before us. The only difference between that case and this is that in Bhagwan Sahai's case there was a stipulation that if the money was paid within a period of 10 years from the date of the deed the purchaser would accept it and "cancel this valid sale;" and also that in the agreement it was mentioned that as a matter of favour, grace and indulgence the purchaser should execute a deed on taking back the purchase money after 10 years. It is argued on behalf of the respondents that the absence of these two points in the present transaction distinguishes it from the case of Bhagwan Sahai (1). To my mind the distinction is very immaterial. Their Lordships relying upon certain features of that case which are also present in this case held that it was an out and out sale and not a mortgage. (1) there was no stipulation that the vendor should have the right to repurchase. (2) The right to repurchase was given on payment of the full amount of the purchase money and not what should be due at the date of the purchase. Their Lordships followed the English case of Alderson v. White (2) and quoted with approval the dictum of Lord Chancellor Cranworth laying down the rule which should be followed in construing cases of this nature:

"The rule of law on this subject is one dictated by common sense that prima facie an absolute conveyance containing nothing to show that the relation of debtor and creditor is to exist between the parties does not cease to be an absolute conveyance and become a mortgage merely because the vendor stipulates that he shall have a right to repurchase."

The next case is the case of Bal Kishen Das v. Legge (3). In that case there was a deed of sale accompanied by an agreement by which the purchaser promised to resell the property to the vendor on his paying him a certain amount by a certain date. In the circumstances of that case their Lordships held that there was sufficient indication that the transaction was really a mortgage and not a sale. The points upon which the case of Bhagwan Sahai was distinguished in Bal Kishen's case (3) are pointed out by the Judicial Committee in the case of Jhenda Singh v. Whaid-Ud-din (4). In that case too there was a deed of sale of immovable property and an agreement to resell. Their Lordships held that there was nothing in the fact that these documents were simultaneously executed or one after another to indicate that the transaction was not a sale but a mortgage. Bal Kishen's case was distinguished on the ground that there the amount to be repaid was not the same amount for which the property was sold but an amount made up of the purchase money and some subsequent advances, and the fact that the debt was consolidated showed that it was not a case of out and out sale; and it was further remarked in Jhenda Singh's case (4) that the case of Bhagwan Sahai resembled the case before their Lordships more than any other case.

One of the facts on which the Judicial Committee were led to hold that the transaction was a mortgage in Bal Kishen's case (3) was that there was a stipulation that if the money for the repurchase was not accepted by the vendee the vendor would be entitled to deposit the money in Court. In Jhenda Singh's case (4) their Lordships held that the mere fact that in the event of the purchaser refusing to accept the money for repurchase it may be deposited in Court did not necessarily indicate that the transaction was a mortgage. Next we have the case of Narasingerji Gyanagerji v. Panugenti Parthasaradhi (5). In that case it was found that the price for which the property was purchased was absurdly low, less even than what the property would have realized upon a public sale and the vendor reserved to himself the sole right to the minerals and the mineral right including marble in the village and the right to repurchase the said village as per agreement executed on the same date as the deed of sale. In consideration of these facts and other clauses in the document the Judicial Committee came to the conclusion that the transaction was mortgage and not a sale. The most important term in that transaction which greatly influenced their Lordships was that the mineral right was reserved by the vendor. A case of absolute sale would be inconsistent with the reservation of any right above or below the surface. That case accordingly has no application, to the facts of this case.

(5) A. I. R. 1924 P. C. 226=47 Mad. 723=51 I. A. 305 (P.O.).

The learned Subordinate Judge referred to several circumstances and pieces of evidence in support of the view that the transaction was a mortgage. The circumstances which he points out are that in a certain document the sons of the original purchasers described this property as a mortgaged property; and that in certain road cess-returns this property was not mentioned as belonging to the family of the purchaser. It has been repeatedly held by the Judicial Committee that evidence so far as it relates to prove how the language of the document is related to the existing facts and surrounding circumstances is only admissible. This rule was forcibly stated in Bal Kishen v. Legge (3) and also in Maungkyin v. Ma Shwe La (6). But it is argued on the authority of the decision of their Lordships in Bajinath Singh v. Hajee Vally Mahomed Hajee Abba (7) that S. 92, Evidence Act does not fetter the Court's power to arrive at the true meaning and effect of a transaction in the light of all the surrounding circumstances. On an examination of that case it will appear that their Lordships did not go back on what they stated in Bal Kishen's case and in the Burma case above referred to. They have stuck to the rule that S. 92 does not preclude any evidence relating to the surrounding circumstances. In the case before their Lordships the transaction extended over a long period and in construing the document which was executed in 1912 their Lordships took into account certain other documents executed in 1913 as part of the original transaction. The case before us is very similar to the one that came up for consideration before the Bombay High Court Vaman Trimbak v. Changi (8). Under similar circumstances the learned Judges held that it was a deed of pure sale.

There is one other circumstance in this case which ought to debar the plaintiff from contending that the transaction was not a sale but a mortgage. The suit was brought just a few days before the completion of 60 years from the date of the transaction. It is impossible at this distant date to give evidence of facts and surrounding circumstances at the time of the transaction. In Bhagwan Sahai's case their Lordships remarked:

"It does seem contrary to all principles of equity and good conscience that when it was stipulated that the money should be repaid within the period of 10 years from 1835 the representatives of the vendors could lie by until the year 1884 and then claim that they had a right which was not barred by limitation to redeem that which they call a mortgage at any time within the period of 60 years."

In Jhenda Singh's case the suit was brought 44 years after the period within which repurchase could have been effected. Their Lordships quoted the remark of Lord Cranworth in Alderson v. White (2).

"I think the Court after a lapse of 30 years ought to require cogent evidence to induce it to hold that an instrument is not what it purports to be."

It is needless to say that in the present case no evidence cogent or otherwise of the transaction at the time when it took place was given. On all these considerations I agree that the transaction should be held as an out and out sale and not a mortgage as contended for by the plaintiffs. In this view it is not necessary to consider whether the right of repurchase was a personal right given to the vendor or it was a right which could be claimed by his successors. Nor is it necessary to consider if the absence of mention of any time within which the right to repurchase should be exercised offends against the rule against perpetuity as the present suit is not a suit for specific performance of a contract. I agree that this appeal should be allowed, the decree of the Courts below set aside and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs in all the Courts.

Where a co-owner has expended money on the joint property and time comes for partition it is reasonable and right to endeavour to give him such an allotment as may enable him to reap the advantage of what he has expended upon improvements but it is not the prima facie right of such a co-owner who has improved the whole or greater portion of the joint land to have in one way or another recouped to him by his co-owners the value of improvements which the other co-owners get in the shares allotted to them; the improver in the latter case is a mere volunteer and cannot without consent of his co-owners lay foundation for charging them with the improvements.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge, Third Court of the 24 Parganas in a partition suit brought on 20th January 1920. It appears that the whole of the land with which we are concerned is about three bighas in area and, in 1893, a gentleman of the name Melosch took a lease for nine years of what was described as two bighas out of the three bighas and it was further said that the bigha which was not included was the share of Shyam Lal and Kishori

Lal Mandal. Melosch was minded to put up a rice-mill and he covenanted to erect a brick-built machine-room and rice and paddy godowns at his own expense upon this land. He further covenanted that he should have the right, on the expiry of the term, to remove the buildings at his own costs and that he should not be competent to claim any damages in respect of the removal from the lessors. There is a clause which seems to operate nothing :

"If it be necessary to sell the same, I shall sell the same to you at the market price."

The lessors under that lease were, speaking substantially, the plaintiffs in the present suit, and, when that lease came to an end in September 1902, the present defendant 1 whom I shall call Musaji executed a kabuliati on the same lines. The covenant ran as follows :

"In addition to the machine-room etc., standing on the said land which was purchased by me, I shall erect machine-rooms etc., according to requirements . . . . . On the expiry of the term within one month thereof, I shall remove the buildings etc., belonging to me at my own cost. I shall not be competent to claim any damages in respect of the same from you ; and if it be necessary to sell the same, I shall sell the same to you at the market price."

Now, that term lasted till 1912. In the meantime in 1904, Musaji, defendant 1, purchased a one third share of the entire property from two of the co-owners who had not been lessors to him. After that in December 1909, he entered into a fresh kabuliati with the plaintiffs excluding certain property :

"the share of your cosharer Babu Kishori Lal Mandal specified in schedule below."

He covenanted again that, on erecting houses as required by him he would enjoy the property. He covenanted that he would remove the houses within one month of the expiry of the term at his own cost and would not be competent to claim damages in respect of the same from the plaintiffs. This last lease expired in October 1919 and the suit for partition was brought in January 1920.

In the written statement of defendant 1, he set up as a defence, first of all, that there were some nine cottas of land which had not been comprised in any of his leases and that, as regards those nine cottas, he had become entitled to them by adverse possession apart altogether from the one-third share which he had bought as I have said. Then he went on to say that he raised valuable structures and a rice-mill on a part of the land and that as far as possible, that portion of the land should be allotted to him. So far not much difficulty arises. In para. 9, he said that :

"the land in suit was low and jungly and this defendant reclaimed it, raised its level, covered the major portion of the land with bricks and cement plaster for the purpose of making a grain-yard ; the defendant values the said improvements at about Rs. 20,000 and submits that he is entitled to get the value of the same from the other cosharers according to their shares on partition."

It will be seen, therefore, that the improvements which he claims are in no way claimed as having been made at any particular time rather than another. It might have been as well that particulars of this allegation had been given ; but the allegation is that he reclaimed the whole land, raised its level and covered the major portion with bricks and cement plaster. There is no particular allegation about the nine cottas. There is no particular allegation that he did this before or after 1904 or that he did this at one point of the land rather than another. In that position, the suit came on for trial and, when the plaintiffs' witness was in the witness-box, the defendant's pleader wanted to cross-examine him about the details of these improvements ; but the learned Judge thinking this to be irrelevant had the matter argued and came to the conclusion that, in this suit the question of improvement did not arise. He gave to defendant 1 in the directions contained in his preliminary decree for partition a right to have as far as possible the land upon which these valuable structures had been erected and no complaint as regards the structures erected in the way of a rice-mill is now pressed before us. The learned Judge was of opinion that in this case no other question could be entertained as regards the improvements ; and it is on that point that this appeal is directed.

Mr. Hira Lal Chuckerburty for the appellant says that without hearing evidence to find out what these improvements are, when they are made, what their value is and so fourth, it is not possible to make a partition and to be sure that defendant 1 is not entitled to more than the right which has been granted to him, namely, to get as much as possible the land which has got the structures and the rice-mill upon it.

Upon that question the first thing that has to be carefully looked into is the question of the position of defendant 1 as a lessee. The lease which I have referred to of 1st December 1909 expired in October 1919 and the first thing to see is whether that lease is still subsisting or not. Defendant 1 in his written statement objected that the plaintiffs were not in possession and, when one comes to the evidence given by the parties what one finds is that, in October 1919, there is no suggestion that defendant 1 wrote to the plaintiffs or to anybody else so as to change his status or position giving notice to them that he would be no longer their tenant or anything of that kind. The evidence on the part of the landlords was that they regarded defendant 1 as a tenant and not as a trespasser and that defendant 1 was really in the position of a tenant holding over upon the terms of the kabuliati of 1909. In my judgment, that was his position. The principle at all events of S. 116, T. P. Act a principle which in no way depends upon that enactment, is clear enough. If a tenant holds over, it only requires the consent of the landlord to keep him as a tenant upon terms which can be discovered from the proper source. In my opinion, the learned Judge was entirely right when he dealt with this suit on the footing that at the time it was brought defendant 1 was a tenant of the plaintiffs holding over with the consent of the lessors.

That being the position, there can be no doubt that the plaintiffs had possession of the land to found a suit for partition and I see no objection at all to this suit upon that score. In these circumstances, the learned Judge's reasoning is this. We are here partitioning land which is in the occupation, so far as the plaintiffs' share is concerned, of defendant 1 as a tenant. The terms of the tenancy deal expressly with the question of improvement. At the end of the term, the various covenants or bargains that have been made with defendant 1 will take effect. He was to be entitled to put up any structures he liked on a part of his tenancy. Equally he was not to be entitled to make the landlords, the plaintiffs, pay for them. He was to have the right to take them away, if he wanted. Otherwise, as between the lessee and the lessors, when the terms came to an end, he was to have no further advantage for his expenses on the improvements. In these circumstances, the learned Judge says that it is not reasonable or possible in this partition suit to do more than to give to defendant 1 a one-third share directing that, as far as possible, his one-third share should be the land upon which these structures of his have been erected. Mr. Hira Lal Chakraborty contends before us that that is not enough, because his client after 1904 was a co-owner. He says that his client, defendant 1 is to be treated as if he were a co-owner in possession of the whole as such and he says further that it is a general principle of equity that when a man, as co-owner, has made improvements over the whole, prima facie he is entitled not merely to get an allotment of his share which will carry with it, so far as possible, the benefits of the improvements but he is entitled prima facie either to make the other co-owner pay for the improvements he has made upon the rest of the property or else the other co-owners must get a smaller share in order that the person who has made the improvements may reap the value of his expenses.

In my opinion, this appeal fails upon two main grounds in that respect as to which Mr. Chukerbutty in a very able and careful argument has not convinced me at all. First of all, it seems to me that, as between defendant 1 and the plaintiffs, defendant 1 who took his kabuliat after he became a co-owner, namely, in 1909, is not in the position of a co-owner in occupation of the whole as such. He is a person who has definitely attorned to them in respect of the plaintiffs' share. He has made a bargain with them, notwithstanding that he is a co-owner a bargain that he will get possession of the plaintiffs' share as a tenant with the right to build what he likes on the term that he is not to charge the plaintiffs with the costs that he may have expended. It appears to me, therefore, that the general principle applicable to a co-owner who is in possession of the whole as such is not to be applied to this case without qualification. Prima facie, this matter of improvement is a matter upon which the plaintiffs and defendant 1 have long ago made their bargain with their eyes open and that is an important circumstance when we come to consider the equity in this case. In the second place, Mr. Chuckerbutty's case here would require us to put the law too high. I am prepared to assent to the proposition that where a person has expended money upon a joint property and a time comes to partition it, it is reasonable and right to endeavour to give him such an allotment as may enable him to reap the advantage of what he has expended upon improvements. But when we are asked to go beyond that and to say that it is the prima facie right of such a co-owner expending money to improve the whole or a greater portion of the joint land to have in one way or another recouped to him by his co-owners the value of the improvements which they got in the shares which are allotted to them, then I say that that is not the law. In some cases it may be possible to go so far. In the case before North, J, for example, namely In re : Jones, Forrington v. Forrester (1) money had been borrowed at the instance of both the joint tenants, it had been secured on the share of one, it had been borrowed for the purpose of making improvements and the property at the time of the suit had to be sold and the price was going to be enhanced by reason of the improvements which had been made. In such a case as that, it may be right enough to give to the person who has made the improvement not only his one-third of the purchase money but such a further sum as represents improvement which he has made. But in a case which is not such, in a case where the improvements have been made by a co-owner at his own will I do not say improperly, in any way, but at his own will it is a very different matter; prima facie it is not a thing which the Court will do to endeavour to make sure that the owner who has improved the property will get every penny to himself of the advantage which his money has created. See, in this connexion, Freeman on Co-tenancy and Partition, Edn. 2, p. 680 :

"If one joint tenant or tenant-in-common covers the whole of the estate with valuable improvements so that it is impossible for his co-tenant to obtain his share of the estate without including a part of the improvements so made, the tenant making the improvements would not be entitled to compensation therefor, notwithstanding they may have added greatly to the value of the land; because it would be the improver's own folly to extend his own improvements over the whole estate and because it would be unjust to permit a co-tenant at his pleasure to charge another co-tenant with improvements he may not have desired. In such a case, the improver stands as a mere volunteer and cannot, without the consent of his co-tenant, lay the foundation for charging him with improvements."

Prima facie, it seems to me that such an owner will be given an allotment, so far as is possible, that may enable him to keep the advantage of his improvements. But it requires a special case and a very strong case for the Court to go any further than that.

I notice that, in two cases of this Court which were cited to us in which Asutosh, J. Mookerjee, delivered judgment, namely, the cases of Upendra Nath v. Umesh Chandra (2) and Jagannath Marwari v. Chandni Bibi (3) there is no reason for saying though the language is undoubtedly wide in certain of the expressions, that Mookerjee, J., intended to lay down a proposition beyond what I have endeavoured to state. He was most careful in one of those cases to say that the question whether one could go further and invoke the aid of equity so as to enable a co-sharer to get the whole advantage of his own improvements was a question which did not arise. For these reasons, I think that, although the learned Subordinate Judge perhaps took a certain risk in striking so soon as he did and in refusing to go into evidence about these improvements, he arrived at a right conclusion. It does not seem to me that it is necessary or advisable that we should require the defendant-appellant to give particulars of the dates and the characters of the various improvements he claims to have made upon the property or to direct any enquiry thereon because it is sufficiently clear that it is not in this case possible upon any principle of equity for the Court to do more for him than the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge has done.

Certain other points have been taken by the learned advocate for the appellant which are only minor points and need not be dealt with at any length. One is that there was a defendant Khattiza Bibi a married lady who lived at an address in Natal in South Africa which appears to have been known to the parties. She was served quite properly by a registered letter. I observe that this registered letter was apparently a registered post-card. It does seem to me rather inadvisable to send such a notice in the form of a post-card. But she was served in a way that complied with the rules under O. 5, Civil P. C. Then, it is said that there was no acknowledgment of the return and another notice was sent again. That was quite proper and was a fresh service under the rules. Thereupon the plaintiffs getting somewhat excited about the position appear to have gone to the learned Subordinate Judge and got an order under the guise of an order for substituted service an order according to which a copy of the notice was put up in the Court House of the twenty-Perganas by way of giving information to the lady who by all consent was then living with her husband somewhere in Natal in South Africa. That is an absurdity. It is certainly not a reasonable way of serving notice. Substituted service is not to be used in any way which is unbusiness like and ridiculous. But in this case, there is ample evidence that under O. 5, R. 25, Civil P. C., this lady was properly served by a proper notice being sent to her and posted to her in the ordinary manner. In these circumstances, it was not necessary to have recourse to the somewhat peculiar procedure that had been adopted in this case under the guise of substituted service.

The last point which remains for consideration is with reference to a plot of 9 cottas which does not appear in any of the leases granted to defendant 1 or his predecessor Melosh. As regards that, defendant 1 makes a claim to have acquired a complete title thereto by adverse possession. That is not an easy thing to make out as against a co-owner at any time. But on the evidence of the defendant-appellant's own witnesses in this case, it seems to me that that claim is wholly unsubstantial. This plot of 9 cottas is a piece of land on which there seems at first to have been a cattle-shed and it was not originally leased to Mr.

Melosch for the purposes of his mill. As time went on, the owner of the mill seems to have taken to use it. He seems to have used it as a place where some of his coolies might sleep at night. I need not say that one co-owner by making use of the property in that way does not acquire adverse possession as against the other co-owners. The case of adverse possession on the oral evidence can safely be rejected.

In the circumstances mentioned, it appears to me that this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs to the plaintiffs-respondents. This hearing-fee is assessed at fifteen gold mohurs. The advocate for the minor defendant respondents says that he has been siding with the appellant.

Appeal No. 28 of 1926, Decided on 7th March 1929, against original decree of Sub-Judge, Birbhum, D/- 23rd December 1925.

Cosharer—Fraud—Cosharers colluding to deprive other cosharers of property by purchase at Court sale for arrears of rent cannot retain property as against other cosharers and aggrieved cosharers are entitled to mesne profits, while out of possession.

A property was put up for sale for arrears of rent. One of the cosharers charged to deposit the amount in Court and avoid sale colluded with the third person who was also a cosharer and with a view to deprive the other cosharers of the property caused the property to be sold. The property was purchased by the (third person) cosharer promising four annas share to the cosharer charged to deposit the amount. Aggrieved cosharers brought a suit for setting aside the sale.

Held : that the purchasing cosharer was to be regarded to be in possession of the property for the benefit of the aggrieved cosharers according to their several interests at the date of sale. The purchasing cosharer and the colluding cosharers were in the position of trustee on behalf of the cosharers and as soon as the aggrieved cosharers deposited in the Court their share of the purchase money according to their share of the estate with interest thereon they would be entitled to a reconveyance of the property with respect to their shares as well as to profits received by them : *A. B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal on behalf of defendant 1 which arises out of a suit brought by a large number of plaintiffs for setting aside a revenue sale of towzi No. 1080 of the Birbhum Collectorate. This estate belonged to a large number of cosharers including several defendants in this case. It is not necessary to give the shares of the parties. The important fact is that defendant 3 had a small share as proprietor and another share as purchaser of an interest which consisted of a mokarari mourashi ease in favour of defendants 20 to 26. There was a small arrear for the share of some of the plaintiffs. There was no separate account, but by an arrangement among the several cosharers of the property, they used to pay revenue according to their shares in the collectorate. The revenue of the March Kist of 1922 being in arrears, the whole estate was advertised for sale. Defendant 20 applied for payment of the arrears to the collectorate and the Collector granted permission to pay the arrears on 20th June 1922. But although the amount was a small one, it was not paid, and the property was put up to sale on 26th June 1922 and purchased by defendant 1 for Rs. 1,600. It is found by the Court below that the property was valuable and would be worth about Rs. 12,000. The plaintiffs alleged that they sent one of their cosharers whose name is Md. Ahmed with sufficient money to make the deposit before the property was put up to sale. But this Md. Ahmed colluded with Abu Taher, defendant 3, and did not pay the amount with the object that the property would be sold at the revenue sale and purchased by Abu Taher who would give four annas of the property to Md. Ahmed after the sale. Shortly stated, that is the story of the plaintiffs and they asked for setting aside the sale on the ground of fraud of Abu Taher who is alleged to have purchased the property in the benami of defendant 1. The defendants denied every statement made by the plaintiffs. The pleadings of the parties are very lengthy and the issues framed in the Court below were numerous. The real questions which we have to consider in this case are covered by issues 9, 10 and 11. The questions were first, whether defendant 1 was a benamdar for defendant 3 and secondly whether the plaintiffs sent Md. Ahmed with money to make the deposit as alleged by them and, if so, whether Md. Ahmed and defendant 3 in collusion did not pay the arrears and caused the property to be sold with a view to depriving the co-sharers of the property. Various other questions were raised before the Subordinate Judge and those questions were found mainly against the plaintiffs' contention. The Subordinate Judge, however, decided the three important questions in favour of the plaintiffs. His judgment is a very well considered one and we do not think we need elaborate the facts dealt with very carefully by the Subordinate Judge.

He has found that defendant 1 was lately a servant of defendant 3 and was his benamdar. He has also found by a careful analysis of the evidence that the plaintiffs did actually send the money required for preventing the sale by making a deposit of the arrears. But Abu Taher who is very rich and who went to Suri, where the sale was held, specially for the purpose of purchasing the property himself entered into an agreement with Md. Ahmed who was charged with the duty of depositing the arrears, not to make the deposit and to cause the property to be sold. The purchase of the property being made under such circumstances the Subordinate Judge quite rightly held that the purchaser was guilty of fraud towards his co-sharers, and that he could not retain the property as against them. He has, therefore, made a decree, as was made by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the cases of Deo Nandan v. Janki Singh (1) and Satish Chandra v. Satish Kanta (2). He has made a decree to the effect that on payment of the share of the purchase money which amounted to Rs. 1,600 by the plaintiffs according to their shares of the estate, defendant 1 should reconvey to the plaintiffs at his own cost that share of the estate and it was also directed that defendants 1 and 3 should pay to the plaintiffs a certain sum of money as mesne profits with interest.

(1) A. I. R. 1916 P. C. 227=44 Cal. 573=44 I. A. 30 (P. C.).

(2) A. I. R. 1923 P. C. 73.

The contention on behalf of the appellant is that he is not the benamdar of defendant 3 and that there was no fraud as found by the Subordinate Judge and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to a conveyance of the property. It is hardly necessary to discuss the evidence as we entirely agree with the findings of the learned Subordinate Judge on those points. It was argued that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any mesne profits as they would only be entitled to get the property on payment of their shares of the purchase money. But the Judicial Committee has laid down that in such cases the defendant must be held to be in possession of the property for the benefit of the plaintiffs and the other co-sharers according to their several interests at the date of the sale. If that is so, defendants 1 and 3 are in the position of the trustees on behalf of the plaintiffs and as soon as the plaintiffs deposit the money which they have been ordered to pay, they would be entitled to a reconveyance of the property with respect to their shares as well as to receive the profits realized by those defendants on account of their shares. The last argument of the appellant also fails.

There is, however, one small point which must be found in favour of the appellant and it is this: that the learned Judge has directed the plaintiffs to deposit in Court seven annas odd share of the purchase money (Rs. 1,600) within three weeks from the date of the judgment. The learned advocate for the appellant contends that he should have been allowed interest on that sum. That proposition is quite correct and in accordance with the judgment of the Privy Council in the cases cited above. We, therefore, make this variation that the plaintiffs are bound to pay into Court seven annas 16 gandas 2, 247/792 karas share of the purchase money (Rs. 1,600) plus interest at the rate of six per cent per annum from the date of the sale, that is, 26th June 1922, up to the date of their depositing their share of the purchase money into Court, that is, 27th January 1926. The learned advocate for the plaintiffs-respondents states that they have deposited a sum which would cover that interest. Whether that is so or not, it is unnecessary for us to decide. If the interest is not covered by the sum that has been deposited, the plaintiffs must deposit the balance before the conveyance is executed by defendant 1 in their favour. With this variation this appeal is dismissed with costs, payable only to the plaintiffs-respondents.

Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, S. 22—Suit cognizable by Small Cause Court instituted in High Court—S. 22 applies—Plaintiff is not entitled to costs unless Judge certifies the case for trial by High Court.

Where the suit is cognizable in the Small Cause Court and where it is instituted in the High Court, the provisions of S. 22, Small Cause Courts Act are attracted. In cases governed by S. 22 no costs are allowable to the plaintiff, unless the Judge who tries the suit certifies that it was one fit to be brought in the High Court. A party, having chosen to avail himself of O. 37, Civil P. C., in a suit for the recovery of a sum less than the amounts mentioned in S. 22, takes the risk of having no costs allowed to him unless he can induce the Judge to certify that it is a fit and proper case to be brought in the High Court. [P 560 C 2]

B. K. Chaudhuri—for Appellant.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This appeal relates to a question of costs. It is settled law that the Court of Appeal will never interfere with the order of the Judge in the trial Court as to costs, unless the order offends against some well recognized principle or unless the Court of Appeal feels that it would be unjust to the party against whom it is made if the order be allowed to stand.

In this case, the plaintiff's suit was for recovery of a sum of Rs. 705 and it was instituted under O. 37, Civil P. C. The claim arose on a promissory note executed by the defendant on 23rd December 1926, for Rs. 600 with interest thereon at 24 per cent per annum. Pearson, J., made a decree on 9th January 1928, for the amount claimed, but he did not allow any costs to the plaintiff.

On appeal it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that, having regard to the words used in O. 37, R. 2, sub-Cl. (2), Civil P. C., the plaintiff was entitled, as a matter of right, to a decree for costs on the prescribed scale, i. e., costs on scale 1. The plaintiff argues that O. 37, Civil P. C., does not apply to the Small Cause Court and that, therefore, he, having instituted the suit in the High Court, ought not to be held disentitled to costs.

The question of procedure under O. 37, Civil P. C., and the question of the right to institute a suit for the recovery of a sum of Rs. 705 in the Small Cause Court are entirely different. Ordinarily, the plaintiff who avails himself of the procedure indicated in O. 37, in the event of O. 37, R. 2, sub-Cl. (2), being held applicable, is entitled to his costs; but where the suit is cognizable in the Small Cause Court and where it is instituted in the High Court, the provisions of S. 22, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, are attracted. In cases governed by the last mentioned section, no costs are allowable to the plaintiff, unless the Judge who tries the suit certifies that it was one fit to be brought in the High Court. I am unable to see why the provisions of S. 22, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, should not be held applicable to this case. The plaintiff was not bound to avail himself of the procedure indicated in O. 37, Civil P. C., but he having chosen to avail himself of that procedure in a suit for the recovery of a sum less than the amounts mentioned in S. 22, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, took the risk of having no costs allowed to him unless he could induce the Judge to certify that it was a fit and proper case to be brought in the High Court. In this case, it would appear from the minutes of the trial before Pearson, J., that the learned Judge considered the matter of costs and being apparently of opinion that the case was not one fit to be brought in the High Court, disallowed costs to the plaintiff. It may be that in some instances of like nature costs have been allowed to the plaintiff, but, on fuller consideration, I am of opinion that the question of costs in a case of this description is regulated by the provisions of S. 22, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act.

The result is that this appeal fails and must be dismissed. As the respondent does not appear, there will be no order for costs.

Appeal No. 208 of 1927, Decided on 26th April 1929, against the original decree of the Addl. Sub. Judge, Jessore, D/- 7th June 1927.

Specific Relief Act. S. 21—Covenant granting right to realize rent, manage debuttar property, and perform Sheba on behalf of the covenantee, cannot be enforced.

A Solenama provided that "Sm. J. hands over the charge of realization of the income of the debuttar properties in her share to K and his brother. They shall realise the rents of the said debuttar properties from the tenants; as empowered by the said Rani as well as the produce, etc., of the Khamar lands. And if necessary they shall be entitled to exercise all rights of a proprietor or Shebait for recovery of possession in case they are dispossessed from any portion of the said property. That is to say they will hold possession of the said property and they shall perform the Debsheba from the income of the same as trustees and agents of the said Rani. The brothers sued the executrix for specific performance of the term.

Held: that upon the proper reading of the language used the executrix did not desire to give up her interest as Shebait in favour of the plaintiffs. What she wanted to do was to clothe the plaintiffs with the right to realise rents, manage the property and perform the sheba on her behalf as her trustees and agents. No right to any property was agreed to be conveyed but only the right of management as agent and therefore according to the provision of S. 21, it was not a contract which could be specifically enforced.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant against the judgment and decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Jessore, dated 7th June 1927. The suit was brought for enforcing specific performance of a contract embodied in a Solenama dated 6th May 1920 by which two civil suits namely. Suit No. 295 of 1929 brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant and Money Suit No. 279 of 1919 brought by the defendant against the plaintiffs were compromised. The plaintiffs in the present suit are related to the defendant as brothers of her deceased husband. The defendant's husband was separate from the plaintiffs. He died on 6th May 1927 when defendant was probably a minor or had just attained majority having completed eighteen years of age. On 7th August 1917 she applied for succession certificate for about Rs. 9,000 which, she claimed, was due to her husband from third parties. The plaintiffs put in an objection that she could not have the power of disposal of the money. It appears from the subsequent conduct of the parties that there was not much love lost between them: the defendant sued the plaintiffs for collections made by them and for some moveable properties in her suit in 1919 and the plaintiffs sued the defendant for taking the properties inherited by her from her husband out of her hands on the ground of waste and mal-administration. In their suit the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant was a person of tender age and inexperienced in the conduct of business. The defendant had brought another suit against the plaintiffs, as appears from the Solenama itself for accounts and for a certain sum of money, which suit was not proceeded with, because she did not pay the proper Court-fees after the compromise of the suits already referred to. After the petition of compromise was filed in those two suits they were dismissed according to the terms of the compromise.

Subsequently on 14th June 1920, the defendant executed three documents in favour of the plaintiffs in terms of the provisions contained in Cl. 2 of the petition of compromise. Difference arose between the parties with regard to the terms of Cl. 3. There was some correspondence between the pleader for the defendant and the pleader for the plaintiffs. Ultimately, the plaintiffs wanted to enforce the terms by way of execution which was rejected on final appeal to this Court, which was of opinion that the terms of the Solenama could not be enforced in execution. The plaintiffs stated in their plaint that on that account they have brought this suit for specific performance of the contract. The defendant took various pleas against the claim of the plaintiffs, and, as usual, a large number of issues was framed by the Court below. The Subordinate Judge has decided all the important issues against the defendant and he finally directed specific performance of the contract and it was decreed that the defendant do execute within two months from the date of the judgment an Arpannama in favour of the plaintiffs in terms of the draft duly approved by the Court and within the said time she do further execute and register a kobala in respect of the rents in arrear in terms of the draft submitted by the plaintiffs.

The defendant appeals from that decree and the points taken on her behalf are:

(1) That there was no intelligent execution of the solenama by the defendant.

(2) That the terms of the contract are so unfair and so one-sided that specific performance should not be granted in the exercise of the discretion of the Court;

(3) That the solenama requires registration and as it is an unregistered document, it cannot be put in evidence;

(4) That the agreement was only with regard to a deed of management and no specific performance can be enforced of such an agreement.

(5) No specific performance should be allowed for executing a kabala for arrears of rent; and

(6) That the agreement for certain properties which the defendant is alleged to have undertaken to make Debutter cannot be enforced by the plaintiffs but it can only be enforced by the idol. (His Lordship after discussing evidence with regard to first point proceeded). With regard to the second point, it is urged that the terms are unfair in that the lady gives up her interest in certain dwelling houses belonging to her husband and undertakes to grant a lease of certain properties to the plaintiffs and so forth and the main point is also that she undertook not to adopt a son to her husband although she insisted upon the fact of having due authority from him to make an adoption. She has actually executed the document of relinquishment with regard to those properties and has executed a lease as was agreed under the solenama. Nothing, therefore, remains to be done in the circumstances as to those terms and in this case we need not consider the question as to the validity of her agreement not to adopt a son to her husband although she maintained that she had a proper authority from him. These are questions which may be dealt with hereafter. Having regard to the view we are disposed to take in this case, it is not necessary to go into any elaborate discussion on the points urged before us. We heard elaborate arguments on all the points but after the arguments were heard the ground was cleared with regard to the actual point for decision in this case and which appears to me to be a short one.

The question is whether the agreement contained in Cl. 3 of the solenama is one which can be specifically enforced. It refers to the Debutter properties. The provision runs thus:

"Sm. Jyotirupa Devi hands over the charge of realization of the income of Debutter properties in her share to Kumar Satish Kanta Roy and Jyotish Kanta Roy. They shall realize the rents of the said Debutter properties from the tenants, as empowered by the said Rani as well as the produce, etc., of the khamar lands. And if necessary the shall be entitled to exercise all the rights of a proprietor or Shebait for recovery of possession in case they are dispossessed from any portion of the said property. That is to say they will hold possession of the said property and they shall perform the Debsheba from the income of the same as trustees and agents of the said Rani (the translation of this portion of the Bengali document in the paper-book is somewhat inaccurate)."

Pausing here for a moment, we have to consider what is the agreement contained in these words which can be specifically enforced. If the lady desired to transfer her right in the property as Shebait of the idol, then questions might have arisen as to the validity of such an agreement under the Hindu Law, which is a question of some debate. But it seems to me upon a proper reading of the language used that she did not desire to give up her interest as shebait in favour of the plaintiffs. What she wanted to do is to clothe the plaintiffs with the right to realize rents, manage the property and perform the Sheba on her behalf as her trustees and agents. No right to any property was agreed to be conveyed but only the right of management as agent and, therefore, according to the provisions of S. 21, Specific Relief Act, it is not a contract which can be specifically enforced. The rest of the clause in the Solenama referred to states that the income of the debutter property is not adequate for the expenses of the Debsheba and hence she will make over to two Kumars the properties described in Sch. 3 below for meeting the said expenses. This does not mean that she will convey all her rights in the property in favour of the said Kumars. Therefore, reading the document in its proper sense, it seems that it does not amount to a contract which can be specifically enforced. And what was the deed that the Rani undertook to execute? It is said that the Rani shall execute in favour of the Kumars a Trust Deed or any other document, required in respect of the above-mentioned debutter and additional property. A deed for what purpose? Not giving an absolute right to the property or to the Debsheba of her share. I, therefore, think that this suit for specific performance of the alleged contract must fail, even assuming that the lady did execute the solenama with full knowledge of its contents.

With reference to the kobala in respect of the rents in arrears, the learned advocate appearing for the respondent has stated that it would be useless to make a decree with regard to that claim, because, the rents in arrears, even if the plaintiffs succeed in getting a kobala for those arrears, are long barred by limitation and the kobala for such arrears would be a useless document in their hands. It is contended by the learned advocate for the appellant that this also is a contract which cannot be specifically enforced, because it is an agreement for money. That argument is also of substance as a breach of the contract may be compensated by damages.

On the grounds stated above, this appeal must be allowed and the plaintiffs' suit dismissed with costs in both the Courts. Hearing-fee Rs. 350.

The cross-objections are not urged and are dismissed without costs.

Pearson, J.—This is an application on behalf of two accused persons for stay of certain criminal proceedings against them and three others, one of whom joined in support of the rule, before the Court of the Deputy Magistrate at Alipore, pending the disposal of a civil suit No. 40 of 1929 before the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Alipore.

Accused 1 was an officer employed by one Sm. Sailasuta Devi, mother and certificated guardian of her two minor sons. The civil suit was filed by her on 25th September 1928 on behalf of the minors against the present petitioners defendants 2 and 3 and accused 1, defendant 1. It was alleged that in February 1928, defendant 1, the manager of Sailasuta, was instructed to purchase a touzi No. 151 notified for sale under the revenue laws, and was entrusted with Rs. 1,00,000 for the purpose but purchased in his own name though informing Sailasuta that it had been purchased on behalf of the estate for Rs. 85,000. Then it is said she was further informed by the manager that there would be delay in getting the matter completed, as the defaulting proprietors had instituted proceedings to have the sale set aside, and for injunction meanwhile. Upon the injunction application, it is said, it came to light that defendant 1 had fraudulently declared himself as the purchaser. This led to further enquiries and it is alleged that defendant 1 had collusively made certain further entries in the books and utilized the Rs. 1,00,000 to purchase the touzi in his own name, and for alleged payment upon a hand note for Rs. 36,000 to Gopal Ch. Chakrabarty (accused 4)-none of which transactions were authorized by the plaintiff's mother. It is then alleged that defendant 1 is attempting to get the sale certificate in his name and deal with the property, while defendants 2 and 3 (the present petitioners) claim certain interests therein. Consequently the relief claimed is a declaration of the plaintiffs' title and injunction restraining defendants from dealing with the property.

It appears further that in October 1928, plaintiffs applied for amendment of plaint and appointment of receiver. The petitioners replied to that application on 3rd December 1928, alleging that the original purchase was made to the knowledge of the plaintiffs' mother and with her knowledge and that she knew of the handnote and had accepted it, and the subsequent transfer to him of a portion of the touzi was with her consent and knowledge.

On 29th January 1929, the petitioners filed their written statement to the same effect. On 12th March 1929, issues were settled in the suit and the next date fixed is 1st June. The issues are as follows:

1. Have the plaintiffs any cause of action?
2. Is the suit maintainable if the plaintiffs are not in possession of the property?
3. Is the Court-fee paid sufficient?
4. Is the suit barred by the provisions of Ss. 36 and 8, Revenue Sale Law under the facts of the present case?
5. Is the suit barred by estoppel, waiver and acquiescence?
6. Have the plaintiffs their alleged title to the property in suit?
7. Did defendant 1 advance a loan of Rs. 36,000 to defendant 2 out of the money of the estate on a pro-note in the name of the plaintiffs' mother in order to enable him to purchase the Ohota Hudda and one-third share of the Barra Hudda in the revenue sale under instructions from the plaintiffs' mother and guardian Sailasuta Devi?
8. Did defendant 1 make over the pro-note to the said Sailasuta Devi?
9. Did the plaintiff purchase the whole of the touzi No. 151 in the name of defendant 1 or two-third of share of Barra Hudda only as stated in the written statement under arrangement made by their mother?
10. Did defendant 1 inform the mother of the plaintiffs on 23rd February 1928 that the touzi No. 151 had been purchased on behalf of the estate?

11. Did defendant 1 commit any act of fraud in the matter of the said purchase or make any fraudulent entries in the account book as alleged in the plaint?

12. Was the touzi No. 151 purchased by defendant 1 on behalf of the plaintiffs alone as alleged in the plaint or was it purchased by defendant 1 as trustee and agent of the plaintiffs and defendant 2 in pursuance of the arrangement as stated in paras. 12 and 13 of the written statement of defendant 2? If so, what are the respective interests of the plaintiff and defendant 2 in the said touzi?

13. Are the plaintiffs entitled to the declaration and injunction as prayed for?

14. What reliefs, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled to?

On 7th December 1928 information was given to police regarding the transaction, and accused 1 was arrested on 12th December 1928, accused 2 and 3 on 14th December and the present petitioners on 24th March 1929. The police on 9th April 1929, after four months' investigation submitted a charge sheet against accused 1 under S. 409 for criminal breach of trust as an agent in respect of the sum of Rs. 1,00,000 and misappropriation by purchasing the property in his own name and fraudulently transferring portion to accused 4. The further charge against all the accused is under Ss. 120-B and 409, with having entered into a criminal conspiracy to commit the said offence under S. 409. There is also a charge of falsification under S. 477-A against accused 1 and 2 as to the entries in the account book.

The petitioners then allege that the object of the criminal prosecution is to put pressure upon them in the civil suit. They add that the issues involved are the same and they will be prejudiced in the civil suit if the criminal matter is first decided. They point to the fact that the civil proceedings were first instituted and say that the matter can best be disposed of by a civil Court.

An affidavit has been filed on behalf of the Crown by the investigating officer to the following effect. It is there stated that on 25th February 1928 accused 1 executed a conveyance in favour of accused 4 in respect of the "Choto Hudda" part of the property for Rs. 4,269 paid by accused 4 out of the Rs. 36,000 and it is also recited that accused 1 had received Rs. 29,911 for 1/3rd of the "Bara Hudda" part. A conveyance for the 1/3rd was executed on 23rd August 1928 but not registered.

On 12th March 1928 accused 4, it is said, transferred to his father accused 5, half of the Chota Hudda thus restoring to him the interest which the latter originally had in the property. According to the prosecution case the whole story of the handnote and the loan is a figment. Then it is said the plaintiffs mother only became aware of the nature of the transactions in the course of an application in the suits filed by the owner for setting aside the revenue sale, namely on 10th September, and it therefore became necessary to file the civil suit forthwith to prevent further dealing with the property.

Certain authorities have been placed before us by the learned Advocate General on behalf of the Crown and by the learned advocate for the petitioners to indicate the considerations by which a Court ought to be guided in such matters. The result is only to show that no hard and fast rule can be laid down, and that each case must be determined upon its own facts. Even if some or all of the matter materially in issue are the same that in itself cannot be a reason for staying the criminal proceedings; Brojobashi v. Emperor (1). There proceedings had been taken under S. 476, Criminal P. C., and accused tried to stifle them by filing a civil suit, and no stay was allowed. So no stay was granted in Rajkumari v. Bamasundari (2) a case where the proceedings related to an injury of an essentially personal nature under S. 499 of the nature of a private prosecution, and even there the subsequent filing of a civil suit by the accused relating to the same subject matter was not allowed as good cause for a stay. It was there pointed out that if the stay were granted the civil proceedings would be dragged out, and the decision would not affect the action of the Magistrate who must decide on the accused's criminality for himself. It was also said that the discretion to stay or not should ordinarily be left to the Magistrate. Ghose, J., says at p. 620:

"I am not myself prepared to say that as a general rule a proceeding in a criminal Court should be stayed pending the decision of a civil suit in regard to the same subject matter; but what I think I might properly say is that ordinarily it is not desirable if the parties to the two proceedings are substantially the same, and the prosecution before the Magistrate is but a private prosecution, and the issues in the two Courts are substantially identical, that both cases should go on at one and the same time. So in Jahangir v. Framji (3) another case of defamation, it was said that the test seems to be whether the prosecution is public or private. Where it is public the Court as a rule in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, would not stay criminal proceedings. Where it was private (as in that case) there would not be the same reluctance of the Court to interfere."

The petitioners have relied on Lucas v. Official Assignee (4), where Jenkins, C.J. said:

"Though no invariable rule can be laid down, it is ordinarily undesirable to institute criminal proceedings until determination of civil proceedings in which the same issues are involved. It is too well-known to need elaboration that criminal proceedings lend themselves to the unscrupulous application of improper pressure with a view to influencing the course of the civil proceedings, and beyond that there is the mischief illustrated by this case of criminal proceedings being instituted with an imperfect appreciation of the facts where they have not been ascertained in the more searching investigation of a civil Court."

While agreeing generally with the views there expressed, we must not forget that that case was one where the penal sections of the insolvency law had been invoked against the insolvent much more in the nature of a private prosecution, and much more open to the suggestion of improper pressure for behoof of the creditors. So if the object of the criminal proceedings be in reality to prejudice the trial of the civil suit or coerce accused to a compromise the Magistrate should as a general rule postpone the enquiry Subramanyan Chetty, In re (5). Then of other cases referred to, they are mostly of a particular class to which particular considerations would apply, relating to documents forming the basis of attack or defence in civil suits, where the other party says they are forgeries or fraudulently obtained or the like and the criminal proceedings on that count have been stayed; See Sasi Bhusan v. Emperor (6), Janaki Das v. Emperor (7), Goborhone v. Iswar Chunder (8), Anna Ayyar

v. Emperor (9) Ram Charan v. Emperor (10), where however there was no appearance to show cause. In Debi Mahto v. Emperor, a stay was ordered for proceedings under Ss. 193 and 209, I.P.C., pending an appeal against an order of the civil Court revoking a succession certificate on the ground that appellant was not related to deceased. In this case also no cause was shown. Then there may be cases where the proper course may be to expedite civil proceedings where a question of fact involved therein is also raised in criminal proceedings Raj Kumar v. Emperor (11).

An examination of these cases shows that no hard and fast rule can be laid down, and that each case must stand upon its own facts. Here one may agree that in some of the issues in the civil suit especially 7, 11 and 12, the matters to be agitated will be in substance the same as in the criminal proceedings and the parties are substantially the same. It may be of course that the suit will fail upon one of the technical issues such as No. 4 when the merits would never be gone into. Again, it is all very well to say that the plaintiffs have the conduct of the civil suit and that it rests in their own hands to bring it to an early conclusion, while the case is fixed for the 1st June. At the very best it would take a considerable time before the trial would be completed and judgment could be given, and then the matter would not in the ordinary course be disposed of, up to the highest tribunal of appeal, for another 4 years at a moderate estimate. I do not consider that it disposes of the matter to say that the criminal proceedings should be stayed because in the criminal case the accused's mouths are shut, whereas in the civil case they will be able and ready to give their own evidence. If that argument were to prevail, it would apply in every case of this nature, and there would be no need to go further. Assuming the facts disclosed by the prosecution to be true, it was essential for Sailasuta with all speed, after what she discovered in the interlocutory proceedings in the other suit, to file her civil suit to protect the title to and prevent dealings with the property. If her information to the police is at a somewhat later date it was not unreasonably so. It is now a fact that it is a Crown prosecution with the Crown a party, whose interests and rights are not those of a private prosecutor, but of public justice. I agree that indirect motive or coercion by way of pressure on the defendants in the civil suit might lead a Court to stay criminal proceedings; but in the present case there is no room for that. It is a public prosecution and none the less so because the police have in the first instance no choice but to enquire into the offences charged. Lastly, as pointed out by the learned Advocate General, an offence under S. 120-B is non-compoundable.

In the facts and circumstances of this case as presented to us, I am of opinion that the decision arrived at by the learned Magistrate was right and should not be interfered with by this Court. The rule is accordingly discharged.

Judgment.—This rule which was obtained on behalf of the plaintiff relates to a suit in which the plaintiff claimed mesne profits for the years 1332 to 1334 B. His case is that he took delivery of possession of the land decreed to him in that suit on 25th February 1928 which corresponds to 12 Falgoun 1334 B. S. He consequently asks for recovery of mesne profits from 1332 up to 1334 Falgoun the date of his taking possession. The defendants took a preliminary objection that the claim for mesne profits was barred by S. 11, Civil P. C., as there was a prayer in the previous suit for future mesne profits and as the decree in that suit No. 102 of 1924 was silent with regard to future mesne profits it must be held that the claim was disallowed. This preliminary objection prevailed with the Small Cause Court Judge who tried the suit and the Munsif exercising the Small Cause Court powers followed the decision of the Bombay High Court in the case of Atmaram Bhaskar v. Parashram Ballal (1), in support of his view that plaintiff's suit was barred by the doctrine of res judicata. He accordingly dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff has obtained this rule and it is contended on his behalf that the decision of the Bombay High Court does not take the correct view and is opposed to decisions of the Madras High Court and the Allahabad High Court. It is further contended that the decisions were unanimous under the Code of 1882 that in circumstances like the present a fresh suit for future mesne profits would not be barred and that the change effected by the Code of 1908 does not in any way affect the decisions under the old Code. I think the contention of the petitioner is sound and must be given effect to. It appears that in a series of cases under the Code of 1882 it was held in this Court that S. 13, Civil P. C., of 1882 did not bar a suit for future mesne profits which was claimed in a previous suit between the parties, but in regard to which the decree was silent, the mesne profits being for a period subsequent to the institution of the first suit. It is not necessary to refer to all the cases but reference may be made to one case as a type.

The case of G. S. Hays v. Padmanand Singh (2), may so be referred to. The question for consideration is if there is any change in the Code of 1908 which justifies the view which has been taken by the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court in the case which has been cited by the Munsif. It appears to me that the provision with regard to mesne profits was contained in Ss. 211 and 212 of the Code of 1882 and O. 20, R. 12 of the present Code is, in my opinion, substantially the same and all that has been done in the present Code is that the two sections of the old Code have been amalgamated into one. The Legislature when enacting the Code of 1908 was certainly familiar or must be taken to have been aware of the unanimity of the decisions of all the High Courts in India as to the view, viz., that a fresh suit for mesne profits would not be barred if the decree in the suit for recovery of possession is silent with regard to the same. It is a well-settled principle of construction that the legislature must be presumed to know not only the general principles of law but the constructions which the Courts have put upon particular statute and when a section of an Act which had received a judicial construction is re-enacted in the same words such re-enactment must be treated as a legislative recognition of the construction. If the Legislature had intended to overrule the unanimous decision of all the High Courts on the point I should think that it would have used clear and apt language for that purpose. Such intention would not be inferred indirectly or by mere implication. That being the position, I think the learned Judges of the Madras High Court took the right view and I agree with what has been said by Sir John Wallis, C. J., of the Madras High Court in this behalf in the case of Doraiswami Ayyar v. Subramania Ayyar (3). The learned Chief Justice said :

"the word 'relief' in the explanation means relief arising out of a cause of action which had accrued at the date of suit and on which the suit was brought, and did not include relief such as mesne profits accruing after the date of the suit as to which no cause of action had then arisen, but which the Court was nevertheless expressly empowered to grant. The explanation having been reproduced in exactly the same words, the presumption is that it was intended to have precisely the same effect. I do not find any sufficient indication to rebut this presumption in the fact that Ss. 211 and 212 of the old Code were amalgamated to form O. 20, R. 12. The change introduced by the new rule is that the award of mesne profits in all cases is to be preliminary decree, and that when ascertained they are to be embodied in a final decree, whereas under Ss. 211 and 212 they were to be ascertained in execution. This change does not appear to me to affect the construction of Explan. 5. S. 11, nor do I think is affected by the omission in S. 47 of the new Code of the proviso to the corresponding S. 244 of the old Code."

This view of the Madras Full Bench has been followed by the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court in the case of Muhammad Ishaq Khan v. Muhammad Rustam Ali Khan (4). In that case the learned Chief Justice Sir Henry Richards and Pramada Charan Banerjee, J., maintained the view that there was nothing in the Code of 1908 which would suggest that the earlier decisions under the Code of 1882 were no longer good law. I prefer to follow the view of the Madras and the Allahabad High Courts and with great respect I do not agree with the narrow view taken by the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court in I. L. R. 44 Bom. 954, which has already been cited.

The result is that this rule must be made absolute. The judgment and decree of the Small Cause Court Judge dismissing the plaintiff's suit must be set aside and the case sent back to him in order that he may retry the suit on the merits. The petitioner is entitled to his costs of this rule the hearing fee of which I assess at one gold mohur.

Hem Chandra Pal and others—Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal No. 597 of 1927, Decided on 5th March 1929.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent—Suspension—Tenant deprived of occupation of part—Rent due being entire sum, landlord not entitled to any rent.

The doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely on this that the rent due is in respect of the land demised. If therefore the tenant is not given occupation of the whole of the land demised, landlord has no right to the entire rent and unless he has a right or some equity to an apportionment he can recover nothing on the contract. The whole basis of doctrine is that rent due is an entire sum.

The landlord dispossessed the tenure-holder from a small part of the land demised and gave khas possession to a third person. The land was included in the patta.

Held : that the conduct of the landlord was mala fide and he was not entitled to any rent at all : A. I. R. 1925 P. C. 97, Rel. on.; 24 Cal. 296; 14 C. W. N. 207n.; 12 W. R. 103; 46 Cal. 956; *A. Mitter, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the second Additional District Judge of Dacca dated 4th October 1926 reversing the decision of the Subordinate Judge, 4th Court, of the same place dated 11th December 1924.

The suit out of which this appeal arises was brought for recovery of rent with cesses and damages after apportionment in respect of a shikmi taluk more fully described hereafter. The rent sued for was for the years 1323 to 1326 B. S. The plaintiff's case, as stated in the plaint, is this. The previous proprietors of touzi, No. 315 of the Dacca Collectorate, having defaulted in the payment of the Government revenue, the mehal was sold and purchased by one Prosonna Coomar Sen in the year 1287 B. S. Prosonna Coomar took possession of the property in due course and thereafter created two tenures by registered pattas one in favour of Nand Coomar Dutt on 21st Baisakh 1289 B. S. and the other in favour of Srish Chandra Das in the year 1290 B. S. Within this Zemindari, there had previously been in existence a tenure in respect of which the present suit has been instituted which was Sikmi taluk of the name of Jagabandhu, Raj Chunder and Raj Coomar Pal and which carried, according to the arrangement between the proprietor and the tenure holders, a rent of Rs. 415 per annum. The main defence of defendants 1 to 6 who along with others are the holders of this tenure is that the plaintiffs are not entitled to get any rent as they (defendants) have been dispossessed from a portion of the demised premises. Their case is that they were dispossessed from about 60 bighas of land by Prosonna Coomar Sen who had leased out the identical chuks which are covered by these 60 bighas to Nanda Kumar Dutt and Srish Chunder Das as stated above. The Court of first instance gave a partial decree to the plaintiffs. On appeal, the lower appellate Court has dismissed the suit in its entirety.

The findings of fact on which the lower appellate Court has rested its decision may be briefly summarized as follows. They are (1) that there can be no doubt on the facts on the record that Prosonna Coomar Sen dispossessed the tenure-holders and that he took khas possession of some of the lands of the taluk in question and settled them with Nanda Coomar Dutt and Srish Chunder Das; (2) that there is no dispute that the thak chuks Nos. 42, 43 and 90 which are included in the sikmi patta Ex. A (4) were included in the pattas granted by Prosonna to Nanda and Srish and (3) that Prosonna's conduct was wholly mala fide and that he deliberately dispossessed the Sikmidars from a considerable portion of the taluk. On these findings, the lower appellate Court came to the conclusion that the defendants were justly entitled to a suspension of the entire rent till they are restored to possession of the dispossessed lands since they had been wrongly and deliberately dispossessed by Prosonna from those lands. The consequences of the act of Prosonna in Subletting the tenure to Nanda and Srish will affect the plaintiffs who stand in the shoes of Prosonna, they having purchased Prosonna's interest in the zemindary on 2nd Agharayan 1304 B. S., by a deed of sale. In this view as has already been stated, the plaintiffs' suit was dismissed by the lower appellate Court.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court on behalf of the plaintiffs and the main argument addressed before us by their learned advocate has been that the lower appellate Court is clearly in error in not allowing apportionment of the rent as the defendants have been dispossessed on the findings from a very small quantity of about 60 bighas of land out of a very large area of 2,500 odd bighas and that, in equity, the plaintiffs are entitled to get a proportionate rent or the area which is still in the possession of the defendants—that is, the entire area covered by the patta Ex. A (4) less the 60 bighas from which they have been dispossessed. There is no question that, in the present case, the rental is a lump rental and it cannot be said that the rent is not chargeable on every bit of land covered by the lease. In these circumstances, the respondents contend that the decision of the lower appellate Court is right having regard to the principle of the decisions which have been almost uniform in this Court, namely, that where the rental is a lump rental and there is dispossession from a portion of the demised premises—however small that portion may be, such dispossession is to be regarded as an eviction of the tenant from the entire premises and, therefore, there should be a total suspension of rent. The respondents have further relied on the recent pronouncement of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Katyayani Debi v. Udai Kumar Das (1). The appellants, on the other hand, have relied on certain observations made in a recent decision of this Court where it was said that their Lordships of the Judicial Committee did not intend to lay down the broad proposition that there should be suspension of rent in every case where there was dispossession of the tenant from the demised premises if the rental was a lump rental. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the two contentions carefully.

It appears to me that the weight of authority is on the side of the contention raised on behalf of the respondents. So far back as the year 1869 in the case of Gopanand v. Lala Govind (2), Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., referred to the following statement of the law in this behalf in Bacon's Abridgment, Title Rent (M):

This principle was followed uniformly till the decision of the case of Dhunpat Singh v. Mahommad Kazim (3). In that case, it was stated by the learned Judges that the principle to be gathered from the earlier cases was that, even if the landlord dispossessed the tenant from a portion of the demised premises, there should be no apportionment of the rent—the whole rent being equally chargeable on every part of the land demised. This principle was given a further extension in the case of Hurro Kumari Choudhurani v. Purna Chandra (4) where Sir Francis Maclean, C. J., and Banerjee, J., applied the principle to a case where the tenure was held under a lease which reserved the rent at a certain rate per bigha. The learned Chief Justice thought this conclusion was justified on the principle laid down in the English and Indian cases referred to in the case of Dhunpat Singh v. Mahommad Kazim (3). This decision was followed by Asutosh Mookerjee and Carnduff, JJ., in the case of Surendra Nath Guha v. Kali Kanta (5). It must be said, however, in view of the decision in Katyani Debi v. Udai Kumar Das (1) in which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee said that the principle could not be extended to a case where the rent was paid at so much per bigha that this decision of Maclean, C. J., and Banerjee, J., in the case reported in Hurro Kumari Choudhurani v. Purna Chandra (4) cannot now be regarded as good law. For the first time, it appears to me that a dissenting note was struck in the case of Annoda Prosad v. Mathura Nath (6), in which Chitty, J., questioned as to how far the technicalities to be found in the English law should be allowed to affect the relationship of landlord and tenant in this country. Even after this decision, the course of authority has been in favour of the view that there should be an entire suspension of rent in case of dispossession by landlord from the demised premises held under a lump rent. In 1919 the case of Manindra Chandra Nundy v. Narendra Chunder Lahiri (7), Fletcher, J., with whom Cuming, J., concurred held, following the decision in Neale v. Mackenzie (8), that "where the landlord having let out a portion of a land to an earlier lessee lets it out again to a subsequent lessee and fails to deliver to the subsequent lessee possession of the entire land leased to him, the entire rent is suspended."

Fletcher, J., pointed out in that case that the decision in Neale v. Mackenzie (8), had always been considered as good law; with reference to the argument that the decisions of the English Courts should not be applied to the system of law in this country, the learned Judge said this :

"But the rule that rent is suspended on account of the dispossession of the tenant by the landlord from a portion of the holding has been recognized in a number of cases in this Court and, in my opinion, it is not open to question now."

It was in this state of the authorities that the matter came up for consideration before their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Katyayani Debi v. Udai Kumar Das (1), to which reference has already been made and Lord Salvesen in delivering the judgment of their Lordships said :

"The doctrine of suspension of payment of rent where the tenant has not been put in possession of part of the subject leased has been applied where the rent was a lump rent for the whole land leased treated as an indivisible subject."

(8) 1 M. & W. 747=2 Gale 174=6 L. J. Ex. 263.

It seems to me that these observations recognize the rule laid down by the Indian decisions that where the rent is fixed in a lump there would be suspension of rent on the ground of dispossession of the tenant by the landlord from a part of the demised premises. In the case of Sushil Kumar Biswas v. Rajani Kant (9), Bepin Behari Ghose, J., and Roy, J., expressed the opinion that these observations of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee were no authority for the proposition that there should not be any apportionment in every case of dispossession by the landlord of the tenant from a part of the demised premises where the rent was a lump rental. With great respect to these learned Judges, I should say that it is difficult to read the decision of the Judicial Committee in the way these learned Judges seem to have read it. It appears to me that there would be no point in their Lordships of the Judicial Committee referring to the law in this behalf unless they intended to lay down that that was a view from which they did not dissent, even if they did not actually prove the rule. Thus it seems to me that the Privy Council was really laying down the rule that there is to be a distinction between the two classes of cases and that, in the case of lump rental, the rule of suspensions should be applied and, in the case where the rent is so much per bigha, the rule has no application. It is to be noticed also that the observations made by B. B. Ghose and Roy, JJ., in the case reported in Sushil Kumar Biswas v. Rajani Kant (9), were not necessary for the decision of that case; for, in that case, the rental was a rental of so much per bigha and the observations made therein are obiter dicta and cannot prevail against the concurrent decisions in a large number of cases beginning with the case decided by Peacock, C. J., in 1869. It is also to be noticed that, in an earlier case, Bepin Behari Ghose, J., said this:

"It is true that the rule of suspension of rent on account of eviction by the landlord of the tenant from a portion of the demised premises has been adopted in this Court in a series of cases and it is too late to question the adoption of that rule in our Court now; see Biseswar Sarkar v. Kali Churn Ash (10)."

observations difficult to reconcile with the obiter dicta of the learned Judge in 31 Calcutta Weekly Notes 990. The later authorities to which reference may be made are the decisions of Page and Mallik, JJ., in the case of Dhirendra Nath Roy v. Bhabatarini Debi (11), where the learned Judges were in favour of the view of total suspension of rent in cases of dispossession from part of tenancies carrying lump rentals and of Greaves and Cuming, JJ., in the case of Suresh Chunder v. Mathura Nath (12), where the same view was adopted. Reference may also be made in this connexion to an unreported judgment of this Court in appeal from Appellate Decree No. 2361 of 1927 which was delivered by me sitting singly on a review of the authorities and in which I came to the conclusion that the decisions of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Katyayani Debi v. Udai Kumar Das (1), laid down the rule of suspension of rent in cases of lump rentals. This decision of mine alluded to above which was given on 10th September 1928 was appealed from under the Letters Patent and it has been affirmed the appeal having been summarily dismissed by C. C. Ghose and Mallik, JJ., on 8th January 1929. It appears, therefore, on a review of the cases to which reference has just been made that the learned Additional District Judge has taken the correct view of the law in this behalf.

It has been argued, however, on behalf of the appellants that the facts in the present case do not give rise to the legal inference that there has been such dispossession by the landlords as to attract the operation of this rigid rule. It is said that Prosanna was a revenue purchaser and that, as he had not in his possession the sikmi patta, it cannot be presumed that the subsequent settlement of some chunks with Nanda and Srish was done with the deliberate intention of depriving the defendants of certain lands of their tenancy. The answer, as given by the learned District Judge, is that it was quite easy for Prosanna to discover after his purchase at the revenue sale what lands were covered by the patta which was granted to the defendants. It is also a significant fact in this case which has been found by both the Courts below that no rent has ever been realized by the plaintiffs from the defendants. The Subordinate Judge at p. 3 line 40 of the printed paper-book in this case states that no rent was ever realized by the plaintiffs from the defendants after their purchase.

It has been next argued on behalf of the appellants that the rule of law indicated above seems to operate harshly on the plaintiffs in this case for, while the defendants are in possession of a large tract of land and are making profits out of it, it is sheer injustice that the plaintiffs should be deprived of rent in respect of the portion which is in the possession of the defendants. In these cases, the rule which is followed is that the landlord must secure to the tenant quiet enjoyment of every part of the demised premises. It does not matter in the least that the area from which the tenant has been dispossessed is a small area. The law does not encourage a landlord to dispossess the tenant from land in respect of which he has been granted a lease by letting it out again to a third person after the original demise had been effected. It may operate harshly in individual cases. But it is always desirable to follow a definite rule rather than to be guided by considerations of hardship in individual cases. As is pointed out in another connexion by Lord Birkenhead in Rutherford v. Richardson (13), that it is undoubtedly true that it is even better that some slight degree of injustice should be done in an individual case than that the Courts should abandon the sure anchorage of a dependable rule. Once you begin to deviate from the rule on the ground that the area from which dispossession by the landlord has taken place is a small area you will not know where to stop. In the absence of any equity to apportionment the rigid rule has always been adhered to. The true principle which should guide us in cases of this kind is that laid down by the learned Chief Justice in a case to the decision in which I was also a party. The learned Chief Justice said :

"But the doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely on this that the rent due is an entire rent in respect of the land demised. If therefore the tenant is not given occupation of the whole of the land demised, the landlord has no right to the entire rent and unless he has a right or some equity to an apportionment he can recover nothing on the contract.

But the whole basis of the doctrine is that the rent due is an entire sum Sajjad Ahmad v. Trailokhya (14)."

In this view, I am of opinion that the decision of the lower appellate Court is right and that it must be affirmed.

In final reply, the learned advocate for the plaintiffs appellants raised the point that whatever our decision might be with regard to the recovery of rent, it ought not to affect the right of the plaintiffs to recover cesses from the defendants. This point was not raised in either of the Courts below ; nor was it raised in the opening of the case before us ; and it would not be right at this stage to allow this large question to be raised in reply. We, therefore, do not allow the point to be raised.

The result is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Jack, J.—I agree.

Jack, J.—This application has arisen out of an order of the munsif holding that the petitioner as a usufructuary mortgagee is not entitled to make a deposit under S. 52 of Act 8 of 1869 for the purpose of staying execution of a decree for ejectment for non-payment of arrears of rent. It turns on the question whether a mortgagee of a non-transferable occupancy holding is entitled to make such a deposit under S. 52, Act 8 of 1869 for the purpose of staying execution of a decree for ejectment of the tenants on account of non-payment of arrears of rent. It has been held in the case of Kali Kishore v. Gopal Ram (1), that a transferee of a portion of a non-transferable occupancy holding is entitled to make such a deposit. On the other hand it has been held in the case of Baneswar Singh v. Abdul Hassan (2) that the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding is not entitled to make such a deposit and again in the case of Shailaja Sundari Rai v. Surja Kanta Chaudhuri (3) it has been held that the mortgagee of a portion of a non-transferable occupancy holding is entitled to make the deposit.

The case of a mortgagee differs from that of a transferee inasmuch as in the case of a mortgagee the tenant still retains an interest in the holding and if the circumstances are such that the deposit can be regarded as made on behalf of the tenant, then certainly the mortgagee would be entitled to make the deposit. But I am of opinion that under S. 52, Act 8 of 1859 it was contemplated that the deposit must be made by the tenant or on his behalf. We find this is the construction which has been put upon S. 66 (2), Bengal Tenancy Act where the wording is similar (cf. Brojendra Nath v. Arman Shaikh (4)). There does not appear to be any reason why in the case of a non-transferable holding the landlord should be forced to receive a deposit from a stranger whose interest he is not bound to recognize unless this is specially laid down in the Act. In S. 170, Bengal Tenancy Act, Cl. (2) of which is similarly worded, Cl. (3) has been added to show that not only the judgment-debtor but any person having an interest in the holding voidable on the sale may make the deposit to relieve the holding from attachment and, under this clause it has been held that while a transferee cannot make the deposit a mortgagee can do so. If it is intended by S. 170 (2) that any one can make the deposit the addition of Cl. (3) would be meaningless as already under Cl. (2) the person referred to therein or any other person could make the deposit. Cl. (3) is apparently to enlarge the category of persons who can make the deposit which otherwise would have been limited to judgment-debtors. As the learned Judges in Kali Kishore's case (1) pointed out the decision in Sarada Prosad v. Nobin Chandra (5) may have referred to transferable holdings so that it is not necessarily an authority for the proposition that the transferee of a non-transferable holding is entitled to make the deposit. The learned Judges in Kali Kishore's case (1) followed the decision in Inder Pershad Singh v. Campbell (6) (which was however under S. 78 of the Act) and relied rather on the wording of the section itself and the principles laid down in the case of Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan (7). These were more directly applicable to that particular case inasmuch as it was held in Dayamoyi's case that the transfer of a part of an occupancy holding does not entitle the landlord to evict the purchaser.

There is a good deal to be said from the point of view of equity for the construction which has been put upon the section by the learned Judges in Kali Krishna's case and by Mallik, J., in Shailaja's case but with the greatest respect I think that the view adopted by the learned Judges in Baneswar's case is the correct one and their reasoning would also apply in the case of a mortgagee of a non-transferable occupancy holding.

The Rule is accordingly discharged with costs one gold mohur.

This judgment will govern Civil Revision Case No. 1621 of 1928 which is also discharged with costs one gold mohur.

singly is unable to follow a decision of a Division Bench the better course for him is to send the case to a Division Bench and not to pass a dissentient judgment which governs only the case in which it is passed. I need not give my reasons here in support of this procedure I have suggested but they are many.

RANKIN, C. J. AND C. C. GHOSE, J.

Kalyanee Debi—Appellant.

v.

Hari Mohan Ghose—Respondent.

Appeal No. 25 of 1928, Decided on 23rd April 1928, from a judgment of Pearson, J., in Original Suit No. 1616 of 1922.

Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 89—Sales held in execution of mortgage decree of High Court on Original Side—Amount to be recovered, or costs not specified in sale proclamation—Application to set aside sale can be made on depositing five per cent of purchase money and amount of decree.

Order 21, R. 89, though well adapted to Mofussil practice is not in terms applicable to the practice of the High Court on its original side as regards sales held in execution of mortgage decrees inasmuch as no amount is specified in the proclamation of sale as that for the recovery of which the sale was ordered, nor the amount of costs before they are taxed. In such circumstances what Court has to do is to apply the words of the section as fairly as possible and the mortgagor applying to set aside sale can do so on deposit of a sum equal to five per cent of the purchase money and the amount of decree. [P 574 O 2]

H. D. Bose, B. K. Ghose, S. C. Mitter, N. C. Mitter and N. C. Chatterji—for Appellant.

B. L. Mitter and J. C. Hazra—for Mortgagor.

S. Ghosh—for Mortgagees.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case an appeal is brought by the purchaser at a sale held in a mortgage suit. It appears that the appellant purchased the property that was put up for sale and thereafter, within thirty days from the sale, the mortgagor judgment-debtor applied under O. 21, R. 89, Civil P. C., to have the sale set aside on paying the amount due to the decree-holder mortgagor and five per cent. compensation to the purchaser for the loss of the property. It appears that the auction purchaser thinks so highly of his bargain that he is not content with the five per cent and this appeal is brought to set aside or vary the order of Pearson, J. permitting O. 21, R. 89, to take effect.

The main difficulty arises by reason of the fact that that rule is framed in language, which though well adapted to mofussil practice, is not in terms applicable to the practice of the High Court on its original side as regards sales held in execution of mortgage decrees. The amount to be deposited for payment to the decree-holder, it is said by the rule is the

and it is expressly provided by the last clause of the rule that nothing in R. 89, shall relieve the judgment-debtor from any liability he may be under in respect of costs and interest not covered by the proclamation of sale. There are authorities which say that as this rule is a concession to judgment-debtors it is to be applied strictly; and there can be no doubt of the correctness of this in cases to which the rule can be applied strictly. When by reason of the fact that no amount is specified in any proclamation of sale as that for the recovery of which the sale was ordered, it is impossible to apply those words strictly, it appears to me that in a matter of this kind what this Court has to do is to apply those words as fairly as possible to the circumstances of the sale on the original side.

Now, in the present case, the position is this. There had been a preliminary and a final decree. Those decrees were adjusted by an arrangement scheduled to an order made on 23rd March 1926, and under that arrangement the plaintiffs were to accept a certain sum—Rs. 36,000, in full satisfaction. The defendant was also to pay all costs. The amount of Rs. 36,000, however, was to be adjusted and satisfied as to a part by the sum of Rs. 17,000 in the hands of one Mohini Mohan Ray; the balance being a sum of Rs. 19,000 and costs and a sum of Rs. 1,000 which was to be paid by the plaintiffs to one Jokhram was to be realized by sale of the properties comprised in the mortgage. As regards this Rs. 1,000 it seems that one Jokhram was a creditor—creditor, as I understand, of the defendant—and the sum of Rs. 1,000 was to be paid by the plaintiffs and was to continue to remain a charge on the pro-Perties comprised in the mortgage in favour of the plaintiffs—to be realised by the plaintiffs out of the sale proceeds thereafter. In these circumstances, the defendant applied to the learned Judge and obtained an order which directed him to pay a sum of Rs. 582, being the compensation to go to the purchasers and a sum of Rs. 13,082 for payment to the plaintiffs of the balance of the amount of principal and interest payable to them under the decree. Nothing was said in the order about the costs of the suit. It appears that thereupon the defendant, instead of paying that money to the Registrar of the Court in his capacity as Accountant-General, paid it to the Registrar of the Court as such and it appears that no commission became at any time payable to the Accountant-General. The order had directed it to be paid to the Registrar to be by him paid to the Controller of Currency with the privity of the Accountant-General and had also directed the commission of the Accountant-General to be deposited. So far as the deposit with the Registrar was not in terms of that order it is a variation which we have ascertained results in no harm to the present appellants because they can without any deduction take the sum of money which was intended for them out of Court if the order of the learned Judge stands. In these circumstances I dismiss that question from our consideration.

It appears next that as regards the actual amount to go to the plaintiffs the dispute centres upon two points only. The first complaint is that no sum was paid as costs and the second complaint is—it is not a very meritorious complaint—that the Rs. 1,000 to go to Jokhiram was not paid into Court.

As regards the question of costs what we have to consider is what is the amount for the recovery of which the sale was ordered; and, in my judgment, it is wrong to say that on the original side of this Court a person desiring to take advantage of R. 89 is obliged to pay in a lump sum making a guess of the amount or to go to the attorneys for the plaintiff and find out from them how much they are prepared to consider as correct. In my judgment, sales are not ordered for recovery of the amount of costs before they are taxed and it would be unreasonable and unfair in applying this rule to say that a person intending to take advantage of R. 89 has to pay into Court an amount which is not yet ascertained. In this respect it may well be that the rules and orders of this Court—now that it has been decided that R. 89, O. 21 applies to mortgage suits—require some further consideration and amendment. Speaking for myself I will have nothing to do with any doctrine which involves paying in an amount arrived at either by guess or by agreement with either side's attorneys or by getting an order for taxation in the absence of other side's attorneys. I do not, therefore, think that the learned Judge, in the circumstances, was wrong in failing to include a direction as to costs.

The remaining question is the question of this Rs. 1,000. It does not appear that the plaintiffs had paid the sum of Rs. 1,000 to Jokhiram or anybody. In these circumstances, I do not think that the learned Judge was wrong in refusing to hold that that was a sum for the recovery of which the sale was ordered.

This disposes of the appeal. In my opinion, the appeal must be dismissed with costs—two sets—the plaintiffs' costs being limited to one counsel only. The plaintiffs and the purchasers are at liberty to take their respective moneys out of Court.

C. C. Ghose, J.—I agree.

Application in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 809 of 1925, Decided on 26th April 1928, for leave to appeal under S. 15 of the Letters Patent.

Court-fees Act, Sch. 2, Art. 11 (b)—Appeal from order rejecting leave for further appeal—Application not referred to in the decree—Art. 11 (b) applies.

A memorandum of appeal against an order rejecting an application for certifying under the amended Letters Patent that the case is a fit one to be taken on further appeal when the decree in appeal does not make any reference to the application is governed by Sch. 2, Art. 11 (b). [P 576 C 1]

Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta and Pro-nodh chandra Kar—for Appellants.

Order.—In this case two learned Judges differed in the decision of a second appeal and in the end Cuming, J., under the amended letters prevailed and the appeal was dismissed. Thereupon an application was made to Patent for a certificate that the case was a fit one to be taken on further appeal. That application was made subsequently to the learned Judge upon a separate petition. It was rejected and the rejection was recorded in the order sheet ;

"Read an application filed on 23rd February 1928, and moved to-day. It is rejected."

The order is dated 24th February 1928.

From that an appeal has been brought and the memorandum of appeal when lodged was excepted to by the stamp reporter on the ground that it was insufficiently stamped. It does not appear to have been sufficiently stamped, but the question of the correct Court-fee has been referred to me by the Taxing Officer under S. 5, Court-fees Act.

It is contended for the appellant that this case is governed by Art. 11 (b), Sch. 2 of the Act, which applies to a memorandum of appeal when the appeal is not an appeal from a decree or an order having the force of a decree. I have examined the decree which has since been drawn up in the matter of the second appeal and I find in it no reference to the application for leave to appeal. In these circumstances it appears to me that the Court-fee is chargeable on this memorandum of appeal under Art. 11 (b), Sch. 2 to the Court-fees Act as has been contended for on behalf of the appellant.

Accordingly the deficit Court-fee will be accepted if put in by Monday next.

Appeal No. 126 of 1928, Decided on 23rd April 1929, from original order of Dist. Judge, 24-Parganas, D/- 16th January 1928.

Provincial Insolvency Act (5 of 1920), Ss. 41 and 42 — Before ordering discharge Court must satisfy of facts given in S. 42.

Before passing an order of final discharge under S. 41 it is necessary for a Court to examine the insolvent and to be satisfied of certain facts which are to be found in S. 42. [P 576 C 2]

Sitangshu Bhushan Bose and Bijan Behari Mitter—for Respondent.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the creditor against the order of final discharge of an insolvent under S. 41, Prov. Ins. Act. This insolvent, it is stated was indebted to a sum of over eight lacs of rupees and it is also stated that his assets amounted almost to nothing. The receiver made a report objecting to the final discharge. An objection was also made by a creditor. The learned Judge has observed that the objections to discharge put forward by the creditor and the receiver do not appear to me to have any weight and I do not see that any good purpose would be served by the postponement of the order of discharge. The learned Judge, however, has not taken into consideration the facts which are necessary for him to be satisfied about before he makes an order of final discharge. Those are to be found in S. 42, Prov. Ins. Act. The insolvent has not at all been examined. One of the creditors stated that he had got properties in the benami of third persons. Those facts should be considered. It also appears that the insolvent's assets are not of a value equal to eight annas in the rupee on the amount of his unsecured liabilities and that being so he had to satisfy the Court that it is due to circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible. There are other things to be considered before a final discharge of an insolvent is made. We, therefore, set aside the order of the learned District Judge dated 16th January 1928 and send back the case for decision according to the provisions of the law after taking evidence in the case.

Nagendra Narain Choudhuri and others—Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal No. 53 of 1925, Decided on 21st December 1928, against the original decree of Sub-Judge, Dhubri, D/- 17th September 1924.

* (a) Hindu Law—Applicability—Family of Rajbansis of Bengal of non-Hindu origin alleging to be governed by Hindu Law—Hindu names—Hindu priests—Hindu castes and gotras—Observed Hindu ceremonies and Hindu secular and ritual observances—Hindu Law held applicable.

It was alleged that Rajbansi family of Bengal of non-Hindu origin was governed by Hindu Law. It was found that the family bore Hindu names, castes and gotras and had Hindu priests. They observed Hindu festivals, and ceremonials on marriages, on deaths and at shradh, as prescribed by the Hindu rituals.

Held: that the Hindu Law was applicable and they were governed by the Dayabhaga School of law. [P 580 C 1]

(b) Custom—Family custom of primogeniture—Maxim "Cessat ratis cessat lex" does not apply—Alteration in tenure of estate alters law of succession.

Where a custom has originated in a family for certain reasons it cannot be said that those reasons being non-existent the custom itself should cease to exist. The principle embodied in the maxim cessat ratis cessat lex does not apply. But when in the case of zamindari of military tenure the nature of tenure is altered the rule of succession governing the zamindari is altered but where in a zamindari family there was a family custom of primogeniture that system cannot be wiped out by the fact that the zamindari took a new settlement. [P 581 C 1, P 584 C 1]

(c) Custom—Family custom of primogeniture—Service tenures—By Regulation 11 of 1793 succession by general law was introduced—Prior succession by eldest son held not sufficient to prove custom of primogeniture.

The practice of succession by primogeniture was abolished by Regn. 11 of 1793 which enacted that henceforth the succession to the estate would be in accordance with the Mahomedan or Hindu Law to which the parties were subject. The service tenures were therefore altered and became ordinary zamindaris subject to the general law of succession, so that the fact that before passing of the regulation the eldest son was recognized as succeeding to the zamindari estate is not sufficient to establish the custom of primogeniture in the family. [P 582 C 1]

(d) Custom—Succession—Proof of primogeniture.

A custom of primogeniture might be proved by the fact that there were cadets of the family who had no share in the estate or that on any previous occasion a right to partition was asserted and successfully resisted.

A custom as to primogeniture different from the Hindu Law of Succession was pleaded by a family. It was found that the partition on the basis of Hindu Law was at one time let in. Oral statement of persons, family priests was forwarded in support of the custom.

Held: that the custom was not proved.

(e) Evidence Act, S. 115—Conduct—Advantage taken under partition—Party estopped from setting impartibility.

The father of the plaintiff entered into a partition and the deed was acted upon for over 40 years, the plaintiff asserted his claim to entire property as being entitled by law of primogeniture and estate being impartible, but kept quiet for about 12 years and dealt with his share of the property as having been derived under the deed of partition.

Held: that he cannot reasonably be heard to say that he is entitled to succeed by primogeniture which is the subsisting custom of the family. [P 584 C 2]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge, Assam Valley Districts, dismissing the plaintiff's suit for recovery of possession of an estate which has been described as the Mechpara Estate. Plaintiff's suit is based upon the allegations made in the first paragraph of his plaint that the Mechpara zemindars belong to a well known Rajbansi caste and the Mechpara Estate has been impartible and inalienable since time immemorial by virtue of the kulachar or custom governing the same family. Plaintiff then goes on to state that his grandfather Prithiram, was married to three wives and he had some children begotten of a maid servant by the name of Purnimeswari. His grandfather died in 1875 and disputes broke out among the sons of Prithiram and in order to purchase peace, his father, Khagendra, the other legitimate sons of Prithiram and the son born of the lady, who was called the maid servant, entered into a compromise, evidenced by a solenama, dated 14th December 1875, by which they had divided the estate into different shares. Khagendra died in February 1910, and the plaintiff has been since then in possession of one anna odd share of the estate. He now brings this suit for recovery of possession of 14 annas odd share of the estate as against his own brothers, who are defendants 1 to 5 and the other descendants of Prithiram. He asks for a declaration that he is entitled to the property as the eldest representative of the eldest line of Prithiram's descendants. A short genealogy would be useful in understanding the claims of the parties:

The plaintiff describes Purnimeswari as a maid servant who was the mistress of Prithiram. His story is that the sons born of Purnimeswari, Tilokram, Lokenath and Bholanath were all illegitimate. Tilokram is dead and is now represented by his widow, Gobinda Priya defendant 12, and an adopted son defendant 13. Lokenath is dead. He died without leaving any descendants. Bholanath is alive and he is defendant 11 in this suit. Of the sons born of Prithiram's wife, Indreswari, Khogendra was the father of the plaintiff and his brothers, defendants 1 to 5. The second son was Kamala Kanta who is dead and is represented by his son, defendant 10 and defendants 10 (a) and 10 (b). The third son was Bhadreswar, who is dead and is represented by his son, defendant 9. Prithiram had only one son born of his wife Debeshwari named Uddhab Ram, who is dead, and is represented by his sons, defendants 6, 7 and 8. Defendants 1 to 5 do not contest the plaintiff's suit. They are, as I have already stated, the brothers of the plaintiff. Barring them, all the other defendants contest the plaintiff's claim. Defendant 14 is a manager of the estate under the management of the Court of Wards.

The defendants who contested the suit in the Court below and who also appear as respondents in this Court deny the allegations of the plaintiff as regards the kulachar or family custom of primogeniture or impartibility. Some of the defendants also contest the allegations of the plaintiff that Purnimeswari was not the married wife of Prithiram. On the allegations of the parties several issues were framed in the Court below, but the only issues of importance which have been discussed before us are three. Those are issues 7, 8 and 10 which are in the following terms:

Issue 7: "Is there any custom or kulachar governing the Mechpara family as alleged, and if so, is the Mechpara Estate impartible and inalienable by reason of such custom and Kulachar?"

Issue 8: "Is the succession to the Mechpara Estate governed by the rule of primogeniture as alleged or by the ordinary rules of succession according to the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law?"

Issue 10: "Were Tilokram, Lokenath and Bholanath illegitimate sons of the late Prithiram Choudhuri and as such excluded from inheritance?"

The Subordinate Judge decided issue 10 in favour of the plaintiff and he decided the other two issues 7 and 8 against him. In the result, as already stated, the entire suit was dismissed. It should be stated at the commencement that Tilokram and Lokenath were older than Khagendra. If they were the legitimate sons of Prithiram, then Khagendra would have no title to the estate, assuming that the rule of primogeniture prevailed in the family and the estate was impartible.

Mr. Langford James, the learned counsel for the plaintiff contended before us that the Subordinate Judge is wrong in his view that the estate was not impartible or inalienable and that this family is governed by the Hindu Law of Succession. His contentions were: (1) Impartibility may be due to the origin of the estate or it may be by custom created by agreement among the founders of the family. Inalienability in the same way may be an incident of the tenure and it may be also by custom and (2) where the family is not Hindu by origin, any person alleging that the succession to the estate of that family is governed by Hindu Law has to prove that it has adopted the Hindu Law of Succession. His contention, with regard to the second point, is that this family is Rajbansi and, therefore, non-Hindu by origin; and the Subordinate Judge has not approached the decision of the questions involved in this case from this point of view.

I will take up the second point first as to the applicability of the Hindu Law of Succession to this family, whether the members of the family are Hindus and whether they are governed by the ordinary rules of Dayabhaga as found by the learned Subordinate Judge.

In my opinion, the question whether the family is governed by the Hindu Law of Succession or not is a matter of secondary importance with regard to the question of the plaintiff's right to the whole of the estate; but as this question has been elaborately argued before us by both sides, I think it is proper to record an opinion on the question. It was argued by Mr. James that as the family is Rajbansi, it is non-Hindu in origin and the defendants, who allege that it is governed by the Hindu Law, must prove that they have adopted the Hindu Law of Succession. Reliance is placed upon the case Fanindra Deb

Raikat v. Rajeswar Dass (1) in support of this contention. The question is really one of fact whether those people, assuming that their origin is aboriginal, have adopted the Hindu Law as a whole in matters of succession. The evidence in this case, however, leaves no room for doubt that whatever might be the origin of the family they adopted Hinduism in its entirety and it will be idle to say that they are not governed by the Hindu Law. They are in all essential purposes Bengal Hindus. First, it is only necessary to see what names they bear: and it would appear that their names can hardly be distinguished from the usual Bengali names. It is undisputed that they have priests and their priests are Bengali Brahmins. The evidence of both sides shows that their last priest was Hara Prosad Chakravarty and it is also stated that they have got a priest at present, but his name does not appear in the evidence. Exhibit 20, which is the Budget Estimate for the year 1320 of this family shows the religious ceremonies of the family for which money was spent. These religious ceremonies include Jagannath Puja, Satyanarain Puja, Mansa Puja, Janmastami Puja, Durga Puja, Punya, Bastu Puja and Saraswati Puja and then Doljatra, Kamdeb Puja, Rasjatra, monthly Kali Puja and so forth. All these Pujas are performed in well-to-do Bengali families.

The pedigree which the plaintiff produced and which was alleged to have been obtained from their deceased family priest, Hara Prosad Chakravarty, begins by stating their gotra as Kasyap Gotra and there is mention of their sapindas in that list. The aborigines have not been proved to care for sapindas nor have they any gotras so far as I am aware. This is peculiar to Hindus. Then whenever the plaintiff and the other members of the family describe themselves, they describe themselves as belonging to the caste of Rajbansies. There is a large number of documents on the record executed by Khagendra and his brothers and the other members of the family in which they describe themselves as belonging to that caste. It is only the Hindus who speak of caste.

(1) [1885] 11 Cal. 463=12 I. A. 72=4 Sar. 610 (P.C.).

Then coming to the oral evidence it will appear that these people observe mourning on the death of any member of their family and that mourning is observed for 30 days. During the period of mourning they do not take meat or fish, or milk or produce of the milk of buffaloes. That is the practice in orthodox Bengali Hindu families. Then they have the performance of the sradh after the expiry of the period of mourning. The evidence of both sides shows that on the death of a member of the family, before the funeral pyre is lighted, there is the Mukhagni ceremony which, I believe, is peculiar to Bengal Hindus and it consists of putting lighted reeds to the face of the corpse before the funeral pyre is set on fire. This is generally performed by the eldest son if he is present at the time of the cremation. There is also direct evidence on behalf of the plaintiff as to the family being Hindu. Santoram Burman (witness for the plaintiff) says in answer to question 16. "The owners of the Mechpara Estate are Hindus by creed," Raja Abhoy Narain Dev, a witness examined on behalf of the plaintiff, and son-in-law of Khagendra Narayan Choudhuri, states in answer to question 16 "I know the owners of the Mechpara Estate to be Hindus by creed" and he speaks of himself "I am myself a Hindu."

"I know the owners of the Mechpara Estate to be Rajbansis. My marriage was duly celebrated by calling priests and others. In my marriage my father-in-law gave away the bride."

Kamini Mohan Guha, another witness on behalf of the plaintiff, says in answer to question 11.

"I think that the zamindars that are at present in Mechpara are governed by the Dayabhaga."

It is unnecessary to pile up further evidence. There cannot be the least shadow of doubt that whatever the parties may state in order to serve their own purposes, upon the evidence on the record, the family is governed by the Hindu law and being residents of Bengal, they must be governed by the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law.

This finding, however, as I have already stated, does not put an end to the plaintiff's case: because assuming that the family is governed by the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law, the plaintiff is still entitled to prove that the custom of primogeniture prevails in the family and the estate is impartible and inalienable by custom. That there are impartible estates in Bengal in the possession of Hindus cannot be and is not denied. That such estates exist was recognized by Regulation 10 of 1800, which enacted that the provisions of Regulation 11 of 1793 as regards the rule of succession did not supersede the custom of primogeniture. We have therefore, to see whether the plaintiff has been able to prove the existence of the custom as alleged. In the plaint, as I have already stated, the plaintiff based his claim upon the kulachar or family custom, but during the argument in the Court below it seems that the plaintiff's pleader also claimed that primogeniture may be established by the fact that this Mechpara zemindari was originally a military tenure and, therefore, by the nature of the tenure, the estate is impartible and succession would be by the rule of primogeniture. In support of the contention that the estate was a military tenure, reference has been made to certain publications mentioned in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge. The question is whether it is still a military tenure.

In addition to those historical works referred to by the learned Subordinate Judge, the learned counsel for the plaintiff also refers to the Permanent Settlement kistibundi, which describes the mahal Mechpara as "mahal Topkhana" and from those it is contended that it is still a military tenure. There cannot, however, be any doubt that the estate is not held under a service tenure. There are well known estates known as the Khargapur Ghatwali Estates, which are impartible and inalienable by the very nature of them. Is this Mechpara Estate like one of those? There is nothing to show that it is so. It is really an ordinary zemindari and succession to it must follow the ordinary law unless a special family custom is proved. I need hardly discuss the incidents of a military tenure and how such incidents may be lost even if its origin was a military tenure by taking a different sort of grant from the Government. In the case of Rajkishan Singh v. Ramjoy Surma Mozoomdar (2), their Lordships made the following observations (at p. 191) :

"In the present case the estate was held directly from the Government, there being no intermediate lord. And it appears to their Lordships that upon this settlement, any incidents of the old tenure as a military jagir, requiring the render of services, if any such ever existed, were as conditions of tenure, impliedly at an end and that the zemindari so far as relates to tenure, was thenceforth held under the Government as an ordinary zemindari free from any such conditions. The settlement would not however, of itself, have operated to destroy a family usage regulating the manner of descent."

The argument, therefore, that is advanced on behalf of the appellant that on account of the nature of the tenure it should be held that it is impartible and succession is according to the rule of primogeniture, cannot be maintained. It is quite true as was observed in the case of Rao Kishore Singh v. Mt. Gahenabai (3) that where a custom had originated in a family for certain reasons, it cannot be said that those reasons being non-existent the custom itself should cease to exist. In such a case, as their Lordships observe, the principle embodied in the expression cessat ratio cessat lex, does not apply. But it is quite different where the claim is made on the basis of the nature of the tenure. When the nature of the tenure is altered then, as their Lordships observe in the case of Rajkishen Singh v. Ramjoy Surma Mozoomdar (2) the rule of succession is altered. The plaintiff must, therefore, in order to succeed rest his case upon a family custom as he had actually pleaded in his plaint and we have, therefore, to see whether the plaintiff has succeeded in establishing a family custom of primogeniture and inalienability. The learned counsel for the appellant relied upon certain documentary evidence in support of his contention that the plaintiff has been able to establish the custom pleaded. He refers first to Ex. 2, dated 5th April 1790 in which the Board of Revenue asks the Collector to furnish them with a statement of the family of Runnaram who had died before that. The next document is Ex. 4, dated 17th June 1790, the report of a local official called Roy Royan, which runs thus :

"His eldest son Mahiram is his successor in the zemindari. Respecting any other heirs the deceased zemindar may have left, I am not prepared to report correctly."

Subsequently the Commissioner makes this report which is found at the top of the paper :

"List of the family of the deceased Runnaram, Zemindar of Machpara, Sobun the defunct's mother, two wives, Mahiram a legitimate son, aged 9 years, Gumburam a legitimate son aged 4 years, a legitimate son aged 4 years, a legitimate son whose name is unknown aged one and a half years, Rupram an illegitimate son aged 15 years and an illegitimate son whose name is unknown aged 12 years. N. B. The defunct has not left any other relations."

Upon this report the Board of Revenue made this direction :

"We direct that Mahiram the eldest legitimate son of the late Runnaram be allowed to succeed his father in the zemindari of Mechpara after the usual publication has been made in the district and at the Khalsa."

This is dated 21st July 1790. The next document is Ex. 6, which confirms this report :

"The Governor-General having directed that the eldest son Mahiram should be allowed to succeed his father in the zemindari of Mechpara after the usual publications, I am directed to desire that you will make the same at the Khalsa and report the result."

This is signed by the Secretary of the Board. This is followed by the report of the Commissioner, Ex. 7, that proclamation was made respecting the succession of Mahiram the eldest son of the late Runnaram and the next document is Ex. 8, a letter from the member of the Board of Revenue to the Commissioner of Cooch Behar to the effect that no objections having been made to the succession of Mahiram, the Commissioner would allow him to succeed his father in the zemindari of Mechpara agreeably to the orders of the Governor-General in Council. Upon these documents it is contended that it was recognized by the Government at the time that the succession to the estate was only to the eldest son of the deceased proprietor and that the rule of primogeniture prevailed in the family. I do not think any such inference can at all be drawn from these proceedings. If one looks at the preamble of Regn. 11 of 1793 it shows that the custom had grown under the previous administration of the country before the coming of the British, that upon the death of a proprietor of an estate, it devolved entirely on the eldest son to the exclusion of all other sons. This practice was on account of the inconvenience felt about the division of the estate and of the revenue. Regn. 11 of 1793 enacted that henceforth the succession to the estate would be in accordance with the Mahomedan or Hindu law to which the parties were subject. The fact, therefore, that before the passing of Regn. 11 of 1793, the eldest son was recognized as succeeding to the estate of Runnaram does not establish the custom of primogeniture in the family as this practice was followed by the Government in the case of every estate. The next matter, however, is directly against the contention of the plaintiff. Mahiram died in 1828 leaving a legitimate son Prithiram and an illegitimate son Madhoram. It appears from Ex. E, dated 22nd January 1832, a report of the Collector of Rungpur of Mechpara Pergana, that :

"Mahiram died leaving a son born of his wife, named Prithiram and another son Madhoram born of Runga, a Jul Chittona, or left-handed wife."

It goes on to say that :

"an enquiry was set on foot to establish the right of Madhoram which was proved and agreeably to a bewasteh (the opinion) obtained from the Pundits of Assam, two-thirds of the father's property was allowed to Prithiram and the remaining one-third to Madhoram. To this no objection has been made by either party. I, therefore, assume this point as settled."

This shows beyond any doubt that the estate was not considered descendible according to the rule of primogeniture, nor was it impartible. The illegitimate son was allowed one-third share of the property left by Mahiram. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that at that time Prithiram was an infant and therefore, no objection could have been taken on his behalf. The estate was taken charge of by the Court of Wards on behalf of both the minors and their mothers were appointed their guardians. It is quite true that Prithiram himself could not object to this division of the estate, he being a minor. But if the custom of primogeniture in the family was so well established as the plaintiff would ask us to believe, is it conceivable that the Collector who had made enquiries about the right of the illegitimate son and went into the trouble of taking the bewasteh of the Pundits of Assam as regards his rights could not have been cognisant of the well established custom of the family of primogeniture and can it be believed that if there was such a custom, he would not have reported that by the custom of the family Prithiram would be the sole owner, even if he had a brother born of a lawful wife of his father. It is next argued on behalf of the appellant that the fact that one-third of the property was allowed to Madhoram, the illegitimate son of Mahiram, is of no consequence, because Madhoram died in 1834 and after that Prithiram claimed the entire estate to the exclusion of the mother of Madhoram who would have been his heir. The learned Subordinate Judge in dealing with this argument has observed that probably the lady was living in the family and did not care to assert her own rights. That may be one explanation.

But assuming that the lady was put aside it would not prove primogeniture. The utmost that the plaintiff could urge was that widows did not succeed to the estate. This one fact that Madhoram got a share goes strongly against the claim of the plaintiff. Reliance is next placed upon the oral evidence on behalf of the plaintiff. This oral evidence consists of the statements made by three persons the first of them being Santoram Burman. He gives his age as 90 or 91 years. His position is that he was menial servant of Prithiram on a pay of Rs. 3 per month, and he speaks about the rule of primogeniture in a zemindari estate of considerable value. Under what circumstances this man came to know of the custom, which could never have been a topic of conversation during his time, it is difficult to say. Apart from the social position of this man, he is an absolutely ignorant person. He does not know anything, what a year is, what a date means, what a month is. He was in service under Prithiram for only about four years. How this man could possibly have known about the rule of succession is difficult to understand. The next witness on whose evidence the plaintiff relies is Kamini Mohan Guha. This man is of a better position in society. He was at first a tutor of the plaintiff under Khagendra Narayan Choudhuri. Then gradually he served the estate in other capacities. He gives evidence to the effect that the custom is that the lawful eldest son of the Mechpara zemindar would inherit the property: the estate is impartible and inalienable. Then when he was asked from whom he had heard it he said "From Khagendra Narayan Choudhuri," that is the father of the plaintiff, and from such other persons who would naturally know of the existence of the custom in the family. As regards Khagendra Narayan's knowledge, the Subordinate Judge truly observes that his knowledge is of no account, because that man himself had entered into a partition deed with his brothers. This oral evidence, therefore, can be dismissed without much comment. The last witness on whom the plaintiff relies is another person named Krishna Mohan, who says "I simply hear that the succession goes to the eldest son." Apart from that, there is the oral evidence of the plaintiff, who, of course, does not know anything about the custom but he says that he heard of it from his father. In order to establish a custom varying the rule of ordinary descent, better evidence should have been put forward. A custom of primogeniture might be proved by the fact that there were cadets of the family who had no share in the estate, or that on any previous occasion a right to partition was asserted and successfully resisted. Nothing like such evidence is available in this case. There was an illegitimate son of Mahiram along with a legitimate son and the illegitimate son was allotted a share.

The next event which disproves this claim of primogeniture is Ex. A the partition deed entered into by all the sons of Prithiram dated 16th December 1875. In that document it is stated that Prithiram Choudhuri Rai Bahadur, zemindar died leaving the seven brothers as his heirs. Then it speaks of dissensions having broken out among them and so forth. By that deed in para. 1 it was stipulated that Khagendra, Kamala Kanta, Bhadreswar and Uddhob would be jointly entitled in equal shares to an eleven annas share and Tilokram, Lokanath and Bholanath would be equally entitled to a five annas share in the property. This was followed by applications for mutation of names in the Collectorate. Ex. 1 is a petition of Khagendra and others dated 16th December 1875, where the same expression is repeated that Prithiram died leaving seven sons as his heirs surviving. Ex. J is the petition by Tilokram of the same date. Ex. K dated 17th July 1876, is a petition by Khagendra for opening separate accounts and in it it is stated that Khagendra had inherited moveable and immovable properties of the shares stated in the petition as heir to the properties left by Prithiram. After that suits were brought by Khagendra and all the other descendants of Prithiram for rent against tenants and these documents range from the year 1880 to 1907 which have been filed as exhibits in this case. In 1885 Bhadreswar presented a petition for registration of his name after attainment of majority. That is Ex. YYY. Then Ex. DDD, dated 13th May 1892 shows that the widows of some of the heirs, some of the descendants of Prithiram collected rents and Khagendra entered into an ekrarnama with two of the widows for collecting rents on their behalf. In May 1907 Khagendra mortgaged one anna share of the property, stating that he was entitled to two annas 15 gandas share in the property and he subsequently executed another mortgage. All these transactions show that Khagendra not only entered into a partition with the branch born of Purnimeswari but stated throughout that all the seven sons of Prithiram were his heirs and he asserted title to only his fraction of two annas 15 gandas which was a fourth share of the 11 annas which were allotted to him and his other cosharers. After the death of Khagendra, Narendra the plaintiff in the case, applied for mutation of his name for one-twenty-fourth share in the 11 annas of the property (Ex. 11). There is a note at the end that Narendra claims 16 annas interest but he was actually in possession of one-twenty-fourth share of the 11 annas and he stated later on in a petition dated 13th November 1911 that he reserved the right to apply for his name being registered with regard to the remaining 13 and odd annas share. This, however, was rejected. Subsequently the plaintiff mortgaged his share to others.

The matter, therefore, comes to this, assuming that the estate was a military tenure at the commencement as soon as the zemindar took a permanent settlement, the nature of the tenure was altered and he became an ordinary zamindar-subject to the general law of succession. This would be a complete answer to the argument based on the fact that primogeniture and impartibility must be assumed from the nature of the tenure. If there was a family custom of primogeniture, that custom certainly could not have been wiped out by the fact that the zemindar took a new settlement from the Government. The authority for that proposition will be found in the case of Rao Kishore Singh v. Mt. Gahenabai (3) already referred to. But if the case is that the rule of primogeniture was according to the custom of the family, then the question is what would be the result of the acts of Khagendra supposing that the custom has been proved. I have already shown that the custom has not been proved by the evidence which has been adduced. But if there was such a custom, then by the acts of Khagendra that custom was given up. The authority for this proposition will be found in the case of Rajkrishen Singh v. Ramjoy Surma Mozoomdar (2), which has already been referred to. Sir Binode Mitter who appeared on behalf of some of the defendants laid stress upon the observations of their Lordships at p. 195 of the report which run thus :

" Their Lordships cannot find any principle or authority for holding that in point of law a manner of descent of an ordinary estate, depending solely on family usage, may not be discontinued, so as to let in the ordinary law of succession. Such family usages are in their nature different from a territorial custom, which is the lex loci binding all persons within the local limits in which it prevails. It is of the essence of family usages that they should be certain, invariable, and continuous, and well established discontinuance must be held to destroy them. This would be so when then the discontinuance has arisen from accidental causes : and the effect cannot be less, when it has been intentionally brought about by the concurrent will of the family. It would lead to much confusion, and abundant litigation, if the law attempted to revive and give effect to usages of this kind after they had been clearly abandoned, and the abandonment had been, as in this case, long acted upon."

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the arrangement entered into by Khagendra was due to compulsion. On the death of Prithiram there were disputes among the brothers and on that account the Deputy Commissioner intervened and they were compelled to enter into this arrangement. Now, it is not a case of the arrangement having been entered into by coercion or undue influence. Khagendra also, as I have already shown, after having entered into that arrangement, continued to act upon it for nearly 40 years and the documents which have been produced in this case state distinctly that he came into possession as one of the heirs of Prithiram. It is true that Narendra, the plaintiff, after the death of Prithiram stated that he asserted a claim to the whole of the property. Assuming that that assertion of the claim reserved his right to bring the suit about three days before the period of limitation had expired, had he any subsisting right ? If the custom had been discontinued by his father and had been acted upon for such a long period of time, no other member of the family of the succeeding generation could assert that the family custom still subsists. The explanation of Narendra, the plaintiff, is that he kept quiet for about 12 years, and dealt with his share of the property as having been derived under the deed of partition for want of funds. Whatever that may be he cannot now reasonably be heard to say that he is entitled to the entire property according to the rule of primogeniture which is the subsisting custom of the family. In my judgment, therefore, the Subordinate Judge is quite right in holding that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed in his claim.

This finding finishes the appeal of the plaintiff.

But defendant 11 and defendants 12 and 13 who have appeared separately contend that the Subordinate Judge is wrong in his finding that Purnimeswari was not the married wife of Prithiram and they seek to support the decree of the Subordinate Judge on another ground that assuming that the plaintiff's story is true that succession to the estate was according to the rule of primogeniture, the plaintiff would have no right as his father was really a junior member of the family, Tilokram, Lokenath and Bholanath being older than Khagendra, the father of the plaintiff. Bholanath is the only direct descendant of Prithiram now alive. The learned Advocate General who appears for him contends that the Subordinate Judge ought to have held upon his own findings that Purnimeswari was the married wife of Prithiram. The learned Subordinate Judge has stated that there is no evidence worth the name that Purnimeswari had been a maid servant. In my opinion the name Purnimeswari itself would show that she could not have been a maid servant. The name is too aristocratic for a maidservant. However, the learned Subordinate Judge has found that if Prithiram married her at all, he must have married beneath his rank. That is quite possible. This marriage again, as the learned Subordinate Judge finds, if it had taken place, must have taken place 100 years ago. Bholanath, the last surviving son, is 71 and it is very difficult to find any person alive after this long lapse of time, who could possibly speak to the fact of the marriage, if it had actually taken place. The evidence is, therefore, mainly on the point as to how she was treated and how her sons were treated during Prithiram's lifetime and also subsequent to his death. There is uncontradicted evidence that the sons born of Purnimeswari were treated in the same way as the sons born of the other two wives of Prithiram. They were married to girls of respectable families as the learned Subordinate Judge has found. Even after Prithiram's death the lady was regarded as the mistress of the house. After her death all the sons of Prithiram observed mourning (asouch) as can only be observed in the case of persons belonging to the same gotra. If she was a maid servant and was never married to Prithiram, the other members of the family the legitimate descendants of Prithiram, however they might have regard for their father's mistress, would have no occasion to observe asouch or mourning according to the Hindu custom after her death. It is unnecessary to restate the instance given by the Subordinate Judge when Bholanath was treated with the respect due to a legitimate son of Prithiram.

The Subordinate Judge, however, states that if Prithiram chose to take Purnimeswari as his wife without a formal marriage, no one within the limits of Mechpara would dare to show her disrespect during his lifetime. That may be true, but it may also be stated that nobody would show her the respect which is due to a married wife of Prithiram. Then it appears that one of the defendants who has been examined and who says that Purnimeswari was not the married wife of Prithiram, had to admit that he had married into the family of the Raja of Jalpaiguri and the Raja of Jalpaiguri himself has married a daughter of Bholanath. It would be impossible to suppose that the Raja of Jalpaiguri, holding such a respectable position among his community, would marry the daughter of a person who has such a blot in his pedigree. An attempt has been made to show that the Raja of Jalpaiguri has discarded the daughter of Bholanath as his wife, but the witness Jatindra, who gave evidence, as regards this marriage, could not venture to make such an allegation. Then there is the evidence of Tilokram having performed the mukhagni ceremony of Prithiram, which he would naturally do as a legitimate son being the eldest when Prithiram's dead body was cremated. Kamini Kumar Guha the witness of the plaintiff, on whom much reliance was placed by the appellant, says that on the death of Khagendra Babu all the zemindars of Mechpara along with Bholanath Babu sat together and dined. There is no question and not a title of evidence that Bholanath was at any time looked down upon as a man born out of wedlock.

The defendant's witness, Rebati Kanto Chakravarty, who is the manager of a different estate, was in the service in the Mechpara Estate from the year 1287 to 1319. He gives evidence as to the position which Purnimerwari occupied during her lifetime. He says that Khagendra used to call Purnimeswari "mother" and the witness lived with Khagendra for a long time. Then there is the evidence of this very witness that after the death of Tilokram, all the members of the family observed asouch, which would not be the case if Tilokram was not a legitimate son of Prithiram. There is also the evidence of Kamini, plaintiff's witness, who says that Bholanath Babu and Khagendra Babu have the same guru (spiritual guide) and purohit. This also would not be the case if Bholanath had not been the legitimate son of his father. Taking all these things into consideration it seems to me absolutely wrong to say, after this lapse of time, that Bholanath or his brothers were the illegitimate sons of Prithiram. It is not stated that Purnimeswari belonged to a different caste. The only assertion made is that she came as a maid servant. Now even if that be so, as these people belong to the lower caste of the Hindu community, no elaborate formal ceremony is necessary for a legitimate marriage and I do not see that there was any difficulty in having the marriage performed between Prithiram and Purnimeswari. At any rate, she was never treated as a mistress of Prithiram, nor were her sons treated as illegitimate.

The Subordinate Judge after stating the facts came to the opposite conclusion merely upon the ground that by the partition, Tilokram and his brothers took a little more than the share of illegitimate sons, and a little less than the legitimate sons. In settling the dispute some one must make concessions and it is stated that at the time Tilokram was ill and he was asked by certain pleaders as the eldest member of the family to make some sacrifice in order to purchase peace. That might have been a reason for his giving up a small share. It is not improbable that the dispute was with regard to ornaments in the hands of Purnimeswari, she was the last surviving wife of Prithiram and it is not improbable that after the death of two wives of Prithiram she got all the ornaments belonging to those ladies and after the death of Prithiram, Khagendra and others would naturally ask for a share of those ornaments. That might have been the cause of the dispute and if she had those ornaments, Tilokram might very well have given up a small share in the property instead of giving up those ornaments. However that may be, there may be many other reasons why this reduced share was taken and I do not think that the inference of the Subordinate Judge that this concession was made because Tilokram and his brothers were illegitimate, can be the only inference as to why this concession was made.

I do not think that this inference is legitimate. Having regard to these circumstances, in my opinion, the plaintiff has failed to establish that Purnimeswari was not the married wife of Prithiram and Bholanath and his brothers were his illegitimate sons. That being so, the plaintiff's claim should also fail on the ground that Tilokram was the eldest surviving son of Prithiram at his death. This appeal must, therefore, stand dismissed with costs. There will be two sets of hearing fees. Defendants

7, 8 and 10 represented by Sir Binode Mitter, will get one set of costs. Defendants 9 and 11 represented by the learned Advocate-General, and defendants 12 and 13, represented by Mr. Roy Choudhuri will get another set of costs, to be divided equally among them. The minors' costs have already been paid.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal arising out of a suit instituted by the appellant for a declaration that the decree passed in a suit brought in the year 1912 for partition which was numbered 137 of 1912 and re-numbered as 7 of 1920 was a nullity so far as she was concerned. The matter, shortly stated, stands thus: The property of which the partition was sought originally belonged to one Golam Ali Choudhury who died in the year 1295 B. S. corresponding to 1888. He had three wives, Azajannessa Khatun, Ijjatannessa Khatun and Jamidannessa Khatun. It is not necessary to state the names of all the parties concerned in this litigation: these will be found in the genealogical table given at pp. 152-153 in the paper book of appeal from original decree No. 254 of 1922. The appellant is a descendant of Golam Ali Chowdhury by his first wife. There was a dispute among the members of the family that the second wife Ijjatannessa was not validly married to him under the Mahomedan law, she having been the sister of his first wife and the marriage having taken place during the lifetime of her sister.

We are not concerned with that dispute at present. The suit of 1912 was brought by a daughter of Golam Ali Chowdhury by his third wife for partition of the estate left by him. The present plaintiff was made defendant 17 in that suit. Proceedings went on for a considerable number of years. This lady, then defendant 17, was a minor at the time of the suit. The whole dispute arises with regard to the fact whether she was a minor at the crucial moment or not. It is alleged that the appellant Jamilennessa Khatun was born on 27th May 1898. On 20th March 1902, her father named Md. Hashein was appointed guardian of her person and property under the Guardians and Wards Act by the District Judge of Faridpur. Md. Hashein died on 13th May 1909. After his death it appears that no other guardian was appointed for that lady. The result, however, of the appointment of guardian under the Guardians and Wards Act was that under the Majority Act, the minority of the lady Jamilennessa Khatun was extended up to 21 years of age. When the suit for partition was brought in 1912 by Majidannessa the daughter of Golam Ali by his third wife, the present plaintiff was admittedly a minor. Her father's mother Karimannessa who was also one of the daughters of Golam Ali by his second wife, the validity of whose marriage was in question, was appointed her guardian-ad-litem. Evidently that lady had an interest adverse to that of the minor defendant Jamilennessa Khatun. Having realised that, she informed the Court of the fact and asked to be relieved of her office as guardian ad litem of defendant 17. She was removed and an officer of the Court was appointed guardian-ad-litem. But, as the learned Subordinate Judge observes, within four days of that appointment, one Md. Salem, the father's brother of the infant Jamilennessa, was appointed guardian ad litem. This gentleman also had an interest adverse to that of the minor in the sense that he was interested that his mother should get a share in the property left by Golam Ali, in which case the share of the infant would be diminished to a certain extent. Nothing, however, turns upon the fact of his being appointed guardian because on 28th April 1916, Md. Salem filed a petition in the partition suit alleging that Jamilennessa Khatun had attained her majority in Falgoun preceding and he could no longer continue as guardian-ad-litem.

It may be mentioned that this gentleman was also a party defendant to the suit. Apparently, the learned Judge required a petition from the infant herself who was alleged to have attained majority and a petition is on the record dated 2nd June 1916, filed on behalf of the lady defendant 17 stating that she had attained majority and she desired to continue the suit as sui juris with certain other prayers about giving her time for filing written statement and so forth. This petition was also supported by an affidavit by Mr. Salem dated 5th June 1916 in which the correct date of the birth of Jamilennessa Khatun was given as the 14th Jaistha 1305 corresponding to 27th May 1898 and it was alleged that she had completed her 18th year on the 14th Jaistha 1323 which corresponds to some date preceding the date of the affidavit in the year 1916. The fact that the lady would not attain majority on her completing 18 years of age was lost sight of, and the lady was treated as if she was sui juris. As a matter of fact, under the law Jamilennessa Khatun did not attain majority till the 27th May 1919. It is not necessary to state the various details about the proceedings in the partition suit; but a preliminary decree was made on 31st July 1916. The question now turns upon the fact that the lady was in the eye of the law an infant and she was not properly represented in the suit by a guardian ad litem duly appointed. It is contended that under the circumstances all the proceedings held from the 28th April 1926 in the partition suit are null and void so far as this defendant is concerned. The allegation of the plaintiff (in the suit out of which this appeal No. 58 of 1924 arises) is that she did not know of the various proceedings that were taken in the partition suit as she was living with her uncle and father's mother whose interests were adverse to hers and she became aware of her legal right only after her marriage in the year 1921 when her husband informed her of the facts, and the suit out of which the present appeal has arisen was brought on 31st March 1922 for a declaration that the proceedings in the previous suit for partition of 1912, taken after the date of the removal of her guardian ad litem are null and void. Various issues were raised in the Court below but the Subordinate Judge really decided the suit upon issues 3 and 4, namely "whether the suit is barred by estoppel and res judicata" (issue 3) and "Is the plaintiff estopped from saying that the decree in Title Suit No. 137 of 1912 is not binding against her" (Issue 4).

Before the lady brought this suit, she made an application in the partition suit under S. 151, Civil P. C., for the reliefs she asks for in her own suit. The Subordinate Judge dismissed her application and it seems to me rightly, because the questions raised would not come within the provisions of S. 151 of the Code. An application in revision was made in this Court which was rejected on the ground that the plaintiff had another and a fuller remedy. Then the plaintiff brought the present suit.

With regard to the question of res judicata, it is only necessary to observe that the present suit is for a declaration that the decree in the previous suit is null and void. The decree in the previous suit, if null and void, cannot operate as res judicata with regard to the present suit. If the decree is a valid one, the present suit fails without any reference to the rule of res judicata. The learned Subordinate Judge relies upon the case of Malkarjun v. Narhari (1), and says that as the Court had jurisdiction in the previous suit to decide whether Jamilennessa Khatun had attained majority or not and as it had wrongly decided that she had attained majority, plaintiff is precluded from questioning that finding in the present suit. It seems to me that the reasoning of the Subordinate Judge is not correct and the present controversy is not covered by the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Malkarjun v. Narhari (1), nor by the other cases of that type which the Subordinate Judge has cited. The question about the majority of the lady was not put in issue in the previous suit. Her real age was given there and in the petition of one of her guardians-ad-litem as I have pointed out, it was said that she had attained the age of 18 years only. As there was no decision of the Court on the question of the majority of the lady, there cannot be any application of the rule of res judicata. The Subordinate Judge has not dealt with the question of estoppel against the lady on the ground of her having made a representation in Court which was accepted by the Judge.

It has, however, been argued before us that there cannot be any estoppel by representation as against a minor. The decisions of all the Courts in India except those of the Bombay High Court are in favour of the view that the rule of estoppel laid down in S. 115, Evidence Act does not apply to the case of minors. The latest case on the point was decided by the Lahore High Court in the case of Khan Gul v. Lakha Singh (2), in which all the previous cases have been cited. But I do not think it necessary to discuss that point in the view I take in this case. The question of estoppel by representation under S. 115, Evidence Act, does not arise in the present case. The decision in this case depends upon the general principle of procedure that no decree can be passed against a minor without his being represented by a proper guardian ad litem. The Court throws its protection over a minor in any suit brought against him and even if the guardian ad litem enters into a compromise it is for the benefit of the minor. There is no question, and it has not been contested before us on behalf of the respondent that a decree passed against a minor without a proper guardian-ad-litem being appointed for him is a nullity : see Rashidunnissa v. Muhammad Ismail Khan (3). But the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is sought to be supported on two grounds : first, that no decree should be made under S. 42, Specific Relief Act, declaring that the previous decree was a nullity because the plaintiff, if she so desires, may bring a suit for partition and claim any share in the property treating the former judgment as non-existent. I do not consider that there is any substance in that contention. There is the decree of the Court ; on the face of it, it is a good decree and it throws a cloud on the rights of the plaintiff, if she has any. And she is certainly entitled to remove that cloud in her title by having a declaration that the decree originally passed is a nullity as against her.

The second ground urged is of more substance. It is stated that this lady has approbated the decree and cannot reprobate it by the present suit. With regard to the question of approbation the learned advocate pointed out that by various petitions she had asked for certain allotments of the property and for money from the receiver for her maintenance according to the order of the Court and so forth. I do not think that those matters can be considered as approbating the decree. She was not bound to give up possession of the joint property. As regards asking for money for subsistence allowance, it may very well be said that she was making the best of a bad bargain and, instead of begging of other people for her subsistence, tried to get as much out of the joint property as the Court would allow. It is next pointed out that by a certain petition in July 1920 this plaintiff along with other defendants filed a petition giving a list of the properties which had belonged to their ancestor Ali Ahmed Chaudhuri, a son of Golam Ali Choudhury, and which had been sold away to different persons. At the end of the petition, after giving the shares of other persons who were parties to the suit, it was stated that the balance which remained was 8 gandas odd, which fact would go against the share which the plaintiff now claims. We are, however, not concerned whether the actual share now claimed by the plaintiff is her legitimate share or not. It may be that she is making an unreasonable claim but I do not find that there is anything in the petition which may be said to have affirmed the decree after she had attained majority. Further, no one can be said to affirm even a voidable contract, unless one knows the circumstances under which he was entitled to avoid the contract. Here, in my opinion, the matter goes further. If the decree was a nullity, then it could not be affirmed by anything that the plaintiff might have said. Of course, if it could be shown that the plaintiff had obtained an advantage to the detriment of any other cosharer, it might be argued that this Court, in the exercise of its discretion, would not make a declaratory decree in favour of the plaintiff. But nothing like that has happened in this case. The plaintiff, if she has got money from the receiver for her subsistence has received less than what she says, she was entitled to and after the final allotment had been made of the property, she has never applied for taking possession of the allotment. In these circumstances, it cannot be said that the plaintiff was precluded by her act from claiming the relief that she is entitled to get.

Another argument was addressed on behalf of the respondent by Mr. Banerjee that if we hold that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in his judgment we should remand the case for trial of the other issues. The only issue that requires to be tried is as to the age of Jamilennessa Khatun. An issue was raised on the question whether she had attained majority or not at the time when the preliminary decree in the partition suit was passed. The defendants, however, stated in their written statement that the date of birth of Jamilennessa : Khatun was not 14th Jaistha 1305 corresponding to 27th May 1898 but she was really born in 1303 B. S. (1896-1897). That is, what is stated in para. 42 of the written statement. Taking that to be the correct date of the birth of the lady, she will still be below 21 years in 1916 when the preliminary decree was passed. It is, therefore, not necessary to remand the case for taking evidence on any question of fact.

(3) [1909] 31 All. 572 = 3 I. C. 864 = 36 I. A. 168 (P.C.).

The judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge must, therefore, be set aside and the suit of the plaintiff decreed. And it is declared that the preliminary decree made in the title suit No. 137 of 1912 on 31st July 1916 is null and void as against the present plaintiff and all subsequent proceedings taken in that suit from April 1916 and after that date must be set aside as null and void as against her.

The result, therefore, is that the original suit No. 137 of 1912 is restored so far as the plaintiff is concerned and the case sent back to the lower Court to proceed with it as from the date of the dismissal of the guardian ad litem of minor Jamilennessa Khatun, defendant 17, in that suit i. e. from about April 1916. The Subordinate Judge will accept a fresh written statement of Jamilennessa Khatun in suit No. 137 of 1912 and proceed to try the case as regards her interest. It is, however, unnecessary now, as she has attained majority, to have any guardian ad litem appointed. If she succeeds in obtaining a greater share than what was given to her by the preliminary decree in the above suit the sharers of other parties would of course be affected.

Appeals Nos. 254 and 320 of 1922 arise out of Suit No. 137 of 1912 which was renumbered as 7 of 1920. It is not necessary for us to give a detailed judgment in these two appeals, because in our judgment in appeal No. 58 of 1924, we have set aside both the preliminary and the final decree of the Court below, and have directed that the suit be remanded to the trial Court for hearing from the stage where it was as from April 1916. The Court below will accept a fresh written statement of Jamilennessa Khatun defendant 17, and proceed to try the case as if no decree had been passed, as regards her interest. We make no order as to costs in these two appeals. The cross-objection was not pressed. This is dismissed without costs.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by an applicant. The application was made under S. 144, Civil P. C. A suit was brought by respondent 1 against the appellant for ejectment. The suit was decreed and the appellant was dispossessed in execution of that decree on 6th September 1926. That decree was reversed finally on 26th March 1927. In the meantime, respondent 1 granted a lease of the property to respondents 2 and 3. The appellant made the application against all the respondents. The learned Munsiff allowed the petition as against respondent 1 and he directed that the petitioner would get possession as against him, but he dismissed the petition against respondents 2 and 3. The result of it might have been that the appellant Phani Bhusan would not get possession of the property of which he was deprived in execution of a decree which had been reversed. Thereupon Phani Bhusan appealed to the learned District Judge. The learned District Judge has very rightly decided that Phani Bhusan is entitled to recover possession as against all the respondents including respondents 2 and 3 who claimed to have been put into possession by respondent 1 under a lease. Having made that order the learned Judge ought to have further added that the appellant would be entitled to a refund of any costs that he had to pay in execution of the decree or damages and mesne profits which were properly consequential on the variation or reversal of the decree. It seems to have been an unintentional omission in the judgment of the learned District Judge. Only respondents 2 and 3 appear and they say that they should not be made liable for any mesne profits as they did not dispossess the applicant, nor were they in wrongful possession. In my opinion, that position taken by respondents 2 and 3 is quite sound. It was respondent 1 who was responsible for depriving the applicant of his possession of the property.

We therefore direct that in addition to the order made by the learned District Judge that the petitioner should be put into possession of the house or a portion thereof in question, he would also be entitled to a refund of any costs that he might have paid to respondent 1 with interest and mesne profits for the period he was kept out of possession of the property from respondent 1. The petitioner is entitled to his costs of this appeal as against respondent 1. Respondents 2 and 3 will bear their own costs of this appeal. The hearing fee is assessed at three gold mohurs.

Panchanan Ghose and Durga Das Ray—for Appellant.

Brojolah Chakravarty and Bejoy Kumar Bhattacharjya—for Respondents.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This appeal must be dismissed and for the following reasons. The appeal arises out of a suit for enforcement of a mortgage. The original mortgagor was one Ramdayal Majumdar. The mortgagees were two in number and they were Ajodhyanath and Pareshnath Biswas. It is said that the mortgage moneys were advanced on behalf of three brothers viz., Ajodhyanath, Paresh Nath and Gopinath Biswas. There is no finding either in the judgment of the first Court or in the judgment of the lower appellate Court that Gopinath was interested in the mortgage or in the moneys which were advanced on mortgage. Now, Ajodhyanath died leaving a widow and without issue, Gopinath died leaving a widow and without issue and Paresh Nath died leaving a widow and four sons. The plaintiff purchased the mortgage-bond from the widows of Ajodhyanath and Paresh Nath and from Hemangini, the widow of Gopinath. Defendants 1 to 3 are the sons of Ram Dayal, the original mortgagor who is now dead. Defendant 4 is the purchaser of the equity of redemption. Defendants 5, 6, 7 and 8 who were not originally on the record are the sons of Paresh Nath and they were subsequently added as parties defendants to this suit. The date of payment under the mortgage is 13th April 1913. Therefore, if a suit to enforce the mortgage in question had to be instituted it was to be instituted within twelve years from that date under Art. 132, Lim. Act. The suit was instituted in April 1925. The first Court decreed the suit, the lower appellate Court has dismissed the suit on, among others, the ground of limitation. One of the points taken in the lower appellate Court was that the attestation of the execution of the document by the mortgagor has not been proved and that being so, the plaintiff was not entitled to enforce the mortgage. The ground urged is this, that the only witness who proved the attestation of the execution of the document was one who had been examined on commission and there were indications apparent on the record to the effect that at the time when the suit came on to be heard in Court, the witness was not ill and, therefore, was not entitled to claim that he should be examined on commission or that his examination on commission should be received in evidence. On this point the first Court did not say anything for the reason, as we are informed, that no objection to the admissibility in evidence of the deposition of the witness concerned was taken. The lower appellate Court has gone into the matter and, as indicated above, has held that the deposition of the witness could not be received in evidence. In my opinion, the lower appellate Court is wrong in the conclusion to which it came on the point in question.

To start with, no objection was taken in the trial Court and besides if such an objection had been taken, I have no doubt the trial Court would have taken measures to see that the defect, if any, was cured or that the witness in question was summoned to give evidence on the point referred to above. There is no substance whatsoever in the point taken by the lower appellate Court and we must, accordingly, negative the point and uphold the contention urged before us by the appellant. The lower appellate Court has, however, gone into the question of limitation and has held that the suit is barred by limitation. The facts bearing on the question of limitation are these: It appears that on the date the suit was instituted by the plaintiff, he had not got an assignment of the interest of the sons of Pareshnath in the mortgage moneys. The position, therefore, was (and it may be stated in passing that there is nothing on the record to show that Gopinath was interested in the mortgage moneys) that on the date of the institution of the suit, the plaintiff was the assignee of the interest of one of the mortgagees. It is true that on a date subsequent to the institution of the suit, the plaintiff was successful in obtaining a consequence of the interest of two of the sons of Pareshnath and he obtained release from the other two sons of Pareshnath (defendants 5 and 6) and it is also true that on a date subsequent to the institution of the suit, these four sons of Pareshnath had been made parties to the suit. But in law the position on the date of the institution of the suit was this. The plaintiff had instituted a suit as assignee of one of the mortgagees and he had not taken any steps whatsoever within the time limited for the institution of suits on mortgages to bring on the record the representative of the deceased mortgagee Pareshnath; in other words, in law his suit on the date of the institution thereof was an incompetent suit. It is unnecessary to refer to cases or even to the sections. The suit on the date of the institution being an incompetent suit, the question is whether the addition of defendants 5 to 8 on a date subsequent to the institution of the suit had the effect of curing the defect in question. In my opinion, it had no such effect. The distinction really is between proper and necessary parties. If a necessary party is left out and is not impleaded till limitation had run out, the suit must be considered to be one which is barred by limitation: see in this connexion the case of Debi Prosad Sahi v. Dharmajit Narayan Singh (1) where the identical question arose.

In my view, therefore, the addition of defendants 5 to 8 on a date subsequent to the expiry of limitation as parties defendants to the suit had not the effect of making the plaintiff's suit which was an incompetent one on the institution thereof a competent one on the date when the parties in question were added. That being so, there cannot be any doubt whatsoever that the plaintiff's suit was barred by limitation and this appeal must, therefore, stand dismissed with costs.

SUHRAWARDY AND GRAHAM, JJ.

G. V. Raman and others—Accused—Petitioners.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 192 of 1929, Decided on 19th February 1929, against order of Chief Presy. Magistrate, D/- 8th February 1929.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 208 (2)—In an enquiry conducted under Chap. 18, the accused has no right to reserve cross-examination of prosecution witnesses.

The provisions of chapters dealing with enquiry into cases triable by Court of Sessions and those relating to summons cases and warrant cases are not interchangeable and provisions appearing in a particular chapter relating to "trial" cannot safely be imported into that relating to "enquiry." [P 594 C 1, 2]

The wording of Cl. 2, S. 203, does not lend support to the view that it assumes that the accused shall be at liberty to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution after all the witnesses have been examined-in-chief.

A Magistrate may be justified in allowing the accused even in a trial under Chap. 18, to reserve cross-examination for a future occasion in the special circumstances of a case and in the interests of justice. That will, however, not be under any express enactment but in the exercise of the inherent power of the Court in administering justice. But the Magistrate is justified in refusing a prayer for cross-examination of prosecution witnesses when the defence had declined to cross-examine them after the examination-in-chief of each was over: 36 Cal. 48, Disappr.; 39 Cal. 885, Diss. from.; 5 C. [P 596 C 1, 2]

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 213 (2)—Expression "witnesses for the defence" does not include witnesses for the prosecution, who are cross-examined.

The expression "witnesses for the defence" does not include witnesses for the prosecution who are cross-examined. The witnesses for the defence referred to in Cl. 2, S. 213, are witnesses whom the Court may, in its discretion, summon and examine under S. 212 out of the list of witnesses given by the accused under S. 211 to be examined on his behalf at the trial in the Court of Session. [P 595 C 2]

(c) Criminal P. C., Ss. 215, 435 and 439—In the case of a commitment High Court will interfere only when any provision of law has been contravened and not otherwise.

Where a Magistrate, in making an order of commitment, has contravened any provision of law, the High Court is entitled and ought to set aside the commitment on the ground; but where he has not violated any provision of law and has only erred in the exercise of the discretion vested in him, the High Court will seldom interfere in such a case.

B. C. Chatterji, Suresh Chandra Taluqdar, Mritunjoy Chattopadhyaya and Gopal Chandra Mukherjee—for Petitioners.

Suhrawardy, J.—This rule is directed against an order of the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta committing the accused to the sessions. The ground on which we are invited to quash the commitment is that the petitioners were not given an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution. In order to understand the ground upon which this revision application is based, it is necessary to state the facts. The accused were charged under Ss. 420 and 120-B, I. P. C. The case against one of the persons who were originally placed on trial was withdrawn under S. 494, Criminal P. C., and he was examined as the first witness in the case. In the course of the examination of this witness the learned Magistrate intimated that on the completion of the evidence he would commit the accused to the sessions. The learned counsel appearing for the accused then asked for permission to reserve cross-examination at that stage and to cross-examine at a later stage. The petitioners in their petition say that on such request being made the learned Magistrate remarked that he would consider the application later. But the Magistrate in his explanation says that he refused to grant the prayer. We take it that that was so and the prayer for reserving cross-examination was refused. It appears from an examination of the record that after each witness was examined the defence was asked to cross-examine him and on their declining to do so, there is a note made by the Magistrate at the end of the examination of each witness that cross-examination was declined. The examination of the witnesses went over several days the last batch of 25 witnesses having been examined on 4th February 1929. Thereafter the accused were examined under S. 342 and charge was framed. On that day the Magistrate passed the following order:

"Four accused are discharged. Remainder will be committed to the High Court Sessions under Ss. 420, 120-B and 511, I. P. C. tomorrow."

On the following day the order of commitment was formally passed. On 4th February an application was made on behalf of the accused for permission to cross-examine the approver namely, the first witness and some other witnesses before commitment. This application was rejected by the Magistrate with the following order:

"The correct time to cross-examine has passed. I do not think it necessary at this stage to allow the prayer."

The accused were committed to take their trial at the High Court Sessions which is now sitting and their case appears in the list for the present Sessions. On 8th February this rule was obtained from us for setting aside the commitment on the ground stated above. It is contended on behalf of the petitioners that the Magistrate was wrong in rejecting their application on 4th February, and refusing to grant them permission to cross-examine some of the witnesses for the prosecution before committing them to the Sessions.

In considering the point raised before us I should like first to refer to the law as embodied in the Criminal Procedure Code before commenting on the case law on the subject. It may safely be assumed that Chap. 18, Criminal P. C., dealing with enquiry into cases triable by Court of Session is complete in itself and lays down the procedure to be followed in such an enquiry as do chapters relating to trials of summons cases and warrant cases. It cannot be argued that the provisions of these chapters are interchangeable and that the provisions appearing in a particular chapter relating to "trial" can be imported safely into that relating to "enquiry." The only section which deals with examination of witnesses in an enquiry into cases triable by the Court of Sessions is S. 208. Cl. 1 of that section says:

"When the accused appears or is brought before the Magistrate he shall proceed to hear the complainant, if any, and take in manner hereinafter provided all such evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution or in behalf of the accused or as may be called by the Magistrate."

The course to be followed by the Magistrate in recording the evidence under that clause is what is indicated afterwards in the sections under that chapter. The second clause says that the accused shall be at liberty to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution and in such case the prosecutor may re-examine them. Cl. 3 is to the effect that if the complainant or the accused applies to the Magistrate to issue process to compel the attendance of any witness or the production of any document or thing the Magistrate shall issue such process unless he deems it unnecessary to do so. S. 209 indicates that when the evidence has been recorded in accordance with Cls. (1) and (3), S. 208, the Magistrate shall if he finds that there are not sufficient grounds for committing the accused person for trial record his reasons and discharge him unless it appears to the Magistrate that such person should be tried before himself. This section enables the Magistrate to discharge the accused after recording evidence for the parties under S. 208 (1) and the evidence of witnesses called under Cl. (3) if he is not satisfied that there are sufficient grounds for committing him to the Sessions. But if the Magistrate is satisfied that there are sufficient grounds for committing the accused he shall frame a charge under S. 210. Under S. 211 the accused shall be required to give a list of witnesses whom he wishes to be summoned to give evidence at his trial before the Sessions Court. The Magistrate may in his discretion summon any witness named in the list under S. 212.

Under S. 213, the Magistrate may make an order after all the preliminaries have been observed committing the accused to the Sessions or if after hearing the witnesses for the defence he is satisfied that there are not sufficient grounds for committing the accused he may cancel the charge and discharge the accused. This is all the procedure laid down in Chap. 18 for the examination of the witnesses and the conduct of the proceedings before commitment. We are asked in this case to quash the commitment in the exercise of our power under S. 439 read with S. 435, Criminal P. C., and this power in a case like the present should be exercised in accordance with the provisions of S. 215, Criminal P. C., which enables the High Court to quash a conviction only on a point of law. If the Magistrate has contravened any provision of law we are certainly entitled and we ought to set aside the commitment on the ground. But if on the other hand he has not violated any provision of the law and has only erred in the exercise of the discretion vested in him the High Court will seldom interfere in such a case.

Section 208 does not say of reservation of cross-examination of witnesses for the prosecution till a future occasion. The ordinary rule of examination of witnesses in Courts is that after a witness is examined he is cross-examined and if necessary, re-examined (S. 138, Evidence Act). In civil Courts there is no departure from this rule. But in the administration of criminal law it has been relaxed in the trial of warrant cases where under S. 256, Criminal P. C., the accused after the charge has been framed against him shall be asked if he wishes to cross-examine any witness for the prosecution and if he says that he so wishes the witnesses named by him shall be recalled. This procedure has not been incorporated in Chap. 18 relating to enquiry into cases triable by the Court of Sessions. Cl. (2), S. 208 does no more than indicate the ordinary rule as to how examination of witnesses should be conducted. After witnesses for the prosecution have been examined the accused shall be at liberty to cross-examine them and the prosecutor to re-examine them. The wording of that clause does not lend support to the view that it assumes that the accused shall be at liberty to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution after all the witnesses have been examined in chief. Cl. (1), S. 208, refers to the examination of witnesses produced by the prosecution without the processes of the Court; and Cl. (3) refers to compelling the attendance of witnesses under process from Court; otherwise there is no difference between the two clauses as regards the procedure to be followed under either of them. If it was the intention of the legislature to insert in Chap. 18, a provision similar to what is contained in S. 256, Chap. 21, the several clauses of S. 208 would have been differently worded. In the absence of any such enactment in Chap. 18 and in view of the express enactment to that effect in Chap. 21 relating to trial of warrant cases, it will not be wrong to assume that the legislature did not intend to give the accused the right to reserve cross-examination in a case triable by a Court of Sessions. I should not like to lay down that a Magistrate is not justified in allowing the accused even in a trial under Chap. 18 to reserve cross-examination for a future occasion except in the special circumstances of a case and in the interest of justice. That will not be under any express enactment but in the exercise of the inherent power of the Court in administering justice.

In the present case the Magistrate asked the accused to cross-examine each witness before he left the box and they persistently refused to cross-examine the witnesses. At the end of the examination of all the witnesses they wanted to cross-examine some of them but the Magistrate refused their prayer. I invited Mr. Chatterjee who conducted the case on behalf of the petitioners to point out any express provision of law which gives him the right to demand cross-examination of witnesses in an enquiry under Chap. 18 after all the witnesses have been examined. He pointed out Cl. (2), S. 213, which says that if the Magistrate, after hearing the witnesses for the defence is satisfied that there are not sufficient grounds for committing the accused he may cancel the charge and discharge the accused. The learned counsel's contention is that the expression "witnesses for defence" includes not only the witnesses who are examined as defence witnesses but also the witnesses for the prosecution who are cross-examined. This seems to me to be a forced construction of the plain words of the section. Reading Ss. 211, 212, 213 together it would be clear beyond any possibility of doubt that the witnesses for the defence referred to in Cl. (2), S. 213, are witnesses whom the Court may in its discretion summon and examine under S. 212 out of the list of witnesses given by the accused under S. 211 to be examined on his behalf at the trial in the Court of Sessions. There being no express provision of the law entitling the accused to reserve cross-examination till after the examination of all the witnesses under Chapter 18 has been completed, the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate in my judgment has committed no error of law.

In this connexion several cases have been referred to at the Bar which in the view of the law I have taken does not seem necessary to examine minutely, but as they have laid down certain generalizations I should like to say a few words with regard to them. The point that has now been raised before us did not come up directly for examination in any of the cases of this Court except in Phanindar Nath Mitra v. Emperor (1). There witnesses for the prosecution were examined but no attempt was made by the accused to cross-examine them. But an application to cross-examine the witnesses was made to the Magistrate after the prosecution had closed its case and the Magistrate had decided to commit them to the High Court. It seems that in that case the Magistrate had originally proceeded with the trial of the case as before himself. But at a certain stage he decided to commit the accused to the Court of Sessions. As the application was made after he had so decided, the learned Judges were of opinion that S. 347, Criminal P. C., applied and under that section if it appeared to the Magistrate at any stage of the proceedings that the case was one which ought to be tried by the Court of Sessions he should commit the accused under the provisions relating to commitment. The learned Judges seem to be of opinion that as soon as the Magistrate has decided that the case should be committed to the sessions he shall stop further proceedings and commit the accused to the sessions at once. The learned Judges laid some stress upon the words "he shall stop further proceedings" which appeared in the Code but which have now been omitted by the Amending Act of 1923. In that view they held that the Magistrate need not therefore follow the procedure laid down in S. 208. I am unable to agree in this construction of S. 347. It is possible, and it generally so happens, that the Magistrate starts a case before him with a view to try it himself; but in the midst of the trial when certain facts have been disclosed he makes up his mind to commit the accused to the sessions. When the trial was commenced before him he treated it as one of a warrant case and the accused exercised the right to reserve cross-examination after charge. If in the midst of the trial or immediately after finishing the evidence for the prosecution the Magistrate decides to commit the accused to the sessions it does not seem just to the accused that he should at that stage, because the Magistrate has come to a certain decision, lose the right which he had before such decision. In such a case S. 347 should not be held as compelling the Magistrate to refuse to allow the accused to cross-examine the witnesses and to commit at once the case to the sessions. This view has been taken in a recent case to which I will presently refer. Phanindra's case does not help either party; but it lends some support to the view that the Magistrate is not bound to give facilities to the accused for cross-examination after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and no attempt is made by the accused to cross-examine them earlier. This case has been disapproved and in my opinion rightly, in The Sessions Judge of Coimbatore v. Irumuddi Kumara Kangaya Mantridiyad (2).

A strong case in favour of the petitioners is the case of Jogendra Nath v. Moti Lal (3), which is a reverse case to the present. In that case the Magistrate after drawing up the charge in a case triable by the Court of Sessions allowed the accused to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses and thereafter acquitted him. Against the order of acquittal or discharge the prosecutor moved this Court. The learned Judges discharged the rule holding that the Magistrate had the right to allow the accused to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution even after charge under S. 213 (2), Criminal P. C. Their Lordships observed:

"No doubt the subsection refers to witnesses for the defence; but in our opinion these words are wide enough to cover evidence extracted by cross-examination from the witnesses for the prosecution."

For the reasons given above, with great respect I am unable to adopt the construction put by the learned Judges on S. 213 (2), Criminal P. C. In that case the question as to whether the Magistrate is bound to give opportunity to the accused to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution after they have all been examined-in-chief, before or after charge, does not seem to have been raised and discussed. In fact the reliance put by the learned Judges upon sub-S. (2), S. 213 shows that they were of opinion that it was in the discretion of the Magistrate to give this opportunity to the accused, in view of the provisions of S. 212, Criminal P. C. In that case reference has been made to In the matter of Surya Narain Singh (4). That was a case in which the application was made for the transfer of an enquiry from the Court of the Magistrate on the ground amongst others that the Magistrate had refused permission to the accused to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution.

The question as to whether the Magistrate is bound to do so was not raised or discussed. But it was assumed that the accused should have been given an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses for the prosecution with a view to obtaining a cancellation of the charge. In that case the learned Judges expressed the view that after the drawing up of the charge the Magistrate is not bound to commit the accused but that he can also discharge him. The point before us was not there raised and as it has not been laid down that it is the duty of the Magistrate to allow an opportunity to the accused for cross-examining the witnesses for the prosecution, though he may do so, as reference in that case to S. 213 (2) shows, I am not prepared to follow it as an authority on the question before us. A much recent case on this point is the case of Jyotsna Nath Sikdar v. Emperor (5). The decision in that case supports the view that I have ventured to take with regard to the duty and discretion of Magistrates in inquiries under Chap. 18. There the trial was proceeded with as in a warrant case and before charge was framed and the Magistrate decided to commit the accused to the Court of Sessions the accused applied to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution. This prayer was refused and the learned Judges held that in the circumstances of that particular case the Magistrate had no discretion in the matter having regard to the fact that the application to cross-examine was made:

"before the charge was framed and before the Magistrate had decided to commit the accused to the Court of Sessions."

But he should have allowed the accused to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses. The learned Judges refused to follow the case of Phanindra Nath Mitter v. Emperor (1), as also the case of Fazarali v. Mazaharulla (6) on the construction of S. 347. The last mentioned case was also a case of transfer. There is an observation there of the learned Judges distinguishing Phanindra Nath Mitra's case (1), that if the accused had applied after all the witnesses for the prosecution had been examined to cross-examine them he should have had no right under S. 347 but as in that case the application was made before the prosecution case was absolutely closed and all the witnesses had been examined, the accused should have been granted the indulgence of cross-examining the witnesses. The learned Judges cited no authority and did not discuss the several sections of the Code bearing upon this question. For my part I do not see any difference in the application of law between a case where the accused asked permission to cross-examine witnesses for the prosecution after they had all been examined and that in which he asks for such permission after some of them have been examined. It seems to me that decisions like these are only calculated to confuse as they seem to usurp the function of the legislature. The case of Jyotsna Nath Sikdar v. Emperor (5) is not also relevant as in that case the application for cross-examination was made before the charge was framed and before the Magistrate had decided to commit the accused to the Court of Sessions. In the case before us the Magistrate had on the very first day declared that he would commit the accused to the sessions. The view that I have ventured to take finds support in a decision of the Patna High Court in the case of Sasdat Mian v. Emperor (7) where it has been distinctly held that in an enquiry into cases triable by a Court of Session the accused has no right to reserve cross-examination. In that case too the defence counsel had declined to cross-examine the witnesses after each of them had been examined. I should like to quote that portion of the judgment with which I entirely agree :

"The ordinary rule as laid down in the Evidence Act is that the witnesses will be examined-in-chief, cross-examined and re-examined. There is no express provision for postponing the cross-examination of witnesses till all prosecution witnesses are examined-in-chief. A special provision has been made under certain circumstances with respect to trials in warrant cases (Chap. 21) entitling the accused to postpone the cross-examination of the witnesses till a certain stage. No such provision has been made with respect to an enquiry into the cases triable by a Court of Sessions in Chap. 18 of the Code. The Magistrate, however, to my mind has the discretion to allow the accused to postpone the cross-examination of witnesses in suitable circumstances."

In the view that appeals to me as stated above this Rule fails and is discharged.

Graham, J.—The Rule in this case was issued to show cause why the petitioners should not be given an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses for the prosecution before commitment to the sessions.

The facts are shortly these :

The petitioners were sent up for trial before the Chief Presidency Magistrate on charges under Ss. 420 and 120-B, Penal Code. At the outset the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate intimated that he would upon the completion of the evidence commit the case to the High Court Sessions. Thereafter counsel for the accused is said to have verbally prayed for permission to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution, and it is said the learned Magistrate remarked that he would consider the application later. There appears to be some doubt about this, however, as the learned Magistrate says in his explanation that the application was refused, and we may proceed on that basis. The record shows that 10 witnesses were examined for the prosecution on different dates from 20th December to 25th January, and on 4th February 1925 more prosecution witnesses were examined. In the case of each witness there is a note at the foot of the deposition that cross-examination was declined. On the last mentioned date, however, an application was made by the accused G. V. Raman praying for permission to cross-examine the approver and some other witnesses before commitment to the Sessions Court. That application was rejected by the Magistrate on the ground that the time for cross-examination had passed, and that he did not think it necessary at that stage to allow the prayer. It is this order which is now assailed on behalf of the petitioners, and the contention shortly is that the learned Magistrate had no option or discretion in the matter, and that he was bound to allow the accused to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses so as to give them an opportunity of breaking down the case against them and so obviating the necessity of their being committed to the Court of Sessions.

In my opinion this contention is without substance. An accused certainly has under S. 208 (2), Criminal P. C., a right to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution, but he must exercise that right at the proper time, that is to say, after the close of the examination-in-chief. That is the ordinary construction to be put upon the section, and it finds support in S. 138, Evidence Act.

Mr. Chatterjee for the petitioner urged that inasmuch as S. 208, Criminal P. C. does not say when the right of cross-examination is to be exercised, it is open to the accused to exercise it at any time, and that he may, if he so desires, reserve it until after all the prosecution witnesses have been examined. There is nothing, however, in the section to warrant this view. The right if exercised must be exercised in the normal manner.

It cannot be argued that because in the case of warrant trials an accused is allowed under S. 256, Criminal P. C., to reserve his cross-examination, he must necessarily have the same privilege when an inquiry is held under Chap. 18. Indeed the very fact that that chapter contains no provision similar to that in S. 256 (1) is an argument for holding that no such right exists. It may be inferred that the omission was intentional and not a mere accident. Moreover the record plainly shows that the accused declined to cross-examine, and they cannot afterwards revive that right and claim to exercise it at any time they please. The Magistrate might, if he considered it necessary or desirable, have allowed cross-examination, but it cannot be held that in refusing he committed any error of law.

It is to be borne in mind moreover that under S. 347, Criminal P. C., the Magistrate is empowered at any stage of the inquiry to commit for trial, which furnishes an additional reason for holding that the claim now preferred by the petitioners is not well founded. It seems to me that they are claiming a right which has not been given anywhere in the Code. Certain authorities were cited before us on their behalf and these have been dealt with by my learned brother. It is not therefore necessary for me to refer to them.

I agree that the Rule fails and should be discharged.

RANKIN C. J., AND PAGE, J.

Linton—Appellant.

v.

Guderian—Respondent.

Appeal No. 30 of 1928, Decided on 31st July 1928, from judgment of Costello, J., in Matrimonial Suit No. 3 of 1928.

(a) Divorce Act (6 of 1869), S. 2—Domicile in India at time of petition is essential for granting jurisdiction.

Domicile in India at the time when the petition is presented is an essential condition for the jurisdiction of Indian Courts in cases of dissolution of marriage. [P 603 C 2]

(b) Divorce Act (6 of 1869), S. 2—"Domicile."

Domicile of the parties to a marriage in practice means the domicile of the husband: Landerdale Peerage Case, (1885) 10 A. C. 692; Udny v. Udny, (1869) 1 H. L. (Sc.) 441; Bell v. Kennedy, (1868) 1 H. L. (Sc.) 307, Ref. [P 601 C 1]

(c) Divorce Act (6 of 1869) — Change of domicile—Onus.

The entire burden of proving that the petitioner had changed his domicile lies on him: Winans v. Attorney-General, (1901) A. C. 287, Foll. [P 602 C 1]

(d) Divorce Act (6 of 1869), S. 2—Domicile—Change of domicile—Change of domicile means determination to make alleged domicile home, with clear intention of settling there and ending his days there.

To establish change of domicile it must be proved that the person whose domicile was in question had determined to make and had in fact made the alleged domicile of choice his home with the intention of establishing himself and his family there, and ending his days in that country: Winans v. Attorney-General, (1904) A. C. 287, Foll. [P 602 C 2]

(e) Divorce Act (6 of 1869), S. 34—Application for dissolution and damages—Court having no jurisdiction to grant dissolution—Damages alone can be granted.

It cannot be said in view of the plain provisions of the Divorce Act, S. 34, that because the Court has no jurisdiction to grant a decree for divorce, it cannot treat the application for dissolution of marriage and damages as an application for damages alone. It can be so treated and further the damages suffered by the petitioner will be different according as he is getting a decree for divorce or is not getting it: Bernstein v. Bernstein, (1893) P. 292, Dist.; Monsell v. Monsell, (1922) P. 34, Ref. [P 603 C 2; P 604 C 1]

(f) Divorce Act (6 of 1869), S. 13—"Collusion."

Collusion between the parties cannot be inferred from such ordinary acts between them as a solicitor would naturally regard as unoffensive and unobjectionable: Churchward v. Churchward, (1895) P. 7 and Harris v. Harris, (1862) 31 L. J. Pr. (N.S.), 160, Ref. [P 605 C 1]

(g) Divorce Act (6 of 1869), S. 13—Object of insisting on no collusion is to ensure fair trial.

The object which the legislature had in mind in insisting that there should be no collusion between the parties to a matrimonial petition was to compel the parties to come into the Court of Divorce with clean hands. It is to oblige them to bring all material and pertinent facts to the notice of the Court, to prevent their blinding the eyes of the Court in any respect; to oblige them so to act as will enable the Court to be in a position to do justice between the parties: Butler v. Butler, (1890) 15 P. D. 66, Foll. [P 606 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—In this case, we have to deal with a husband's petition for divorce filed in this Court under the Indian Divorce Act, on 20th January 1928. The petitioner was apparently born in a part of Poland, which has been referred to as being at that time German Poland. It appears that when he was very young, only 2 or 3 years old, his family removed to Berlin and when the petitioner was about 27, namely, in 1912, he went to London. In 1914, he was married in London to the respondent. It appears that for a time he went to New York, and afterwards to Honolulu. In 1916, he went to New Zealand, where, apparently, his wife's people had some property or connexions. His evidence is that he had been endeavouring to do business in New Zealand in connexion with exportation of goods from Germany. But, as the political condition after the war was not favourable for that kind of business, he, in 1923, abandoned all hopes of continuing that business in New Zealand and accordingly he removed with his family from New Zealand to Berlin. He seems to have gone to Berlin in 1920 and gone back to New Zealand in 1921. He appears to have abandoned definitely New Zealand and gone back to Germany in 1923. He went back to Germany with the idea that he would go to some other part of the world and make his living in connexion with exportation of goods from Germany. According to him, in 1926, he made up his mind to go to India and take his wife and two children with him. As they were starting out from Europe, he learned of the possibility of business in Sweden and went to Stockholm—his wife and children going out to India meanwhile. Apparently he expected them to go to Colombo, but, in fact, they came to Calcutta and the wife was living in the Grand Hotel. The husband followed soon after and arrived there towards the end of November 1926. It appears that, when he left Europe, he had two agreements—one of which only is in evidence—one for the sale of German typewriters and other for the sale of motors, I understand, Swedish motors.

The agreements—both of them—were of a preliminary and temporary character, lasting only for one year. In this way, the petitioner came out to start life in business in India. To put the matter quite shortly, at the Grand Hotel at the end of November there was staying the co-respondent. It appears that he made acquaintance of the respondent in the hotel. Before very long, namely, by 10th January, one way or another, he took the respondent to his flat at the Galstaun Mansions and there misconduct occurred and from that time onward it would appear that these parties committed misconduct at various places. More than one visit to Darjeeling was made by them and it would appear that the respondent was constantly living with the co-respondent at his flat. This appears to have gone on for the best part of the year and at the time when the citation under this petition was served upon the wife in 1928, she was living with the co-respondent at Galstaun Mansions. The husband, it would appear, having come to the Grand Hotel at the end of 1926, had a quarrel with his wife, because, according to him, his wife's reference to the co-respondent made him suspicious. He says that he told his wife that she must leave the hotel, but she refused. He went away, taking with him both the children and it does not appear that until the time when these divorce proceedings were commenced, he saw anything of his wife. That matters little to our present purpose. He appears to have travelled about in India in the endeavour to open agencies for the sale of these German typewriters. He appears to have been ill and he had gone during the course of 1927 to Kashmir to recover. It does not appear that he had any fixed abode in India. He had taken, I think, an office in Bombay and the evidence as to his living and conduct in India is within a very narrow compass. It would seem that, in February 1927, he had been expecting to go to Europe either to London or Berlin to settle about one of his agencies. He expected that this arrangement would take a substantial time. He thought it that would be a year or more before he could come back to India, in any event, and he wanted his wife to go back with him, but she was unwilling. In these circumstances, he brings his petition for divorce on the ground of adultery and he asks for damages against the co-respondent.

The first question that arises for decision in this case is whether or not this is a case in which the Courts in British India have any right to give a decree for dissolution of marriage. Upon the face of the amendment made in 1926 to S. 2, Divorce Act, nothing in the Divorce Act authorizes any Court to make a decree for dissolution of marriage, except where the parties to the marriage are domiciled in India at the time when the petition is presented. There appears to be a certain amount of confusion upon the subject. It seems to me necessary to point out that domicile in India at the time of the presentation of the petition is an absolutely necessary condition of jurisdiction so far as regards divorce. We are in no way concerned whether or not a person not domiciled India is put to hardship for lack of facilities in obtaining divorce from British Indian Courts. It is manifest that, so long as the matrimonial laws of different countries vary widely, as they do, it is necessary that for every marriage there should be an ascertainable forum for the purpose of adjudicating upon the question of divorce. All countries do not take same view of international law. But the view of international law which obtains in England and in these Courts is that the power to grant divorce rests with the Court of the country in which the parties are domiciled at the date of the petition. Other countries may take different views of international law in that respect. But it is well settled now that that is the view upon which the English law proceeds and that view, for all purposes of this Court, is the law without exception or qualification by the command of the Indian Legislature.

Now, there are two parties to every marriage and the domicile of the parties, in practice, means the domicile of the husband. This is a rule of law which may or may not be subject to exception. But it is evident that the rule that the wife's domicile follows that of the husband would be nearer to the actual fact than any other rule and it is necessary that one Court should be found which has jurisdiction over both the parties for the purpose of divorce. In these circumstances, it is very plain to me that this rule that the Courts will not, under the Divorce Act, entertain any application for divorce except it be first proved affirmatively to its satisfaction that the parties are domiciled in India is a rule which should never be departed from. I protest altogether against the doctrine which was urged before the learned Judge of the trial Court in this case and before us that, if the Court finds that the parties are of ambiguous domicile or nationality the Court will proceed to interfere with the domestic status of persons who are not domiciled in India. Any decree given by an Indian Court in respect of people who are not domiciled in India is a decree which, in the view of international law which this Court entertains, can be disregarded altogether in the country of the parties' domicile. To make orders which will effect that persons who in the country of their domicile are married are in India strangers is a most serious step and it is idle to talk of justice in connexion with any invitation to make orders of that sort. The main features of such an order would plainly be disorderly confusion of inheritance and rights on the part of the foreigners. The consequence would be that over the face of Europe the decrees of the Indian Courts would have to be regarded as nullities. I cannot, therefore, approve of the language in which the learned Judge has expressed his conclusion upon this question.

It appears to me that we have to find, as a fact, cold hard fact—one way or the other whether, in this case, the domicile of the husband at the time of the presentation of the petition is shown to have been in India. The learned Judge has stated that he is very dubious as to whether he ought to hold that the petitioner is domiciled in this country at all. He has said that the facts upon which he is asked to infer that the petitioner is possessed of Indian domicile are very slender indeed. He has said that he is disposed to take a somewhat lenient view of the evidence of the petitioner with regard to his intentions in the matter and that, in order to do justice in the matter, he feels that he ought to accept what the petitioner has said. He confesses that he is probably stretching the point in the petitioner's favour; but he says that, having regard to all circumstances in this case, it is right that he should take that view of the matter, and, accordingly, in order to conclude the point, he finds as a fact upon the evidence of the petitioner that he is domiciled in India. Upon this finding, both the parties, the co-respondent and the petitioner have, as it seems to me, a certain grievance. Mr. Westmacott for the co-respondent says that the learned Judge has found against his client, though it is evident from the judgment that the learned Judge has no great belief that this petitioner was domiciled in India. In like manner, the petitioner has, I think, a grievance in that, though the learned Judge believed his evidence as to his intentions, he expressed no great firmness in that belief. I collect from the learned Judge's judgment that generally speaking he regarded the evidence of the petitioner as worthy of credence and with that I go to the evidence to see whether, in my judgment, there is enough to entitle this Court to hold that, in January 1928, this man was domiciled in India.

It appears that this man was originally a Pole. He had been taken to Germany when very young. As a young man, he had gone to England and, after travelling in various parts, he, subsequently to his marriage, lived for several years in New Zealand. His prospects in New Zealand having ceased, he comes back to Berlin and there apparently he takes steps to get business connexions, upon the strength of which he could go somewhere else with regard to the export of German manufactures. He had never been in India in his life, nor had his wife either. He had no friends in Bombay, Calcutta or anywhere in India. He had a chance in this respect that he had an agreement for one year for the sale of German typewriters. Apparently, he had another agreement which has not been properly proved of an equally temporary character in connexion with Swedish motors. There appears to have been no office of either of these concerns in India. It was his business to do what he could to open agencies. He went about and, so far as we know, he opened agencies in Kashmir, Delhi, Calcutta, Bombay and, I think, Lucknow. One would naturally suppose that this man had come to India to see if he could make a living and that in coming to India, he had no occasion to make up his mind as to whether he would live and die in India. Like a large number of people, who come from parts of Europe he had to make his living and he proposed at the time to do so in India.

Before considering whether his domicile was changed or not, we have to see what is meant by change of domicile. In my judgment, we may take all the law that is required on this point from the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Winans v. Attorney-General (1). There can be no doubt that the whole burden of proving that the petitioner had made up his mind to come to India and treat it as his ultimate and permanent home is on him. As was pointed out in the case to which I have referred, it was necessary for him to satisfy the Court that he had a fixed and certain purpose.

"A change of domicile is a serious matter—serious enough when the competition is between two domicils both within the ambit of one and the same kingdom or country—more serious still when one of the two is altogether foreign. The change may involve far-reaching consequences in regard to succession and distribution and other things which depend on domicile."

The question has been put in the language of Lord Cairns in this way:

"Whether the person whose domicile was in question had 'determined' to make, and had, in fact, made the alleged domicile of choice 'his home with the intention of establishing himself and his family there, and ending his days in that country.'"

In other words we have to ask whether the petitioner has satisfied us that he had not come to India to be a Pole or German making his living, but that he intended to come to British India to be domiciled there as being a person whose ultimate and permanent home was to be in India. In my judgment, the evidence in this case falls far short of what is required. We have here a husband who is anxious, I do not doubt, to obtain a decree for divorce and very anxious, it is plain, to obtain reparation from the correspondent at the hand of the Court. In both these matters, the guilty wife is in agreement and her interest coincides with his. The evidence that they bring forward to induce this Court to believe that the petitioner was making India his permanent home consists mostly in saying "yes" when the words "permanent home" are put to them. They made the most unconvincing effort to explain the intention which they had arrived at when they set out for India. The case made is that, although they knew nothing of India, the man had read about India, that he was interested in Yoga philosophy, that his own country Poland or Germany had not seen much of him and was of no great value to him as a place of residence, that he was seeking somewhere to make a permanent home and that before reaching India at all the petitioner decided that he was to be of Indian domicile. Accordingly, on this view, when he finally stepped on to the quay at Bombay, he became a person who was domiciled in India. It appears to me that the circumstance that they sold their house in Berlin and their furniture before they came out to India is small corroboration of so improbable a story. It appears to me that, on this evidence, the Court would find itself dispensing matrimonial justice to all sorts of people who have arrived in India very recently. It is most necessary in this case to find whether the story that the man's permanent home was to be in a country of which he knew nothing and in which he might be little successful is a story which is to be treated as proved by the evidence that these two highly interested parties have given to the Court. I cannot doubt that this is evidence which should be regarded as altogether insufficient. I think the petitioner may possibly have deceived himself into thinking that his intentions were different from what they really were. But I do not believe this story that he came to India with a fixed and settled resolution to be of Indian domicile so that his domicile of origin had been departed from the moment he arrived in India. Most unfortunately, he had hardly set foot in India before he suffered the very serious wrong with which we are now concerned. It appears that, in the beginning of 1927—within a couple of months of his arrival in this country—his wife was committing adultery with the co-respondent. It does not appear to me that throughout the year 1927 anything happened which strengthens his case to the effect that he had become of Indian domicile.

Stress has been laid upon certain words in a letter which has been put forward as showing the agreement between the owners of the typewriters and the petitioner where it is stated "when he emigrates (or removes) himself to British India"—the German words being "wenn sie nach British India übersiedeln." It does not seem to me that that adds very much to the evidence in this case. I come to the conclusion that this evidence critically looked at is not sufficient to entitle this Court to proceed to deal with the personal status of these parties on the basis that their domestic arrangements in the matter of divorce are subject to the jurisdiction of this Court.

The next question which arises is whether, if that be so, this petition can be allowed to stand as a petition for damages against the co-respondent under S. 34, Divorce Act. Now, cases have been cited to us, particularly the well known case of Bernstein v. Bernstein (2) to show that, in an ordinary case where the English Court has jurisdiction—if the petitioner fails to make good his right to a decree for divorce, he will not be allowed to recover damages from the co-respondent. The explanation of the clauses of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 given by Lord Justice Lopes and other authorities makes it clear that the right to damages is a right which is subject to the same defences as the right to other matrimonial reliefs. In other words, if there has been condonation or connivance or collusion, the right to damages would be defeated equally with the right to a decree for divorce or judicial separation. So much seems to me clear and, in this country, we have an express direction that we are to act and give reliefs on principles and rules conformable to those of the English Divorce Act.

It is said, however, that the English cases oblige us to hold that this petition as a petition for damages must be dismissed, if by reason of lack of jurisdiction we are unable to grant a decree for divorce. That seems to me to be an entirely different proposition and I am not of opinion that there is any authority for it or that it is correct. If by reason of the death of the wife between the decree nisi and the decree absolute no ultimate decree for divorce can be given, it has been decided Mon-sell v. Monsell (3) that nevertheless the judgment for damages may take effect. There can be no doubt that the causes of action to use the common law expression against the co-respondent for damages and against the wife for divorce are different and distinct, although, upon a true construction of the Divorce Act, the same defences are open to these claims. But I am not of opinion, in view of the plain terms of S. 34, which says that the husband may claim damages in a petition limited to such object only, that it can be right in a case of this character to say that, because the Court has no jurisdiction to grant a decree for divorce, it cannot treat this petition as a petition for damages alone and award damages upon it. It is quite clear, however, that the damages suffered by the petitioner will be different according as he is getting a decree for divorce or is not to get a decree for divorce. It is quite clear that, upon this basis, the question of damages must be reviewed and has to be regarded upon other facts. It will be necessary no doubt to take account of the real position of the petitioner in view of the finding that this Court has no jurisdiction to grant him a decree for divorce.

So far, I have not said anything about one of the defences taken by the co-respondent—the appellant before us—I mean the defence that, in this case, there has been collusion between the petitioner and the respondent. I have no doubt that, if there has been collusion that is an equally good answer to the claim for damages as to the other form of relief; and, in this Court Mr. Westmacott for the co-respondent, has argued that there is evidence of collusion which disentitles the petitioner to get any relief at all. He has relied not so much upon any suggestion that this petition was brought or initiated under or by virtue of any agreement between the petitioner and his wife, or upon any suggestion of the adultery being caused or induced by any connivance on the part of the husband, but upon certain matters which took place in the course of the prosecution of this suit. He says that counsel for the petitioner knew that the solicitors for the respondent had subpoenaed the co-respondent. He says that the petitioner only called himself and the caretaker of the Galstaun Mansions evidently relying upon the wife's evidence to prove the fact of adultery. He says that, in the wife's answers, there are some irrelevant matters volunteered with the sole object of assisting the petitioner—such as the fact she was pregnant by the co-respondent. He says too that in the wife's answers there is an endeavour to prove the case against the co-respondent. He has applied to us to let him introduce additional evidence upon this point, because he says that, in the bills of costs which have been rendered by the attorneys, it can be seen that the wife's attorneys were furnishing certain documents to the husband's attorneys—documents showing that the co-respondent was guilty of adultery on other occasions; and it is said that, in these bills of costs, one would find other suspicious matters, namely, the fact, amongst others, that the petitioner, before he had taken a copy of the co-respondent's answer, was asking for an early date to be fixed for the hearing of the case. We have to consider whether or not this is a case in which we ought to refuse all reliefs to the petitioner on the ground that collusion between the petitioner and the respondent has been made out. Here, again, if I were satisfied that collusion between the petitioner and the respondent had been made out I would regard it as my clear duty to refuse all relief to the petitioner. But I am not of opinion that this is a case in which there has been more than a certain amount of purely mechanical assistance given by one set of advisers to another. I do not think that it vitiates all the proceedings because the attorneys for the wife gave the attorneys for the husband copies of certain documents which they had got. I think that the fact that the learned counsel got to know that the attorneys for the wife subpoenaed the co-respondent is a very narrow ground for supposing that any collusion had taken place.

Having examined carefully each of the grounds set forth as evidence of collusion by Mr. Westmacott, I can only say that, in my opinion, they fall far short of proving any open or secret agreement between the husband and the wife. I quite agree that collusion may be sufficient if it is collusion in prosecution of a perfectly true case. I do not think it necessary here to examine the authorities which have been brought to our notice, because I am not of opinion that this judgment can be based upon any view of the law to the effect that, if the case is true, collusion does not matter: Churchward v. Churchward (4). I am quite satisfied that there might be collusion in the mere prosecution as distinct from the initiation of a true case; but I am not of opinion that mere furnishing of documents or, as in Harris v. Harris (5), mere furnishing of photographs or that kind of small assistance between the attorneys does amount to collusion in the sense with which we are concerned. I see nothing in this case which is contrary to good faith. I see nothing which appears to me to take the colour of an attempt to concert a case and put it forward before the Court. I am, therefore, of opinion, looking at the facts of this particular case that the word "co-operation" used in the learned Judge's judgment is too strong (as the learned Judge himself appears to have thought) and the learned Judge's finding that there was no collusion is one which should be supported. It is quite true that in this case both the parties the husband and the wife had the same interest. Both desired to get a divorce. Both desired that the co-respondent should be made to pay heavily, if possible, for his conduct. That common object would not justify collusion between the parties. But it is very necessary in such a case as this to be careful before imputing collusion between the parties from ordinary acts which a solicitor would naturally regard as inoffensive and unobjectionable.

The next question which arises is whether this petition for divorce is to be amended by asking for damages alone or by asking for judicial separation and damages. As to that, I propose that both the husband and the wife shall be given time to consider the position. We are not going to ask them to make any decision as to this on this afternoon or even tomorrow. This decree will not be drawn up until they have had at least a fortnight from to-day to consider the position. Subject to that the result of this judgment is that the question of damages must be gone into over again. It will not be necessary to take evidence over again, but it will not be right that this question should be entered into again until it is known whether these parties are or are not going to be separated. I do not think it will be fair to the learned Judge who tried this case or to either of the parties that the question of damages which has been dealt with by the trial Judge on one hypothesis should go back to him to be dealt with by him again on another. This case should, in my opinion, be sent back to the original side to another Judge to assess the damages against the co-respondent in the light of the present position. The learned Judge who will now deal with this matter will deal with it completely independently of the findings of the learned trial Judge. He is given power to take further evidence on any point, if he thinks it desirable.

As regards the costs of this appeal, I am of opinion that each party must pay its own costs. The order of the Court below as regards the costs of the trial will stand.

The sum of Rs. 12,500 which has been paid in Court by the co-respondent will remain in Court, subject to his right to withdraw it on giving security to the satisfaction of the Registrar.

Page, J.—I agree. As we are differing from the decision of the learned trial Judge, and having regard to the arguments that have been presented to us, I desire to add a few words upon the issue of jurisdiction.

It is not pretended that the domicile of origin of the parties was in India. Now, Lord Lindley in Winans v. Attorney-General (1) observed :

"I take it to be clearly settled by the Landerdale Peerage Case (6), Udny v. Udny (7), Bell v. Kennedy (8) that the burden of proof in all inquiries of this nature lies upon those who assert that a domicile of origin has been lost, and that some other domicile has been acquired. Further, I take it to be clearly settled that no person who is sui juris can change his domicile without a physical change of place, coupled with an intention to adopt the place to which he goes as his home or fixed abode or permanent residence, whichever expression may be preferred. If a change of residence is proved, the intention necessary to establish a change of domicile is an intention to adopt the second residence as home, or, in other words, an intention to remain without any intention of further change except possibly for some temporary purpose."

Lord Macnaghten in the same case, stated that :

"such an intention, I think, is not to be inferred from an attitude of indifference or a disinclination to move increasing with increasing years, least of all from the absence of any manifestation of intention one way or the other. It must be, to quote Lord Westbury again, "a fixed and settled purpose," "And" says his Lordship [1863] 1 H. L. Sc. 321 "unless you are able to shew that with perfect clearness and satisfaction to yourselves, it follows that the domicile of origin continues." So heavy is the burden cast upon those who seek to shew that the domicile of origin has been superseded by a domicile of choice ?"

Now, in my opinion the evidence in this case is inconsistent with the existence of an intention on the petitioner's part at the time when he presented the petition, to reside and establish himself in India for the rest of his days. Indeed, to my mind, the reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that the petitioner had come to India to earn a living, and intended to remain in India so long as an opportunity to obtain a livelihood in this country was open to him; that he had formed no intention to settle in any one place rather than in another, and that he realised that his movements in the future might well be as uncertain as his wanderings in the past.

On the issue of collusion I would add that the object which the legislature had in mind in insisting that there should be no collusion between the parties to a matrimonial petition was :

"to compel the parties to come into the Court of divorce with clean hands. It is to oblige them to bring all material and pertinent facts to the notice of the Court, to prevent their blinding the eyes of the Court in any respect; to oblige them so to act as enable the Court to be in a position to do justice between the parties Butler v. Butler (9), per Lopes, L. J."

In my opinion, having regard to the authorities, the evidence in this case does not disclose such facts as would have disentitled the petitioner to a decree for divorce on the ground of collusion of the Court has jurisdiction to grant him such relief.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for a declaration of title and confirmation of possession and in the alternative for recovery of possession. The plaintiff's case briefly was that he had purchased this land from defendant 3 by a kobala dated 16th September 1923 and after his purchase he had been receiving rent from defendant 4 who was actually in possession of the house and was his tenant. But since then defendant 1 had induced defendant 4 to pay rent to him. Defendant 1 who contested the suit contended that he had purchased the property from defendant 2 and that defendant 2 derived his title under a deed of gift of the property executed in his favour by defendant 3. The trial Court held that there had been a valid deed of gift by defendant 3 to defendant 2 and therefore as defendant 3 had at the time of the plaintiff's purchase no title to the property the plaintiff had acquired no title to the property by his purchase from her; so he dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff appealed to the District Court. The learned Subordinate Judge who heard the appeal would seem to have come to the finding that defendant 3 never really executed a deed of gift in favour of defendant 2. He would seem to find that defendant 3 when she executed this document was under the impression that she was executing a power-of-attorney and that she did not realize that what she was executing was a deed of gift. He held that the document was taken by misrepresentation and undue influence and that defendant 2 had practically practised fraud, misrepresentation and undue influence on defendant 3 in getting the deed of gift executed whereas she intended to execute a general power-of-attorney. One would perhaps think that these findings were sufficient to dispose of the case even though perhaps the findings of undue influence, fraud and misrepresentation were somewhat contradictory. The learned Subordinate Judge, however, goes on further to find that as there was no acceptance of the gift the gift was void. This finding is perhaps unnecessary in view of what he has already found. He goes on further to find somewhat unnecessarily that the gift being a conditional one and the donee not having performed the condition when defendant 3 has subsequently sold the land to the plaintiff she has evidently revoked the gift.

Mr. Pal who appears for the appellant has first of all contended that the suit was barred by limitation. He contends that the period of limitation applicable to the present suit is as provided in Art. 91, Lim. Act. The plaintiff, he contends, cannot succeed in his suit unless he first of all sets aside the deed of gift and as the deed was executed more than three years before the institution of the suit. The suit was out of time. In support of his contention the learned vakil relies upon the case of Harihar Ojha v. Dasarathai Misra (1) with special reference to the remark of Woodroffe, J., at pp. 265 and 266 where the learned Judge states as follows :

"There can be no doubt that when a person seeks to recover property against an instrument executed by himself or one under whom he claims he must first obtain the cancellation of the instrument, and that the three years' rule enacted by Art. 91 applies to any suit brought by such person. The reason why a party seeking to recover property against his own instrument must show that it is voidable or void, as for instance for fraud, is that, as long as an instrument creating a later title is valid his former title cannot prevail."

Mr. Pal argues on the strength of this decision that the plaintiff's suit must fail. No doubt this decision lends considerable support to the contention of the learned vakil. As a matter of fact, however, the decision of that particular point which I have just referred to was not necessary, as far as can be seen, for the decision of that particular case; and therefore to that extent the decision must be considered as obiter. On the other hand the case of Sanni Bibi v. Siddik Husain (2) a decision directly in point, it has been held that when it is established that the plaintiff by defendant's misrepresentation was induced to execute a deed of sale believing the same to have been a deed of a different kind the transaction is void and not voidable only, and Art. 91, Lim. Act has no application to his suit to recover the property. It will be seen that that decision is directly in point, because in this case the plaintiff sues as the transferee of defendant 3 and stands in her shoes. Defendant 3 was induced by the misrepresentation of defendant 2 to execute a deed of a different kind to what she thought she was executing. It has been found that she thought that she was executing a power-of-attorney when she was really executing a deed of gift. A further support to the case of the respondent would be found in the case Petherpermal Chetty v. Muniandy Servai (3) a decision of the Privy Council. On p. 559 of the report Lord Atkinson in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee remarks :

(1) [1905] 88 Cal. 257=1 C. L. J. 408=9 C. W. N. 686.

(2) [1919] 28 C. W. N. 93=49 I. C. 76=29 C. L. J. 55.

"As to the point raised on the Limitation Act 1877, their Lordships are of opinion that the conveyance of 11th June 1895, being an inoperative instrument, as in effect, it has been found to be, does not bar the plaintiff's right to recover possession of his land and that it is unnecessary for him to have it set aside as a preliminary to his obtaining the relief he claims."

If I understand this decision the Judicial Committee held that where the instrument was inoperative it was not necessary to set it aside as a preliminary to his obtaining a decree for possession. The document before us is obviously an inoperative instrument. It purports to be a deed of gift whereas it is really nothing of the sort, because the person who executed it was under the impression that she was executing not a deed of gift but a power-of-attorney. The same principle has been laid down by the Bombay High Court in the case of Narsagounda v. Chawagounda (4) with special reference to p. 657 a decision of the Full Bench which follows the Privy Council case already referred to reported in (1). This point, therefore, seems to be concluded by authorities, and must be decided against the appellant.

The next point argued on behalf of the appellant is that the plaintiff should not be allowed to make a case different from the case set out in his kobala. In the kobala under which the plaintiff claims certain references were made to the deed of gift and the plaintiff or rather his vendor there apparently gave a different version about this deed of gift. The appellant contends that it is not open to the plaintiff to make out any different case whatever in the plaint. Whether the case made in the plaint differs materially from the case made in the kobala is not necessary to be determined. It is obviously open to the plaintiff to make out any case that he chooses in the plaint. The fact that the case made in the plaint does or does not differ from the case as would appear in the document on which he relies would obviously be a point to be taken into consideration by the Court in considering the truth or falsity of the plaintiff's case. But there is nothing to prevent him from making out any case he wishes to make. Whether he could substantiate it is quite another question.

The next point urged by Mr. Pal is that the plaintiff is now estopped from saying that there is no legally valid gift and that defendant 3 did not execute a deed of gift, because, he states, that the plaintiff in his kobala referred to the deed of gift and therefore it is not open to him now to say that defendant 3 never executed any deed of gift. I entirely fail to understand how this statement in the plaintiff's kobala that defendant 3 executed a deed of gift can in any way stop the plaintiff from saying that there is no deed of gift. It has not been shown to us, nor was it ever alleged before the case came up here in second appeal that defendants 1 and 2 were in any way influenced or misled by the statement in the kobala. In fact there is no suggestion defendants 1 and 2 ever saw the statement in the kobala before defendant 1 purchased the property from defendant 2. The only suggestion made by the learned vakil for the appellant is that they might have seen it. Clearly that is not sufficient to create an estoppel.

The appellant has lastly contended that the learned Judge in the Court of appeal below was wrong in saying that :

"under the circumstances no presumption of defendant 2's possession can be based upon it (the Record-of-Rights)."

Now it appears that in the Record-of-Rights one plot is shown in the possession of defendant 2 and the other plot is shown in the possession of the landlord. It was no doubt the case of defendant 1 that defendant 2 was in possession of both the plots. There is no doubt that the Record-of-Rights raises a presumption in favour of defendant 2 so far as regards the one plot which has been recorded as in the possession of defendant 2. Defendant 1 no doubt has challenged the correctness of the Record-of-Rights so far as regards the other plot recorded in the name of the landlord, but for that reason it cannot be said that no presumption arises in favour of defendant 2 in respect of the other plot which has been recorded in his name the correctness of which has not been challenged by defendant 1. It is not the whole Record-of-Rights but each entry of the Record-of-Rights with respect to which the presumption of correctness arises. The words used in S. 103-B, Ben. Ten. Act are :

"Every entry in a Record-of-Rights so published shall be evidence of the matter referred to in such entry and shall be presumed to be correct."

What is presumed to be correct is each entry and not the whole Record-of-Rights. In this respect no doubt the learned Subordinate Judge has fallen into an error. I do not think, however, that for this reason alone we should send back the case to him for a consideration of the question of possession after taking a proper view of the presumption as regards the entry in the Record-of-Rights, for the learned Subordinate Judge seems to have gone into this question of possession of defendant 2 independently of the Record-of-Rights and have found on the evidence that defendant 3 had been in possession all along. He has found that :

"the evidence leaves no room for doubt that defendant 3 was all along living in the house and also admittedly was in possession after the execution of the deed."

I do not therefore think that it is necessary to send the case back to the learned Subordinate Judge for abiding on the question of possession.

The result is the appeal must fail and is dismissed with costs.

B. B. Ghose, J.—The facts of the case giving rise to this reference are these: One Bainuddin mortgaged a plot of land to defendant 1 in 1904. In 1908 he again mortgaged this piece of land with another plot (No. 2 in the schedule of the plaint) to the plaintiff. Defendant 1 (who will be referred to as the defendant) brought his suit on his mortgage in 1911 without impleading the plaintiff and obtained a decree for sale against the mortgagor alone on 30th November 1911. Plaintiff brought a suit to enforce his mortgage in 1915. He made the present defendant a defendant in the suit along with the mortgagor and a transferee from him. The defendant set up his prior mortgage and plaintiff's suit as against him was dismissed as the plaintiff did not ask for any decree against him. Plaintiff obtained the usual decree for sale as against the other defendants in that suit on 8th May 1915. Defendant in this case put the property mortgaged to him to sale in execution of his mortgage decree and purchased it himself on 15th August 1916, and obtained possession.

Plaintiff afterwards executed his decree and purchased both the mortgaged properties on 19th November 1920 but obtained possession only of plot 2. Plaintiff brought the suit out of which the appeal to this Court arose on 17th July 1925 for redemption of plot 1 of the plaint on payment of the mortgage money due on the mortgage of defendant and for possession. Defendant 2 is a brother of defendant 1 and defendant 3 is said to be a tenant under the other defendants. These two may be left out of consideration.

Various points were raised in defence by the written statement of the first two defendants. Defendant 3 did not appear. All the Courts have thrown out the suit on the ground that it is barred by limitation, and this question has caused the reference to the Full Bench.

All the three Courts concurred in holding that the suit was barred under Art. 132, Lim. Act, purporting to follow a decision of this Court in Nidhiram v. Sarbeswar (1). The questions referred to the Full Bench are:

- (1) Whether Art. 132 applies to this case;
- (2) Whether Nidhiram's case was rightly decided;
- (3) Whether the suit is barred by limitation.

I think it necessary to make some preliminary observations as to the rights of the parties under the circumstances stated above. It seems to have been suggested that plaintiff's right has been affected in some manner as he did not redeem the defendant when he brought this suit. Under O. 34, R. 1, Civil P. C. a puisne mortgagee may sue for sale without making a prior mortgagee a party to the suit. No doubt if he seeks to redeem a prior mortgagee in his suit for sale he may make the prior mortgagee a party and a complete decree may then be made as in Form No. 8, Appendix D, Civil P. C. But if a person is joined as a defendant for enforcement of the right on a mortgage he should be dismissed from the action as soon as he sets up a prior title: see Nilakant v. Suresh (2). The fact that plaintiff's suit on his mortgage was dismissed as against defendant does not affect his right of redemption if it is not extinguished in any other manner.

When a puisne mortgagee is not made a party to a suit by the first mortgagee.

(1) [1910] 14 C. W. N. 439=5 I. C. 877.

(2) [1885] 12 Cal. 415=12 I. A. 171=4 Sar. 685 (P.C.).

his rights are not affected by the decree or sale thereunder, and the puisne mortgagee has still the right to redeem the prior mortgage: Ram Narain v. Bandi (3). He may notwithstanding the prior decree bring a suit on his mortgage: Debendra v. Ram Taran (4). The rights of rival purchasers when the first mortgagee brings his suit without impleading the puisne mortgagee, obtains a decree against the mortgagor only and purchases the property himself and the mortgaged property is sold a second time at the instance of the puisne mortgagee and purchased by himself were considered in the case of Gopee Bandhu v. Ka'leepulo Banerjee (5). The purchaser under the first decree purchases the outstanding interest of the mortgagor only and the puisne mortgagee's rights are not affected in any way. It should be noted that in the present case the puisne mortgagee seeks to redeem as the purchaser of the equity of redemption and the suit of the plaintiff as against the mortgagor was properly constituted, for when he brought his suit the equity of redemption of the mortgagor had not passed away from him. There can be no question that the plaintiff would have the right to redeem if his suit is not barred by limitation.

Now I shall consider the question as to which article of the Limitation Act is applicable to this suit for redemption. Plaintiff's suit has been dismissed on the ground that Art. 132 of the Act is applicable to this case. That article refers to a suit 'to enforce payment of money charged upon immovable property.' In my judgment by no straining of language can a suit for redemption fall under that article, as it is not a suit to enforce payment of money. The special article applicable to a suit for redemption is Art. 148, which gives 60 years as the period from the date when the right to redeem accrues. In this case the due date under the first mortgagee's bond is not in evidence but the suit was brought within 60 years of the date of the mortgage. So if this article is applicable there is no question that the suit is within time and is not barred by limitation.

But it is said that the case of Nidhiram v. Sarbeswar (1) is authority for the proposition that Art. 132 applies to this case. It seems to me that if the facts of that case are properly analyzed it would appear that the learned Judges did not profess to lay down any such rule. There the suit on the first mortgage was brought on 28th March 1892 and the sale at which the mortgagee purchased was held on 21st March 1893. The puisne mortgagee was not made a party to the suit. The first mortgagee sold his interest to another person on 14th July 1893. The puisne mortgagee then brought his suit on 6th November 1894, that is to say, after the proceedings in the suit on the prior mortgage had been brought to an end, and himself purchased the property at the sale on 20th July 1895, without making the previous purchasers a party to the suit. In the result the owner of the equity of redemption not being impleaded the only right that was transferred by the decree on the puisne mortgagee and the sale thereunder was the right under the plaintiff's own mortgage. The second mortgagee could no doubt bring a fresh suit against the owners of the equity of redemption to enforce his mortgage within the period of limitation, which suit would be governed by Art. 132, Limitation Act. But he did not do so. He brought a suit after his right to enforce his mortgage was barred, for a declaration of his right to redeem the prior mortgage. The question which the learned Judges were asked to consider was, whether

"the time within which the second mortgagee who has purchased the property in execution of a decree in a suit subsequently brought by him, to enforce his mortgage, or as in this case, his transferee, has to bring a suit, commences to run from the due date of the mortgage debt or from the date of his purchase."

They held, and in my opinion rightly that limitation to enforce his mortgage would run from the due date on the mortgage. The learned Judges proceed to say:

"The second mortgagee, by his purchase at the sale in satisfaction of his mortgage debt cannot acquire any right of redemption which he had not as mortgagee."

I think what they meant was, as the right to enforce the puisne mortgage was barred by limitation, the transferee from the mortgagee had no right in the property to enable him to redeem the prior mortgage. The same observation was made by the learned Chief Justice in his order of reference, with which I fully agree. It is unfortunate that the language used by the learned Judges in Nidhiram's case (1) lends itself to misconstruction if dissociated from the facts of the case. But I think they never meant to lay down a rule of limitation for an action to redeem which is not warranted by the provisions of the Limitation Act. It seems to me what they intended to say was that the plaintiff had no subsisting right to redeem.

I do not consider it necessary to elaborate the discussion but it seems to me whenever a suit for redemption is brought by a person entitled to redeem against a mortgagee Art. 148, Lim. Act, and no other article applies to it.

I have now only to refer to Fisher on Mortgages (para. 1448) cited by the learned Judge who first tried the case in second appeal. The learned Chief Justice has pointed out the reason why in England the mortgagor is a necessary party to a suit by a puisne mortgagee to redeem the prior mortgagee. The cases cited in Fisher show that the reason of the rule that if a puisne mortgagee seeks to redeem he must foreclose all subordinate rights including the ultimate equity of redemption, is that the right to redeem of those persons would otherwise remain open, thus exposing the prior mortgagee to another suit. Where, as in this case, the puisne mortgagee has already obtained a decree on his mortgage, he is entitled to redeem a prior mortgage in a subsequent suit. The law in England is thus stated in Fisher on Mortgages para. 1693.

"The second or other puisne mortgagee may foreclose those subsequent without joining those prior to themselves, for the latter can suffer no damage. The subsequent mortgagees, it is true, are left without the opportunity of redeeming all prior to them in the same suit."

The answers I propose to the questions put to us are :

(1) No. Art. 148 is applicable.

(2) Nidhiram's case (1) was rightly decided on its facts. If, however, it is supposed that it was decided in that case that a suit for redemption such as this is governed by Art. 132, then it was wrongly decided.

(3) The suit is not barred by limitation.

The case has been referred to this Bench for final decision. But the suit having been dismissed on the ground of limitation the other issues raised in the case have not been decided by the Courts below, and no other question was argued before us. None of the parties, however, examined any witness at the trial. The questions therefore which now require decision are covered by issues 4 and 5 and the case should be remitted to the trial Court for decision of those issues. Reference may be made to the cases of Umesh Chander v. Zahur Fatima (6), Sukhi v. Safdar Ghulam (7), Jnanendra v. Shorashi Charan (8), regarding the rights of the parties subsisting under their respective mortgages.

The defendant has claimed to redeem the plaintiff in his turn and his right to redeem the plaintiff would depend on the question as to the preferential right to the equity of redemption under the respective sales held under the decrees obtained by the parties on their mortgages. In deciding that question reference may be made to the following cases : Gopee Bandhu v. Kaleepada (5) Dirgopal v. Bolaki (9), Ram Narain v. Bandi (3). If the defendant is held entitled to redeem he would be able to do so on payment of a proportionate part of the mortgage money chargeable on plot 1, as the plaintiff has himself purchased a portion of the property under his mortgage viz, plot 2. It would then be necessary to take evidence as to the respective value of the two plots. The case should be finally determined by the trial Court after taking into consideration all the circumstances.

The appellant must get his costs of the second appeal to this Court, of the Letters Patent Appeal and of this Reference.

Appeal No. 982 of 1927, Decided on 4th June 1929, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, 2nd Court, Hooghly, D/- 12th January 1927.

(a) Religious Endowment—Alienation by mohant—Permanent lease is not binding on successors unless for necessity.

It is beyond the power of a mohant of an endowment to create a new and fixed rent for all time, though adequate at the time, in lieu of giving the benefit of an augmentation of a variable rent from time to time unless there is some special circumstance of necessity justifying the permanent lease. Such an act is a breach of duty in the mohant and is void as against succeeding mohants: 36 Cal. 1003 (P. C.), Foll.; A. I. R. 1922 P. C. 123, Ref. [P 613 C 2]

(b) Religious Endowment—Alienation by mohant—Benefit for estate is synonymous with necessity.

The words "for the benefit of the estate" should be construed in a sense almost synonymous with necessity and that they mean something which is necessary for the protection and preservation of the estate: A. I. R. 1922 P. C. 123 (P. C.) and 36 Cal. 1003 (P. C.), Foll. [P 612 C 2, P 613 C 1]

Graham, J.—This appeal is by the defendant and arises out of a suit for specific performance of a contract. The land to which this contract related has an area of six cottahs situated at Chinsurah and was formerly in the possession of Madhusudan Das, Mohunt of Asthal, Burdwan. Plaintiff alleged that the mohunt leased out the land permanently to him on his paying a sum of Rs. 155 as selami and agreeing to pay rent at Rs. 11-8-0 per annum. Subsequently, a patta and a kabuliyat were executed but were not registered. In the meanwhile, the mohant died and was succeeded by the defendant Monohar Das Mohunt.

The defence to the suit was that the land was not the personal property of the former mohunt but that it was debuttar, that the defendant was not the successor and heir of the former mohunt, that, therefore, the suit did not lie against him, and that, inasmuch as the land was debuttar property and not personal property and contract for a permanent lease of the land was not binding upon the mohunt's successor. The trial Court held that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for specific performance and gave a decree accordingly, and that decree was affirmed on appeal by the learned Subordinate Judge of Hooghly.

The main contention which has been urged before us on behalf of the appellant is that the Court of appeal below was wrong in holding that a permanent lease was within the powers of mohunt if it was for the benefit of the estate, and it is argued that the real question is not whether there was benefit to the estate, but whether there was necessity. Reference has been made to the decision of Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the subject in the case of Abhiram Goswami v. Shyama Charan Nandi (1). Their Lordships of the Privy Council observed in that case:

"It is well settled law that the power of the mohant to alienate debuttar property is, like the power of the manager for an infant heir, limited to cases of unavoidable necessity."

Again, in the case of Vidya Varuthi Thirtha v. Balusami Ayyar (2), Ameer Ali, J., who delivered the judgment of the Court observed:

"According to the well settled law of India (apart from the question of necessity, which does not here arise) a mohant is incompetent to create any interest in respect of the mutt property to endure beyond his life."

There can be no doubt from these decisions, and other decisions to which reference has been made in the course of argument, that the words 'for the benefit of the estate' should really be construed in a sense almost synonymous with necessity, and that they mean some thing which is necessary for the protection or preservation of the estate. It certainly cannot be held on the facts of the present case that anything has been established to prove benefit of the estate in this sense. There is no evidence, for example, to show that the interest of the estate would not have been equally served by a lease which was something other than a permanent lease. In reply to this contention Mr. Mitter on behalf of the respondent has urged that the lease which was intended to be granted by the late mohant was not a permanent lease at all, and laid stress upon the fact that the word "mokorari" is nowhere to be found in the lease. But although that word is not to be found it seems to be clear, taking the patta and the kabuliyat together that the lease is a mokorari or permanent lease.

(1) [1903] 36 Cal. 1003=4 I. C. 419=36 I. A. 148 (P. C.).

It was next urged on behalf of the respondent that even if the lease was beyond the powers of the former mohant there was a ratification of it by the present mohant and that that being so the lease would enure at all events for the lifetime of the present incumbent of the office of mohant. There could not, however, be any ratification of a lease which was in itself void. It was also argued that the principle which should be applied is the principle of benefit to the estate, but, as I have already said, that expression must be interpreted in its special meaning and cannot be construed in such a manner as to cover any and every contract or lease which may bring some sort of financial benefit to the estate. In my judgment, the decision of the Court of appeal below cannot be supported and the appeal should be allowed and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs in all Courts. We further direct that the appellant do refund the sum of Rs. 155 which was paid by the respondent to the previous mohant.

Mitter, J.—I agree with my learned brother that this appeal should be allowed and the plaintiff's suit for specific performance dismissed with costs.

The question raised in this appeal is as to whether the contract entered into by the previous mohant of an endowment can be specifically enforced against his successor in shebaitship it not having been shown that the contract was entered into for the purpose of meeting unavoidable necessity. It appears that the previous mohant Madhusudan Das Mohant of Asthal, Burdwan, contracted to grant a permanent and mokorari lease to the present plaintiff after taking a certain premium and fixing a certain rental annually. He executed a patta and a corresponding kabuliyat was also executed by the plaintiff, but before these two documents could be registered he died and he was succeeded in his mohantship by the present appellant. The respondent consequently instituted the suit in which this present appeal arises for the purpose of specifically enforcing the contract entered into by Madhusudan with him to grant a permanent mokorari lease. It is now finally established on the authorities to some of which reference has been made by my learned brother that it is beyond the power of a mohant of an endowment "to create a new and fixed rent for all time, though adequate at the time, in lieu of giving the endowment the benefit of an augmentation of a variable rent from time to time."

Such an act has been held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Abhiram Goswami v. Shyama Charan Nandi (1) "to be a breach of duty in the mohant." Such an act is void as against a succeeding mohant and no Court would be justified in enforcing the specific performance of a contract which is illegal and void under the law. The illegality of a contract furnishes a good defence to a suit for specific performance. In the present case there is no allegation in the plaint showing that there were special circumstances of necessity in this case which would justify the grant of the mokorari patta which the predecessor-in interest of the present appellant intended to grant. In such circumstances, it will not be right for any Court to grant specific performance.

It has been argued on behalf of the respondent that there has been some profit to the estate and that is sufficient to justify the grant of the mokorari patta by the previous mohant and that such a mokorari patta, if executed, could undoubtedly be binding on his successor. There is no authority for this contention. All the cases in the books show that wherever a mokorari patta of a debuttar land has been upheld as against the successor of the shebait granting a patta it has been supported on the ground that it was granted in consideration of money said to be required either for the repair and completion of a temple, for which no other funds could be obtained or for the purpose which fell into the category of protecting of the estate from injury or deterioration. One of the earlier instances in which such a mokorari lease has been upheld was in the case of Doorga Nath Roy v. Ram Chunder Sen (3) which went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council where a mokorari patta of a debuttar lease was supported on the ground that money was required for the repair of the temple and that it was not possible to get money from other sources than by granting a permanent mokorari lease. Quite recently their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had to consider the circumstance under which a lease by the head of an endowment could be justified where the lease was granted for the purpose of benefiting the endowment. In the case of Palaniappa Chetty v. Deivasikamony Pandara (4), their Lordships of the Judicial Committee after stating that it was not possible to give a precise definition of the word "benefit" said this :

"The preservation, however, of the estate from extinction, the defence against hostile litigation affecting it, the protection of it or portions from injury or deterioration by inundation, these and such like things would obviously be benefits."

As I have already stated, there is not a single allegation in the plaint which would suggest that the mohant was under any necessity of granting this permanent mokorari patta depriving the Asthal of the benefit of an augmentation of a variable rent. The only fact on which the lower Courts have drawn the inference that the endowment has been benefited is that the debuttar estate has made a certain profit out of the alleged contract of the mohant. That, in my opinion, is wholly insufficient to justify the granting of the mokorari lease.

It has next been argued by the learned advocate for the respondent that even if this lease be regarded as binding on the present appellant still as he did ratify the intended lease on behalf of his predecessor-in-interest he is bound to execute the lease on behalf of his predecessor as his successor in the gadi. There is no substance in this contention, for, as has been pointed out by my learned brother, the lease is altogether void. It is wholly ineffective as against the successor and no question of ratification could possibly arise with reference to a void instrument. No authority has been shown and none can really be found where the question of ratification can arise where the instrument which is said to be ratified is void and not merely a voidable instrument. It seems to me that there has been no ratification at all for the present appellant never ratified. The ratification, if there was any, was by his guardian at the time when he was an infant and all that is alleged is that the guardian asked the present respondent to execute the kabuliyat in terms of the patta which was intended to be granted by the former mohant. I do not think the facts also lay any foundation for the ratification. It is argued that there was a new contract by the guardian of the appellant. Assuming there was this contract cannot be enforced against his ward, the appellant : see Mir Sarwanjan v. Fakruddin Mahomed (5) For these reasons, I agree with my learned brother in allowing the appeal.

pancy raiyat to pay a fair and equitable rent for the lands that he holds will accrue to a person who was in the position of an utbandi raiyat and has acquired a right of occupancy under the provisions of S. 180. [P 616 C 1, 2]

(b) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 24—Suit for rent at rate fixed by all utbandi tenants—Plaintiff cannot in appeal claim fair rent on the ground that tenants acquired occupancy rights.

Where the suit as originally framed is not one for recovery of rent under S. 24 but is a suit for recovery of rent at rates agreed upon by all utbandi tenants, plaintiffs cannot in appeal claim a decree for fair and equitable rent on the ground that the defendants by holding the lands for a continuous period of 12 years had acquired a right of occupancy therein and that they were consequently liable to pay a fair and equitable rent under S. 24, Ben. Ten. Act. [P 616 C 2]

Mukerji, J.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit for rent. The plaintiffs landlords are the appellants in the appeal. In order to appreciate the contentions that have been urged in the case, it is necessary to set out the pleadings somewhat in detail.

The plaintiffs instituted the suit for recovery of rent on the allegation that they were 12 annas 16 gandas cosharer landlords and that the defendants were holding certain lands under them in utbandi system. In the plaint, certain rates were mentioned as being the rates of rent payable by utbandi tenants in respect of different kinds of land and a decree for rent was prayed for on the footing that separate collections used to be made on behalf of the plaintiffs from those defendants. The main defence of the defendants was to the effect that some of the lands in suit were patit, khicha and asha lands, that no rent was payable for patit lands, that the rate for the khicha lands was 8 annas per bigha and that the rate for the asha lands was 6 pies per bigha. The trial Court held that the evidence that was produced on behalf of the plaintiffs for the purpose of establishing the rates at which they claimed rent in respect of the lands in suit was not satisfactory and, being of opinion that the defendants had succeeded in establishing that no rent was payable for the patit lands and that the rates for the khicha and the asha lands were what were stated in the written statement, the learned Munsiff gave the plaintiffs a decree on the defendants' admission. This decree was upheld on appeal by the learned Subordinate Judge and, on a second appeal being preferred to this Court, my learned brother Mitter, J. has affirmed that decision. The plaintiffs have thereupon preferred the present appeal under the Letters Patent.

Of the two grounds that have been urged in support of the appeal, one is to the effect that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for fair and equitable rent as against the defendants, inasmuch as the defendants by holding the lands for a continuous period of twelve years have acquired a right of occupancy and that, therefore, under the provisions of S. 24, Ben. Ten. Act, they are liable to pay a fair and equitable rent. This contention has been dealt with by my learned brother Mitter, J. as well as by the Courts below and has been held as being answered by the provisions of Ss. 180-A and 180-B, Ben. Ten. Act. It appears that the suit was not based upon an allegation to the effect that the plaintiffs were entitled to get fair and equitable rent from the defendants inasmuch as they were no longer utbandi tenants but had acquired a right of occupancy. Such a contention did not appear in the pleadings and it was only at the time of the argument in the trial Court that it was put forward. The Courts below, however, have dealt with this matter and, inasmuch as it has been argued before us, I may as well express my opinion upon it.

What is contended is that S. 180, Ben. Ten. Act states—and here I read only that part of the section which is relevant :

"notwithstanding anything in this Act a raiyat who in any part of the country where the custom of utbandi prevails holds land ordinarily let under that custom and for the time being let under that custom shall not acquire a right of occupancy until he has held the land in question for 12 continuous years and, until he acquires a right of occupancy in the land, he shall be liable to pay such rent for his holding as may be agreed on between him and his landlord."

It is contended that the section provides that an utbandi raiyat shall not acquire a right of occupancy until he has held the land in question for twelve continuous years and that it further provides that, until he acquires a right of occupancy in the land he shall be liable to pay such rent for his holding as may be agreed on between him and his landlords; and it is said that from this it follows, in the absence of any other provision in the Act, that, when a right of occupancy is acquired by a raiyat who had been an utbandi tenant, his status as well as all the other incidents of the tenancy are to be governed by those provisions of the Act which deal with occupancy raiyats. This in substance is the contention that is urged on behalf of the appellants and, in support of this, what is stated is that, prior to the amendment introduced by Act 10 (B. C.) of 1923 which for the first time inserted Ss. 180-A to 180-C in the Tenancy Act, there was no provision in the Act which could regulate the rent etc. in respect of utbandi raiyats who had acquired a right of occupancy. S. 180, it is said, limits the liability to pay the agreed rent until such time as the right of occupancy is acquired by an Utbandi raiyat.

Now, the Courts below appear to have been of the view that, inasmuch as S. 180-A provides for an application to be made for the fixing of uniform annual money rent in respect of utbandi lands either by the landlord or by the raiyat and inasmuch as S. 180-B says that whenever an order under S. 180-A is passed determining a uniform annual money rent for any lands such lands shall cease to be held as Utbandi lands with effect from the date from which the new rent takes effect and the tenant shall hold them as an occupancy raiyat from the date of the order, the effect of these provisions is to lay down that, although under S. 180 a right of occupancy may be acquired by an utbandi raiyat he is not liable to pay a uniform money rent or a fair and equitable rent until proceedings have been taken in accordance with the provisions of Ss. 180-A and 180-B of the Act. I am of opinion that this view is not sustainable. In my opinion, there is nothing in S. 180-A or 180-B which takes away the rights which are conferred by S. 180 upon an utbandi raiyat who has acquired a right of occupancy and, even if resort is not made to the provisions of Ss. 180-A and 180-B for the purpose of fixing a uniform annual money rent in respect of utbandi lands, the general liability of an occupancy raiyat to pay a fair and equitable rent for the lands that he holds will accrue to a person who was in the position of an utbandi raiyat and has acquired a right of occupancy under the provisions of S. 180. This view, however, would not help the appellants in the present case, inasmuch as the suit that they instituted was not one for recovery of rent in accordance with the provisions of S. 24, Ben. Ten. Act but a suit for recovery of rent at rates agreed upon by all utbandi tenants. To have a decree for rent at fair and equitable rates the plaintiffs will have to ask first of all for assessment of rent in a properly constituted suit with their co-sharers as parties. In view of the nature of the claim that they had put forward, the question whether they are entitled to recover a fair and equitable rent is a question which cannot arise in the present case. Although, therefore, I am not prepared to agree with the view that the Courts below have taken as regards Ss. 180-A and 180-B, Ben. Ten. Act, I am clearly of opinion that the decree that has been passed in the present case is correct.

Another argument has been put forward to the effect that, in the judgment of my learned brother Mitter, J. there is a passage indicating that the plaintiffs are not entitled to get any rent on account of the patit lands as it has been established that by custom such rent is not payable. It has been argued before us that there is no evidence of a custom properly so called and that the question as to whether there has been a custom to the above effect is a question which was not gone into in any of the Courts below. What appears, however, is that my learned brother Mitter, J. intended to mean that there was evidence to that effect and that it was proved by the plaintiffs' evidence that no rent was, in point of fact realized on account of the patit lands. I am of opinion, therefore that there is no substance in this contention.

The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Rankin, C. J.—I agree.

Full Bench Ref. Decided on 3rd July 1929, against the decision of Jack, J., D/- 9th January 1929.

* * (a) (Per Full Bench) Criminal P. C., S. 286—Matter of which evidence is not intended or cannot be produced should not be referred by counsel for prosecution in his opening of case — Topics as to accused's character should be excluded—P prosecuted under Ss. 193 and 471, Penal Code—During Sessions Trial prosecution insisting on reading complaint against P by R under S. 372, Penal Code—Complaint containing highly prejudicial statements allowed to be read—Judge omitting to warn jury not to pay attention to the contents of the complaint—Omission amounts to misdirection—Criminal P. C., S. 297 (Jack, J., contra).

Per Rankin, C. J.—So far as criminal cases are concerned the opening for the prosecution ought always to be confined to matters which are necessary to establish the jury to follow the evidence when it is brought before them. This is not the stage of a case where a doubtful question of admissibility should be either raised or decided. Whether a document is admissible or inadmissible is a matter which should always be ruled upon at the time when the document is being proved or put in or the question asked of the witnesses. In many cases a thing may be good evidence at one stage of the cases and inadmissible at another. It is frequently necessary to give evidence to lay the foundation which justifies a question or the putting in of a document. The opening speech of the counsel for the prosecution does not afford a proper occasion for the determining of such questions.

Per C. C. Ghose, J.—In a criminal trial counsel for the prosecution, in opening the case to the jury, can only state all that it is proposed or intended to prove in the case, so that the jury may see if there is any discrepancy between the opening statement of the counsel and the evidence afterwards adduced in support of them and it is wholly improper for the counsel for the prosecution to open any matter to the jury in respect whereof no evidence is intended to be read or can be adduced at the trial. Very great care must be taken by counsel for the prosecution in the observation to be made to the jury and that topics of prejudice connected with the character of the prisoner should be carefully excluded.

trial P had managed to put in a copy of birth register showing that R was of 18 years. P was ultimately acquitted. Proceedings were subsequently taken against P under Ss. 193 and 471, Penal Code for having used as genuine a forged document (copy of birth register of R) knowing it to be forged document. When the case began before the Court of Sessions, the counsel for the prosecution insisted upon reading to the jury in his opening speech the whole of R's complaint against P in S. 372 Penal Code case, which contained highly prejudicial matters that P was of loose morals, that he was notorious for seducing girls, that he used to keep such girls as concubines and that he had assaulted and raped R on diverse occasions. Counsel for the accused objected to its being read but the objection was overruled.

Held: that an atmosphere of prejudice had been allowed to be created and that there were grave reasons for concluding that the chances of P in obtaining a fair trial at the hands of the jury were seriously jeopardized. The allegations in the petition of R were such as must have and could not but have influenced the jury against P at the very beginning of the trial. The jury in the circumstances could not possibly get out of their minds the fact that P was a depraved person. This was specially unfortunate because the Judge in the course of his charge to the jury did not tell the jury, as he should have done, that the petition of complaint had not been admitted as evidence in the case, that the contents thereof which were objected to were irrelevant to the matter in issue at the trial before the jury, and that the jury ought not to pay any attention whatever to the contents of that petition. This was non-direction and it was non-direction of such a character as to amount to misdirection. [P 625 C 2]

* * (b) (Per Full Bench) Criminal P. C., S. 297—P prosecuted under Ss. 193 and 471, Penal Code for using copy of birth register of R showing R to be 18—Evidence of R's grandmother in another case against third person that R was 15 allowed to go in—P acting as interpreter at that time—Inference that P knew R to be 15 (that is below 18) attempted to be drawn—Judge while charging jury not leaving to them to find out whether P knew R to be below 18 but stating that if jurors were of opinion that P must have known R to be under 18 that could be a reason for concluding that P knew that the copy was forged—Charge to jury was held to be misdirection. (Jack, J., contra.)

P was prosecuted under Ss. 193 and 471 Penal Code for having used a forged document (a copy of birth register of R) in a previous prosecution by R under S. 372 for showing that R was of 18 years. During the course of trial in the forgery case evidence of the grandmother of R in another case, in which a stranger was prosecuted for kidnapping R and in which P acted as an interpreter, to the effect that R was of 15 or 16 years was allowed to be put in for showing, that P, who heard R's grandmother making the statement knew that R was not of 18 years and therefore he knew that the copy of the register showing R's age as 18 was a forged document. Judge in his charge to the jury as to this evidence said :

"some evidence has been adduced to show that P knew perfectly well that the girl was under 18. That is not very material ; but if he knew that she was under 18 that would be an additional reason for supposing that he knew the document to be forged. The evidence of the grandmother that the girl was at that time 15 has been put in and some other statement of R about her age in which she said she was 14. We are not concerned as to whether R had stated her age correctly or what her age was. If on that evidence you are of opinion that P must have known that she was under 18, that would be a reason for concluding that he knew the document was forged."

Held : that the question arising on the evidence of the grandmother of R, whether P knew that R was under 18 should not have been left to the jury in the words which the Judge saw fit to use, and that it would have been advisable if the jury had been told that it was a matter for them to find out on the entire evidence on record whether there was any justification for the theory that P knew that R was under 18, seeing that the prosecution did not adduce any substantive evidence on the point. If it be found that the opinion of the trial Judge on the point or points reserved or certified cannot be supported it is not open to the High Court to direct a retrial. No doubt the High Court has power under Cl. 26 to examine evidence and determine for itself whether after the exclusion of the evidence or matter which may be considered inadmissible, the residue and the record are sufficient to justify the conviction. The Court will not substitute its own finding for the verdict of the jury. It must consider whether the evidence on record improperly admitted was of such a nature that it possibly may have considerably influenced the minds of the jury and whether it was reasonably certain that the jury would, not might, have acted on the unobjectionable evidence if the wrongly admitted evidence or matter had not also been presented to them. Per Jac, J.—The Court can, on review, examine evidence for itself and determine without reference to the probable verdict of the jury, whether, excluding inadmissible evidence, the residue is sufficiently justifiable for the conclusion. If the Court is convinced on the evidence that the accused is guilty, he should not be acquitted merely on account of a defective charge. The unanimous verdict of the jurors should not be set aside on the mere speculation that certain allegations might have influenced them to some extent when it is clear that the verdict is entirely justifiable by the evidence. Rankin, C. J.—In this case Padamprasad was tried at the High Court Sessions by my learned brother, Jack, J., and a common Jury on charges laid under Ss. 193 and 471, I. P. C., together with Sujauddin Ahmed and Kanhyalal. He was convicted on the unanimous verdict of the jury of abetment of the offence of fabricating false evidence and also on the substantive charge of dishonestly using as genuine a forged document knowing the same to be forged. Kanhyalal was acquitted of both charges and Sujauddin Ahmed was convicted of abetment of the offence of fabricating false evidence and also of abetment of the offence of dishonestly using as genuine a forged document knowing the same to be forged.

On 19th March 1927, a Nepali girl called Raj Kumari presented a petition of complaint to the Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate charging Padam Prasad with divers offences and in particular with the offence of having sold her to one Hiralal Agarwala for immoral purposes. She alleged that she was of the age of about 14 years and asked that process issue against the accused under S. 372, I. P. C., that is for the offence of selling a minor girl for immoral purposes. The Magistrate commenced the trial of the accused on 14th April 1927. On 17th May 1927, he framed charges against the accused including a charge under S. 372. On 6th August 1927 he gave judgment acquitting the accused.

The case for the prosecution at the High Court Sessions was that Padam Prasad in the course of the trial before the Magistrate had filed and made use of a document purporting to be a certified copy of an extract from the daily register of births of the year 1908 kept in thana Dasaswamedh, Benares with a view to show that the girl Raj Kumari was over the age of 18 years at the time at which it was alleged that she had been sold; and that at the time when the document was filed and used as aforesaid it had been altered in four places, in two places 1909 had been altered to 1908 and in two places the name "Baber" had been inserted in front of the names "Jung Bahadur," the effect of the forgery being that whereas the genuine entry recorded the birth as on 19th June 1909 and the father as being Jung Bahadur, the document as forged showed the date of birth as 19th June 1903 and the father as Baber Jung Bahadur. It was proved at the trial that application had been made for the certificate on 26th April 1927 by Sujauddin who was acting as Padam Prasad's tadbirkar in the case before the Magistrate. The certificate is in Urdu script and the alterations made in it have been so made as not to be noticeable, though a careful examination discloses that the document has been tampered with. It is proved, however, that Padam Prasad does not know Urdu script. Upon the evidence there can be no doubt that Sujauddin obtained the certificate in order that it might be altered and used as part of the defence of Padam Prasad. The sole question so far as Padam Prasad is concerned was the question whether or not Padam Prasad had been proved to have known that the document had been altered at the time when he used it for the purpose of his defence before the Magistrate. Upon that question the evidence before the jury was almost entirely circumstantial. The sole purpose of the forgery was to defeat the charge under S. 372 and the jury had to consider whether in all the circumstances of the case it was a safe and reasonable inference to hold that the document had not been forged in the interest of Padam Prasad without Padam Prasad being well aware of what was being done in his interest.

The prosecution was able to reinforce this consideration by the evidence of Mr. Pashupati Bhattacharjee the advocate who had conducted his defence before the Magistrate. Mr. Bhattacharjee's evidence makes it clear that Padam Prasad was well aware of the importance to him of showing if he could that the girl was above 18 years of age at the time of the offence charged; that Padam Prasad came from Benares and attended the conference held on behalf of the defence, that Sujauddin also attended at these conferences when the question of the proof of the girl's age was discussed; that Sujauddin was the person who read the Urdu documents and that the certificate afterwards filed before the Magistrate was produced at these conferences and was discussed. The defence on the other hand contended that there was no direct evidence to show that Padam Prasad knew what Sujauddin had been doing on his behalf; that he was, wholly unable to read a word of the document in question; that he was relying upon Sujauddin for the preparation of the defence and for obtaining all documents which might assist the defence. They relied upon a statement of Mr. Bhattacharjee that Padam Prasad's instructions to him were that he was quite ready to cite witnesses from Benares Collectorate to prove the certificate which they were putting in. They relied also on the fact that at the close of the trial in the Magistrate's Court no attempt had been made by Padam Prasad to get the document back though it would have been quite easy to do this before the question of forgery had been raised by Rajkumari. They relied further upon a statement made by Padam Prasad on 24th September 1927 when the investigating officer first questioned him about this document—the statement being that Sujauddin had told him that Rajkumari's birth certificate would be available at Benares Collectorate and that he had asked Sujauddin to take a copy of the extract and to make it over to Mr. Bhattacharjee.

Broadly speaking these were the considerations upon either side. It seems clear to me that the question was entirely for the jury who had to make up their minds whether it was proved that Padam Prasad when he used the document was aware that it had been altered. There was evidence upon which the jury were entitled to find him guilty but it cannot be said in this case that a verdict of acquittal would be unreasonable. The accused had a serious case to meet but he had at the worst a good fighting chance.

It may here be emphasized that at no time did the prosecution as part of their case allege or undertake to prove what the age of the girl was. No evidence was called upon that point. Rajkumari herself could not very well prove the date of her birth but in any case no question was asked of her in examination-in-chief bearing upon the question of her age. Some questions were asked of her in cross-examination for the purpose of showing that she had given different dates at different times. It is true that each of these different statements if true, made her out to be a minor at the material time.

In the fiat of the Advocate-General, which has led to these proceedings under Cl. 26, of the Letters Patent, a number of matters are referred to as grounds of objection taken by Padam Prasad to the learned Judge's conduct of the trial and to his charge to the jury. Excepting upon two points it is reasonably clear to me that these objections have no substance. The charge of the learned Judge was fair, lucid and accurate, well calculated to apprise the jury of the real questions in the case and the state of the evidence upon the points in controversy. These objections, however, require careful consideration.

The learned counsel who opened the case for the prosecution insisted upon reading to the jury in his opening the whole of Rajkumari's petition of complaint against Padam Prasad in the S. 372 case. That petition alleged against Padam Prasad various highly prejudicial matters—that he was a man of loose morals, that he was notorious for seducing Nepalese girls, that he used to keep such girls as concubines that he had assaulted and raped the complainant on diverse occasions. It was clearly necessary that the jury should know that the proceedings before the Magistrate were proceedings upon the charge of selling a minor girl for immoral purposes but these other allegations had prima facie no bearing upon the question whether the certificate of birth was forged or not and if so whether this was known to Padam Prasad. The reading of this petition was objected to by the counsel for the accused and in the circumstance I confess to being somewhat astonished that the Crown Counsel did not at once appreciate that the introduction to the notice of the jury at the beginning of the case of all these highly prejudicial matters was unnecessary and unfair to the accused—a thing which could do no good whatever and was highly calculated to complicate the issues. The course adopted by counsel for the Crown threw upon the Judge at the very commencement of the case the necessity of coming to a decision immediately and in advance of the evidence. So far as criminal cases are concerned the opening for the prosecution ought always to be confined to matters which are necessary to enable the jury to follow the evidence when it is brought before them. This is not the stage of a case at which doubtful questions of admissibility should be either raised or decided. Whether a document is admissible or inadmissible is a matter which should always be ruled upon at the time the document is being proved or put in or the question asked of the witnesses. In many cases a thing may be good evidence at one stage of the case and inadmissible at another. It is frequently necessary to give evidence to lay the foundation which justifies a question or the putting in of a document. The opening speech of the counsel for the prosecution does not afford a proper occasion for the determining of such questions.

It appears to me that the petition of complaint of Rajkumari was a document which the prosecution were entitled to put in. Even if it had been put in there was no reason, however, why the whole of it should be read to the jury as its only relevance was that it showed that Padam Prasad was being prosecuted on a charge which involved that the girl was a minor girl. The unfortunate consequence in this case of the learned counsel insisting upon reading this document to the jury in his opening was, first, that when the time came to prove the document the learned counsel apparently forgot to prove it. The record shows that when Mr. Bhattacharjee was giving evidence the document was marked for identification. A second consequence was that at the end of the trial the matter was overlooked. The learned Judge did not have it in mind to caution the jury that they must not allow these unproved accusations against Padam Prasad to affect their judgment. The result is that the defence is in a position to complain before us that prejudicial matter was read to the jury and was not properly proved thereafter; also that no warning was given to the jury. Now it is quite true that the jury had before them the fact that the Magistrate had acquitted Padam Prasad.

Unless, however, some caution was given to the jury this circumstance by itself would not necessarily efface from their minds the impression created by the accusations which they had heard. They may have thought that Padam Prasad had been acquitted merely because the girl was not shown to be a minor, that his acquittal may have been due in part or in whole to the forged certificate of birth which had been produced in his defence. The Judge's charge contains no discussion which would clarify the minds of the jury upon any such point though it is quite true that an intelligent jurymen listening to the charge of the learned Judge and appreciating it properly would see that the learned Judge proceeded in no way upon these accusations and invited them to deal with the case on the footing that the jury were not concerned as to the age of the girl and were not concerned whether Padam Prasad was acquitted or not or on what grounds he was acquitted. This the learned Judge in one passage stated to the jury expressly but it is not equivalent to a caution to the effect that highly prejudicial matters had been brought before them and that it was their duty to see that their verdict was in no way affected by it.

The second point which required examination is this: The prosecution, as I have said, at no time undertook to prove that the girl in fact was a minor. They were not therefore in a position to ask the jury to hold that because the girl was a minor, because Padam Prasad was related to the girl or had other means of knowing the truth, he must have known that she was a minor. Rajkumari was, however, recalled at the instance of the prosecution to give evidence that in August 1926 Padam Prasad was acting as interpreter in a Court at Benares which was investigating a charge against certain persons of having kidnapped Rajkumari; and that in the course of that case Rajkumari's grandmother, Sethirani, gave evidence and stated that Rajkumari's age was 15 or 16. This evidence was objected to by the defence but was allowed by the Judge and it appears from the shorthand notes, that counsel for the prosecution stated that he did not want the statement of Sethirani to go in for the purpose of proving the truth of that statement of fact but only for the purpose of proving that such a statement was made and Padam Prasad knew of it. The recorded deposition of Sethirani was produced and accepted as evidence. Whether or not this deposition was properly proved and accepted under S. 80, Evidence Act is a matter about which a question has been raised. I am not myself satisfied that there is under S. 80, Evidence Act, any objection to this document on the mere question of sufficiency of proof but it is unnecessary in my opinion to discuss that matter. The learned Judge in his charge dealt with this portion of the evidence in the following manner:

"Some evidence has been adduced to show that Padam Prasad knew perfectly well that the girl was under 18. That is not very material but if he knew that she was under 18 that would be an additional reason for supposing that he knew the document to be forged. The evidence of Sethirani, who gave evidence in Benares that the girl was at that time 15, has been put in and some other statements of Rajkumari about her age, one which deals with a statement she made in a petition, not on oath in which she said she was 14. We are not concerned as to whether Rajkumari stated her age correctly or what her age really was. If on the evidence you are of opinion that Padam Prasad must have known that she was under 18, that would be a reason for concluding that he knew the document was forged."

In my opinion this passage in the charge of the learned Judge amounted to a misdirection. It was not open to the jury to find that the girl was in fact under 18 and it was not open to them to conclude that Padam Prasad knew that the girl was under 18. If on some occasion he had heard the girl's grandmother make a statement about her age—a statement which might be true or false—which he might believe or disbelieve, it in no way follows that when a certificate purporting to be a certificate of her birth was produced, he would know that the certificate was forged. In this case the prosecution had to rely entirely upon circumstantial evidence arising out of the fact that the document had been forged for the benefit of Padam Prasad and that Padam Prasad had been shown to be taking a close interest in the preparation of his own defence. Padam Prasad knew at least from March 1927 that he was being prosecuted on the footing that the girl was under age. This was being solemnly alleged against him as a thing which the prosecution would attempt to prove in a Court of law. It added nothing whatever to the prosecution case to offer proof that he had heard the girl's grandmother say that she was 15 or 16 unless that statement was to be taken as a true statement and unless the jury were to be invited to hold first that the girl was in fact a minor and secondly that Padam Prasad in the circumstances knew of this fact. In my opinion it was not open to the jury to conclude that Padam Prasad knew the certificate to be forged because he knew that she was under 18. If such a statement as Sethirani's was admissible in evidence at all it was very necessary that the jury should be cautioned that they must not take that statement as in any way tending to prove the age of the girl. No such warning was given to them; on the contrary they were told.

"If on that evidence you are of opinion that Padam Prasad must have known that she was under 18, that would be a reason for concluding that he knew the document was forged."

As the case was conducted at the trial, the prosecution, while, not professing to prove the girl's age in the end, were given the benefit of Sethirani's evidence in another case upon that very point.

In my opinion it is not possible to suggest that the verdict of the jury may not very well have been affected by the direction given to them upon this matter. I have a sufficiently high opinion of common juries in Calcutta to induce me to doubt whether the absence of a caution with reference to the prejudicial matter in Rajkumari's petition of complaint would by itself have made it necessary to interfere with the verdict. But on the point as to Padam Prasad's knowledge of her age I think the case is very different. The verdict of the jury cannot be allowed to stand unless we are of opinion that the same verdict would have been arrived at had they been correctly and sufficiently directed. Emperor v. Panchu Das (1). It is not open to us to direct a retrial and I am not prepared to hold that the jury, assuming it to be a reasonable jury, would have convicted the accused if the direction complained of had not been given. In my opinion the verdict and sentence must be set aside and Padam Prasad must be acquitted and discharged.

It was contended before us that Art. 162, Sch. 1 of the Lim. Act 1908, applied to proceedings under Cl. 26, Letters Patent. This contention was overruled at the hearing. The phrase "to review the case" as used in Cl. 26 applies as much where a point of law is reserved by the trial Judge as where the Advocate-General has given a certificate. I am far from saying that inordinate delay may not be a matter for consideration by the Advocate-General at the time when he is called upon to consider whether a certificate should be granted. But we are not now dealing with an "application for review of judgment" within the meaning of Art. 162.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This is an application for review of a criminal case on the certificate of the Advocate-General of Bengal under Cl. 26, Letters Patent of 1865. The petitioner Padam Prasad Upadhyaya, was tried on 8th and 9th January last at the Criminal Sessions of this Court by Jack, J., and a common jury on charges under Ss. 193 and 109 read with 193, and 471 and 109 read with 471, I. P. C., The accused pleaded not guilty to the said charges. There were two other persons named Sujauddin and Kanhya Lal who were tried along with the accused. The jury brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty against the present petitioner and Sujauddin and of not guilty in favour of Kanhya Lal. The present petitioner was sentenced by the learned Judge to undergo rigorous imprisonment for a period of three years.

It appeared at the trial that one Rajkumari had filed a petition of complaint against the petitioner in March 1927, in the Court of Mr. A. Z. Khan, Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta, charging him with having committed an offence punishable under S. 372, I. P. C. The petitioner was tried by the said Mr. Khan, the trial having lasted from 14th April 1927, to 6th August 1927; but ultimately the petitioner was acquitted. An application to the High Court for leave to appeal was against the said order of acquittal rejected. It was alleged that during the trial of the above mentioned case before the Magistrate the present petitioner had fabricated false evidence for the purpose of being used in judicial proceedings by inserting a word, namely, "Babar" and by altering a certain date in two places in a document purporting to be a certified copy of an entry in a Register of Births kept in Benares relating to the birth of Rajkumari and with having used as genuine the said document knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged. An application was subsequently made on behalf of the said Rajkumari to the said Magistrate in order that a complaint against the petitioner might be made under S. 476, Criminal P. C., but the Magistrate rejected the same on 31st October 1927. There was an application to this Court in its Revisional Jurisdiction. This Court directed the prosecution of the present petitioner on 3rd May 1928. The learned Chief Presidency Magistrate took cognizance of the case and ultimately committed the petitioner to stand his trial at the Criminal Sessions of this Court. At the trial before Jack, J., the entirety of the petition of complaint of Rajkumari dated 19th March 1927, was read out to the jury. This was objected to on behalf of the petitioner but the objection was overruled by the learned Judge.

The petition of complaint of Rajkumari which initiated the proceedings against the present petitioner in 1927 contained, among other things the following allegations:

"That your petitioner knew the accused to be a man of loose morals, notorious for seducing Nepalese girls from Nepal, some of whom he used to keep as concubines and some of whom he used to sell to others and as such, your petitioner did not like to go to the house of the accused and accordingly with the help of one Gobind Kishori's wife she removed to the house of Gobind Kishori with a view to avoid being forced to go over to the house of the accused. That thereafter the accused had your petitioner forcibly removed to his own house at Benares where she was intimidated, assaulted and raped by the accused on diverse occasions and your petitioner was kept in a state of complete confinement for about two months and your petitioner found herself absolutely without any help to protest against the ill-treatment meted out to her. That in the month of September 1926, your petitioner was brought down to Calcutta by the accused along with six or seven other young girls and stopped with Hiralal and after some time the accused left Calcutta along with the other girls after selling your petitioner to the said Hiralal Agarwalla for Rs. 1,300 for immoral purposes."

There was another incident at the said trial before Jack, J. to which attention has been called. It appeared that a criminal case had been started in Benares against one Ram Prasad and others for having kidnapped Rajkumari. This was in August 1926, just before Rajkumari came to Calcutta. In that case the grandmother of Rajkumari named Sethirani, gave evidence and the present petitioner acted as an interpreter in that case. It was alleged that Sethirani in her deposition in that case had stated that Rajkumari was 15 or 16 years of age. Learned counsel for the Crown wanted to recall Rajkumari and to ask her about the said statement of Sethirani for the purpose of showing that the petitioner knew that such a statement had been made. In this connexion the following discussion took place before the learned Judge:

"Mr. A. K. Basu:—I want to recall Rajkumari and put one or two questions about the Benares case. Padam Prasad was the interpreter in that case and as such was aware that Sethirani, the grandmother of Rajkumari, said in her deposition that Rajkumari was 15 or 16 years of age."

"Mr. Chatterjee:—I object to any statement of Sethirani supposed to have been made by her in the Benares Court being proved here by Rajkumari. Such a thing cannot be legally done in view of the fact that Sethirani is living, and further that any statement by her cannot in any way be relevant to any issue in this case between the Crown and the accused."

"Mr. Basu:—I do not want the statement of Sethirani to go in for the purpose of proving the truth of that statement of fact, but only for the purpose of proving that such a statement was made and Padam Prasad knew of it."

Court:—I allow that.

The learned Judge allowed the evidence of Sethirani in the Benares case to be put in evidence and it was marked Ex. 13. Apparently it was sought to be argued on behalf of the prosecution that it had been proved through Rajkumari that the petitioner had heard Sethirani say in the Benares Court that in August 1926 she (Rajkumari) was 15 or 16 years of age and that that fact went to show that although the petitioner knew Rajkumari to be below 18 at the time of her sale for immoral purposes, he was trying to rely on a document which purported to prove that she was above 18 at the time and that in the circumstances, it could be inferred that the petitioner must have known that the said copy of the Birth certificate was a fabricated or false document. The learned Judge referred in the course of his charge to the Jury to the evidence of Sethirani in the following words :

"Some evidence has been adduced to show that Padam Prasad knew perfectly well that the girl was under 18. That is not very material; but if he knew that she was under 18 that would be an additional reason for supposing that he knew the document to be forged. The evidence of Sethirani, who gave evidence in Benares that the girl was at that time 15 has been put in, and some other statements of Rajkumari about her age, one of which deals with a statement she made in a petition, not on oath, in which she said she was 14. We are not concerned as to whether Rajkumari stated her age correctly or what her age really was. If, on that evidence you are of opinion that Padam Prasad must have known that she was under 18, that would be a reason for concluding, that he knew the document was forged."

At the hearing of the present application for review under Cl. 26, Letters Patent, it was strenuously argued by Mr. Chatterjee on behalf of the petitioner (1) that under no circumstances could counsel for the prosecution have been allowed to read to the jury the entirety of Rajkumari's petition of complaint dated March 1927 and that the procedure adopted by the prosecution was wholly wrong and unjustifiable inasmuch as the petition of complaint was not tendered in evidence and consequently the petitioner was deprived of the opportunity of cross-examining Rajkumari on the statement made by her in the said petition of complaint and of removing from the minds of the jury the unfavourable impression that must have been created by the reading of the petition of complaint. Mr. Chatterjee further argued (2) that Sethirani's evidence in the Benares case was not admissible in evidence in this trial and had not been legally admitted and (3) that the portion of the learned Judge's charge to the jury set out above was calculated to materially prejudice the jury against the petitioner.

Before I proceed to consider the three objections summarized above, I desire to make a passing reference to the scope of Cl. 26, Letters Patent. I do not desire to go through the numerous cases on this point and it is sufficient for me to observe that the available authorities are collected in the cases reported in Fateh Chand v. Emperor (2), Emperor v. Panchu Das (1) and Emperor v. Barendra Kumar (3). The trial Judge may reserve a point of law or points of law for the opinion of the High Court or the Advocate-General may certify that in his judgment there is an error in the decision of a point or points of law decided by the trial Judge or that a point or points of law which has or have been decided by the trial Judge should be further considered. The Court then reviews the entire case or such part of it as may be necessary and finally determines such point or points of law reserved or certified as the case may be and "thereupon" may alter the sentence passed by the trial Court and pass such judgment and sentence as shall seem right to the Court. The word "thereupon" has been construed to mean that the determination of the point or points of law reserved or certified must be in favour of the prisoner before the Court can interfere with the conviction and sentence.

It has been definitely held that if it be found that the opinion of the trial Judge on the point or points reserved or certified cannot be supported, it is not open to this Court to direct a re-trial. No doubt, the Court has power under Cl. 26 to examine the evidence and determine for itself whether, after the exclusion of the evidence or matter which may be considered inadmissible, the residue on record is sufficient to justify the conviction. But there is a large mass of authority in support of the view that the Court will not substitute its own finding for the verdict of the jury and that it must consider whether the evidence or matter improperly admitted was of such a nature that it possibly may have considerably influenced the minds of the jury and whether it was reasonably certain that the jury would, not might, have acted on the unobjectionable evidence if the wrongly admitted evidence or matter had not also been presented to them. Further, it has been held that S. 537, Criminal P. C., has no application to a case under Cl. 26, Letter Patent [per Mookerjee, J., in Fateh Chand v. Emperor (2)] although I am not unmindful of the fact that a contrary view has been taken by Rankin, J., as he then was, in the case reported in Emperor v. Colin Mackenzie Mackay (4).

These being the guiding considerations for determination of an application under Cl. 26, Letters Patent, I now proceed to consider the objections taken on behalf of the petitioner seriatim. It is a rule of universal application that in a criminal trial, counsel for the prosecution, in opening the case to the jury, can only state all that it is proposed or intended to prove in the case, so that the jury may see if there is any discrepancy between the opening statements of counsel and the evidence afterwards adduced in support of them and that it is wholly improper for counsel for the prosecution to open any matter to the jury in respect whereof no evidence is intended to be or can be adduced at the trial. In this case, learned counsel for the prosecution has explained before us that his only object in placing the petition of complaint of Rajkumari before the jury was to draw attention to the fact that she had stated therein that she was 14 years of age. If that was the sole object, it was a grave error, in my opinion, on the part of learned counsel for the prosecution to read out to the jury the entirety of the petition of complaint by Rajkumari containing, as it did, the statement set out above and it was a procedure which was rightly objected to by Mr. Chatterjee on behalf of the petitioner. It was a procedure which should never have been allowed. It is elementary that very great care must be taken by counsel for the prosecution in the observations he makes to the jury (R. v. Rudland (5)) and that topics of prejudice connected with the character of the prisoner should be carefully excluded [R. v. Bloom (6)]. The fiction of law, in criminal cases, is, that the Judge is counsel for the prisoner. It may not be inappropriate in this connexion to recall the famous words of Kenyon, C. J., in R. v. Wakefield (7), where he observed :

"I have been reminded that I sit here as counsel for defendant. I certainly do so, so far as to interpose between him and counsel for the prosecution and to see that no improper use of the law is made against him and that no improper evidence is given to the jury."

These words have been quoted with approval in R. v. O'Connell (8). It is also beyond the region of doubt that counsels for the prosecution ought not to struggle to obtain a conviction but should regard themselves rather as ministers of justice, assisting him in its administration than as advocates R. v. Banks (9). In my opinion, there can be no doubt that the allegations in the petition of Rajkumari were such as must have and could not but have influenced the Jury against the petitioner at the very beginning of the trial. The jury, in the circumstances, could not possibly get out of their minds the fact that the petitioner was a depraved person. This was specially unfortunate because of the fact that the learned Judge in the course of his charge to the jury did not tell the jury, as he should have done, that the petition of complaint had not been admitted as evidence in the case, that the contents thereof, which were objected to, were irrelevant to the matter in issue at the trial before the jury, and that the jury were not to pay any attention whatsoever to the contents of that petition. This was non-direction and it was non-direction of such a character as to amount to misdirection. It was stated before us that counsel for the prosecution had warned the jury that they were not to act on the allegation in the petition of complaint. This, in my opinion was not enough. The learned Judge, in the events which have happened, should have himself warned the jury and taken steps to repair the mischief that had been done. It was further stated before us that learned counsel for the petitioner did not ask the learned Judge to caution the jury in the matter of the contents of the petition of complaint of Rajkumari. I do not agree that after what had happened when the petition was read out to the jury, it was not possible or practicable for learned counsel for the petitioner to submit anything further to the learned Judge. In my opinion it was open to the learned counsel for the petitioner to draw the attention of the learned Judge to the matter at the time when he charged the jury.

But the fact that learned counsel did not do so is, in the circumstances, really immaterial. A grave omission to direct the jury on a vital point cannot be made good by counsel's calling attention to it at the termination of the summing up [R. v. Willet (10)] : It is not really necessary for me to pursue the question raised by learned counsel for the petitioner as to whether or not in the circumstances he should have been given an opportunity of cross-examining Rajkumari for the purpose of showing that the allegations in her petition were not founded on fact. In my opinion, as indicated above the allegations in that petition to which objection had been taken, were clearly irrelevant ; it would have been sufficient if learned counsel for the prosecution had briefly opened the matter to the jury by saying that a case under S. 372, I. P. C., had been started against the petitioner on the complaint of Rajkumari and that he had been acquitted of that charge. It is not necessary to elaborate the matter further but it is impossible to resist the conclusion that an atmosphere of prejudice had been allowed to be created by reason of what has been referred to above and that there are grave reasons for concluding that the chances of the petitioner in obtaining a fair trial at the hands of the jury were seriously jeopardised.

As regards Ex. 13, being the evidence of Sethirani I am not prepared to say, having regard to the provisions of S. 80, Evidence Act, that the document, which purported to be a record or memorandum of the evidence of Sethirani in the Benares case, could not be admitted in evidence without formal proof. S. 80, Evidence Act does not deal with the question of admissibility of the documents referred to therein but simply dispenses with the necessity of their formal proof by raising the presumption that everything in connexion with them had been legally and correctly done i. e., (i) that the documents purporting to be record of evidences or statements or confessions are genuine (ii) that the statements as to the circumstances under which they were taken made by the officer who affixed his signature are true and (iii) that the evidence, statement or confession was duly taken. Assuming that the identity of the deponent Sethirani was established on the evidence of Rajkumari the evidence was admissible. In the circumstances of the present case however, the effect of the evidence of Sethirani against the petitioner was so slight that the jury ought to have been properly cautioned. Padam Prasad was not a party to the Benares case ; he acted merely as an interpreter and he might or might not have remembered when the copy of the birth certificate was produced in the Magistrate's Court what Sethirani had stated about Rajkumari's age. The learned Judge, however used words, in the extract from his charge to the jury set out above wherein there was an undercurrent of suggestion that the petitioner knew or had the means of knowing that Rajkumari was under 18 and that itself was a reason for concluding that he knew the document referred to at the trial namely the copy of the birth certificate was forged on the record as it stood it was not in my opinion open to the jury to conclude that Padam Prasad knew that she was under eighteen years of age. Further the learned Judge made a reference to Rajkumari's petition which had not been admitted in evidence although marked for identification. I am not unmindful that the charge has to be taken as a whole but I do not find in the charge any neutralizing expressions. These circumstances, along with what has been stated before, are in my opinion, sufficient for coming to the conclusion that the present case has been brought within the rule laid down in Emperor v. Panchu Das (1) and that this Court will hesitate to substitute its own finding on the residue on the record for the verdict of the jury. In my opinion, the question arising on the evidence of Sethirani, whether Padam Prasad knew that Rajkumari was under 18, should not have been left to the jury in the words which the learned Judge saw fit to use and that it would have been advisable if the jury had been told that it was a matter for them to find out on the entire evidence on record whether there was any justification for the theory that Padam Prasad knew that Rajkumari was under 18, seeing that the prosecution did not adduce any substantive evidence on the point.

In conclusion it is impossible for me to say that the jury were not very considerably influenced against the accused on the matter referred to above and, that being so, I would, therefore, set aside the conviction and sentence and direct that the petitioner be acquitted and discharged.

Suhrawardy, J.—I agree in the order which the learned Chief Justice has passed.

Mukerji, J.—I concur in the judgment delivered by my Lord, the Chief Justice.

Jack, J.—Padam Prasad was tried under S. 372, I. P. C., on the charge of having sold Rajkumari a girl under 18 years of age for purposes of prostitution. He was acquitted. He was subsequently charged at the High Court Sessions with having dishonestly used at the trial (and abetted the fabrication of) a forged birth certificate which purported to show that Rajkumari was over 18 years of age. His defence and that of his co-accused Sujauddin (his tadbirkar in the case under S. 372) was that they were unaware that the birth certificate was forged. They were both convicted. (Padam Prasad of the principal offence under S. 471 and Sujauddin of abetment and both of abetment of fabrication of the birth certificate)

In the present application under S. 26, Letters Patent the principal ground urged for review of Padam Prasad's conviction is that the trial was vitiated by the admission in evidence of Rajkumari's complaint in the case under S. 372, I. P. C., and by the omission to warn the jury not to be influenced by the allegations therein against the accused.

The original record of that complaint produced at the trial bears the Magistrate's endorsement to the effect that Rajkumari stated its contents on oath. Under S. 80, Evidence Act therefore the Court shall presume it to be genuine and under S. 4, Evidence Act the Court shall presume it to be proved unless and until it is disproved. It was admitted in evidence in that it was read over to the jury in opening the case by the counsel for the Crown. It was admitted under S. 9, Evidence Act to show that there was such a case under S. 372, I. P. C. It is suggested that inasmuch as there are allegations in the complaint which might prejudice the jury against the accused the complaint should not have been admitted. These allegations are that the accused was notorious for seducing Nepalese girls and that Rajkumari was intimidated, assaulted and raped by him while in his custody previous to being sold for purposes of prostitution. These allegations, bad as they are, did not add in reality, very greatly to the charge that he had sold her, a girl under 18, for purposes of prostitution—a charge which necessarily had to go to the jury being the charge at the trial of which the forged certificate was used. The trial cannot, therefore, be said to have been materially affected by the reading over of the complaint in its entirety.

As regards the omission in the charge of a caution to the jurors not to allow their minds to be influenced by the allegations in this petition against Padam Prasad's character, no great weight can be attached to this omission when it is borne in mind that at the time the petition was admitted it was expressly stated by the Court and by the advocate for the Crown that the petition was put in merely to prove that there was a complaint under S. 372, I. P. C. by Rajkumari, and the jury were told not to allow themselves to be prejudiced by the allegations against the accused contained therein. Further the learned counsel for the defence who addressed the jury (as stated in the charge) at considerable length, warned them (as he has told us) not to let their minds be influenced by these allegations. The jurors must have realized that the Judge approved of this part of his address which was unchallenged and that the learned advocate was entitled to warn them to totally disregard these allegations. Finally the jury were informed that the accused Padam Prasad was acquitted in that case and no attempt was made to lead the jury to believe that he was acquitted merely because it was found that the girl was above 18 years of age. Had this omission to warn the jury finally been felt to be of any importance at the time I have no doubt the learned and experienced advocate for the defence would have directed the attention of the Court to the omission. I do not think it at all probable that the jurors were influenced by these allegations which were merely included in the original petition of Rajkumari read out to them at the opening of the trial and not specifically alluded to thereafter. Nor do I think the unanimous verdict of the jurors should be set aside on the mere speculation that these allegations might have influenced them to some extent when it is clear that the verdict was entirely justified by the evidence.

The only other ground for review which has been seriously pressed is that Sethirani's evidence in that case (including a statement that Rajkumari's age was fifteen or sixteen) was not proved, and was not admissible in evidence in that case nor was Rajkumari's evidence about it admissible.

Sethirani's statement was that of a witness in a judicial proceeding purporting to be signed by a Magistrate and produced before the Court. It must therefore be taken to be proved under S. 80, Evidence Act read with S. 4.

The fact that Padam Prasad had reason to believe the girl to be below 18 was relevant under S. 11, Evidence Act since it might make it highly probable that he knew that the birth certificate which showed her to be above 18 was forged. The fact therefore that Padam Prasad heard the girl's grandmother state on oath before a Magistrate that her age was 15 or 16 was relevant and admissible in evidence. Rajkumari's statement in this connexion was necessary and admissible to show that it was this Padam Prasad who was present in the Court interpreting Sethirani's evidence on that occasion and that the Sethirani who deposed was her grandmother and was referring to herself. Rajkumari's evidence as to the statements of Sethirani was only necessary to show that it was this particular occasion to which Rajkumari was referring and her evidence was of course not admissible to prove what statements were made.

It was however urged that the jury were misdirected regarding the application of this evidence in the following passage in the charge;

"Some evidence has been adduced to show that Padam Prasad knew perfectly well that the girl was under 18. That is not very material. But if he knew that she was under 18 that would be an additional reason for supposing that he knew the document to be forged. The evidence of Sethirani, who gave evidence in the Benares Court that the girl was at that time, 15, has been put in with some statements of Rajkumari about her age, one of which deals with a statement made in a petition, not on oath, in which she said she was fourteen. We are not concerned as to whether Rajkumari stated her age correctly or what her age really was. If on that evidence, you are of opinion that Padam Prasad must have known that she was under 18, that would be a reason for concluding that he knew the document was forged."

It must be borne in mind that the jury could have been under no misapprehension as to the purpose for which Sethirani's evidence was admitted inasmuch as this was discussed in their presence when its admission was objected to by the defence, and they were told that it was not admissible in proof of the age of Rajkumari but merely to prove that Padam Prasad heard her grandmother make this statement. This appears from the statement of the learned Crown Counsel which the learned defence advocate has admitted to be correct. Now in this passage in the charge to which objection has been made the jury are directed that if they think that Padam Prasad (having heard her grandmother Sethirani make this statement about the girl's age or on account of statements made by the girl herself) must have considered the girl to be under 18 that would go to show that he knew the birth certificate was forged. This is what that passage in the charge was obviously intended to convey to the jury and what I believe it did convey to them when taken with the remainder of the charge. It is, I think, in no sense a misdirection.

The jury were told that this evidence was not very material nor was it; for it was not really necessary to support the charge in this case that Padam Prasad should have any opinion as to the age of the girl and, in any case, since Padam Prasad was Rajkumari's uncle by marriage and used frequently to visit Sethirani his mother-in-law while Rajkumari was living with her at Benares, it was clear that he had every opportunity of knowing the girl's age. In these circumstances the admission of Sethirani's statement in evidence can, I think, in no way have affected the decision of the case, for the jury would, most probably, have judged Padam Prasad's belief as to the age of the girl, if they thought it of any consequence at all, by their own opinion of her age on seeing her in the witness box. It was probably her appearance which led to the Court to use in the charge the words "must have known" instead of "must have thought" in reference to Padam Prasad's opinion. Even if it is held that the jurors were wrongly led to conclude that Padam Prasad believed the girl to be under 18 by the direction in the charge regarding the application of Sethirani's evidence, the fact of such belief on his part would only be a very minor point to be considered in deciding whether he knew the certificate to be forged. The jury were, I think, bound to base their finding as to his guilty knowledge almost entirely on the manner in which the certificate was obtained and used by him and, as reasonable men with some experience of human affairs, they would most certainly I think on that evidence, alone conclude that he must have known that the birth certificate was forged.

Under S. 167, Evidence Act, the improper admission or rejection of evidence shall not of itself be a ground for a new trial or reversal of any decision in any case if it shall appear to the Court before which such objection is raised, that, independently of the evidence objected to and admitted, there was sufficient evidence to justify the decision or that if the rejected evidence had been received, it ought not to have varied the decision.

The section is imperative and applies to any decision in any case and therefore necessarily to the decision of the High Court when exercising its powers under Cl. 26, Letters Patent. It seems to me that the circumstances in which the forged birth certificate was obtained and used in the case make it practically certain that Padam Prasad as well as Sujauddin must have known it to be forged. "Agents at consentientes paripoenaplect-entur." Reference has been made to the fact that the accused had offered to bring evidence to prove the birth certificate. This was I think merely bluff. Padam Prasad was throughout in close consultation with the pleaders conducting the case, and, if he thought the certificate genuine, why did he not put it in evidence to rebut the elaborate expert evidence of the two I. M. S. doctors who said she was under 18. If genuine, this piece of evidence would have made his acquittal certain: in fact the prosecution case must have been withdrawn immediately.

Again great virtue has been attached to the omission of the accused to withdraw the forged birth certificate immediately, but in fact, its withdrawal after the case would by no means have prevented his successful prosecution for filing it, for the fact that it had been filed was on record, and the evidence of forgery was independent of the appearance of the document. On the one hand to leave the certificate on the record would disarm suspicion, on the other hand an application for its return would have reminded the authorities of its existence and of the allegation that it was forged. The defence, in the absence of Sujauddin, have now skilfully thrown the blame on him, and would have the Court believe that Padam Prasad was carefully kept in the dark as to the immense risk his agent Sujauddin was running on his behalf in obtaining and using a forged birth certificate. The jurors did not take this view. On the other hand they naturally concluded that in the circumstances Padam Prasad must have known of the forgery, and their opinion could not, I think, have been influenced by want of detail in the charges. The charge was intentionally abbreviated, as stated in the opening, in view of the exhaustive manner in which the defence case had been presented to the jury by the learned advocate for the defence.

The powers of the High Court under Cl. 26, Letters Patent are perfectly clear. The Court is to review the entire case or such part of it as may be necessary, and finally determine the point or points of law reserved or certified and thereupon may alter the sentence passed by the trial Court and pass such judgment and sentence as shall seem right to the Court. A statute must be taken to mean what it says, and it must be remembered that, if the words of a statute be plain and clear, it is not for the Court to raise any doubt as to what they mean. I have discussed the case with reference to the probable verdict of a jury had there been no defect or omission in the charge, in deference to the views of the learned Judge who holds that this should be the criterion, but, with very great respect to these views it must always be remembered that it is open to the Court, in the words of the statute, to pass such judgment and sentence as shall seem right to the Court. It would therefore be superfluous to cite decisions such as Queen-Empress v. O' Hara (11) showing that the Court can, on review, examine the evidence for itself and determine without reference to the probable verdict of a jury whether excluding the inadmissible evidence, the residue is sufficient to justify the conviction. As pointed out by Sir Asutosh Mookerjee, J., in Emperor v. Pan-chu (1)

"The Judicial Committee did not by their decision in Subramaniam v. Emperor (12) overrule by implication the series of cases in Calcutta and Bombay where the High Court had in cases reserved or certified reviewed the evidence and determined the guilt of the accused."

In the same case Walmsley, J., being satisfied on the merits that the accused were guilty, said :

"I do not think it necessary to ask what view a jury would take of the evidence except in so far as the opinion of a hypothetical jury affords a standard of reasonableness."

There might be some excuse for hesitating to deprive the accused of the benefit of a jury trial where the demeanour of the witnesses was of any importance, but in a case like the present, one in which the evidence is entirely circumstantial, no importance is to be attached to the demeanour of the witnesses and we are in as good a position as the jurors to decide on the evidence as to the guilt of the accused. On the one hand the prosecution has been deprived of the right to retrial which would certainly have been ordered had the case been tried in an ordinary Sessions Court and, on the other hand, it is insisted that the case should be determined by the probable verdict of a hypothetical jury. The fact that a retrial cannot be ordered ought to make the Court in the interests of justice, careful to avoid setting aside a conviction on grounds which, however, plausible they have been made to appear, have no solid foundation in fact. Therefore, it was, I think, that by making the terms of the statute so wide the legislature intentionally provided that the Court should be unhampered by technicalities, and any attempt to introduce restrictions on the powers of the Court where there are none in the statute is I think, to be deprecated. Great respect is due to the views expressed by Sir Barnes Peacock, Chief Justice in the case of Elahee Buksh, In re (13) and quoted with approval by Sir Francis Maclean, C. J., in the case of Emperor v. Charu Chunder Mukerjee (14).

"Although I am of opinion that the legislature intended that the Sudder Court should have the power of setting aside a verdict of guilty pronounced by a jury upon an erroneous or defective summing up of the evidence by the presiding Judge, yet I think it was not their intention that a verdict of guilty should be set aside in every case in which there is a defective or erroneous summing up. It was their intention to provide protection for the innocent but not chances of escape for the guilty if every convict against whom a verdict of guilty is pronounced by a jury has a right to have that verdict set aside upon appeal and to obtain his discharge whenever it can be shown that the presiding Judge has not properly directed the jury as to the degree of weight which ought to be given to particular evidence, a wide door would be thrown open for the escape of guilty men, and the due administration of the criminal law of this country should be placed in the greatest jeopardy Elahee Buksh, In re (13)."

This was the interpretation put upon the statute in 1866 and it is well recog-

(11) [1890] 17 Cal. 642.

alized that a contemporaneous interpretation is the best and strongest in law.

From this point of view if the Court is convinced on the evidence that the accused is guilty he should not be acquitted merely on account of a defective charge.

I think, therefore, with great respect to the views of my learned colleagues to whom I have submitted this judgment in advance, that this application for review, ought to be refused.

Where the bride at the time when the marriage was entered into is above 14 but below 21 and the girl has not obtained the consent of her father it is but right for the Court to pronounce the order that the marriage was null and be dissolved. [P 631 C 2]

(b) Special Marriage Act (3 of 1872), Sch. 2 Amendment suggested.

The omission in the application prescribed in the Sch. 2 as to statement of actual age of the parties and whether or not each party is of the age of 21 is pointed out and brought to notice and necessary amendments suggested. [P 631 C 2]

D. N. Sen, Srish Chandra Sen Gupta and Satyendra Kishore Ghose—for Petitioner.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case, the learned District Judge of Dacca has had before him a petition under the Special Marriage Act of 1872, asking that a certain marriage may be declared null on the ground that the woman at the time of the marriage in 1926 had not completed the age of 21 years and had not obtained the consent of her father. It appears that this girl was a pupil of the Eden Intermediate College at Dacca and that the respondent was a person who had been employed as her tutor and that on 9th April 1926, they went before the Registrar and made declarations under the Special Marriage Act. Both of them are Hindus and the Special Marriage Act would not, therefore, apply to them at all, but for recent legislation, namely, Act 30 of 1923. It appears that the form of the declaration at the end of the schedule to the Special Marriage Act of 1872 contains a paragraph which has to be sworn to when the party has not completed the age of 21 years to say that the consent of the father or guardian has been given. In this case, the declaration was correctly filled up, but this paragraph appears to have been omitted altogether. Neither of the parties appears to have committed perjury, therefore, in this matter. But it is certainly very remarkable that the forms given in Sch. 2 do not require the parties to state what their actual age is, and, in particular whether or not each party is of the age of twenty one years. All that is required is that the bridegroom is to state that he is 18 years old and the bride is to state that she is 14 years old. This appears to me to open the door to great laxity. In this case, it appears to me that there has been some remissness in respect of the fact that the paragraph dealing with the consent of the father has apparently been omitted from the declaration altogether. I think this case is one which might usefully be made an occasion for a careful consideration of the working of this Act, in view of the recent legislation of 1923 and I propose to send a copy of the judgment of this Court in this case to the Government of Bengal in order that they may have an opportunity of considering the matter.

On the merits of the petition, I am satisfied that it has been now properly proved that at the time this pretended marriage was entered into, the girl did not have the consent of her father and, accordingly, under the express terms of S. 17, Special Marriage Act, it was right for the learned District Judge to pronounce the order which he has pronounced and which, in my judgment, ought now to be confirmed. The petitioner will have the costs of this applications. The costs will be assessed at three gold mohurs.

Graham, J.—This rule was issued in connexion with certain proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. in the Court of the Sub-Divisional Officer of Habiganj in the District of Sylhet. Those proceedings related to a large tract of land comprising about 11000 acres, part of which consisted of tea gardens and part of forest lands. Two parties claimed possession of these lands, namely, the Baraoora Tea Co. through Mr D. Tullock of Rashidpur Tea Estate, first party, and one Suruj Mean alias Abdul Rahaman Choudhury and 27 other persons being the second party. Included among the second party there were some Tipras and the present rule was issued in the interest of five of those tipras. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate made a very elaborate and careful enquiry and on a consideration of the evidence, both oral and documentary came to the conclusion that the first party was in possession of the disputed land and made an order accordingly. Thereafter some of the second party moved the Sessions Judge of Sylhet but the learned Judge rejected their application. The petitioners then moved this Court and obtained this rule which was granted upon ground 2 as set out in the petition to this Court, which is in these terms:

"For that in view of the admitted facts the second party Tipras are in actual possession of a portion of the disputed lands by erecting their homesteads and cultivating jhums the order of the Magistrate directing the first party to be in possession of the disputed lands till evicted by a competent Court of law is improper, illegal and without jurisdiction."

It appears that this same contention was urged before the Sessions Judge who, however, rejected it on the ground that the tipras

"had not claimed possession as tenants of the first party but had put forward a claim to possession which was entirely inconsistent and mutually exclusive of the claim put forward by the first party."

We do not think that the view taken by the learned Sessions Judge can be supported. In proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., all that the Court is concerned with is the actual de facto possession of the land in question. It does not appear to have ever been disputed by the first party that these tipras are, or were at the date of the initiation of the proceedings in possession of certain punjis or homesteads and of certain jhum land as tenants of the first party. Indeed that was also part of the case of the first party before the Sub-Divisional Officer. It may be true that the tipperas did not acknowledge the first party as their landlords and had attorned to the second party. That, however, cannot affect the right of the tipperas in a summary proceeding of this kind to be maintained in possession of the land of which they were found to be in occupation.

So far as petitioners 3 to 7 are concerned this rule must therefore be made absolute and the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate declaring the first party to be in possession of the disputed land is confirmed subject to this modification that, so far as the homesteads and jhum cultivation in occupation of petitioners 3 to 7 at the date of the initiation of the proceedings is concerned, the possession of the first party is declared through those petitioners.

The rule is discharged as regards the petitioners other than petitioners 3 to 7.

In view of the order which we have made petitioners 3 to 7 will not be liable for any portion of the costs awarded by Court below in favour of the first party.

Suhrawardy, J.—This rule has been issued on the application of the crown against an order of the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta discharging the accused persons under S. 253, Criminal P. C. The facts are that on 10th January 1928 one Gulzari Mull Thakur laid a complaint before the Chief Presidency Magistrate against the accused in respect of offences under Ss. 380, 411 and 403, I. P. C. The learned Magistrate ordered the Deputy Commissioner of the Detective Department for enquiry into the matter. On 10th February the police produced the two accused under arrest before the Magistrate who remanded them to hajut. On 13th February 1928 the police submitted charge-sheet against the two accused. It appears from the charge sheet that accused 1 was charged under S. 380 for stealing a deed of conveyance or in the alternative for dishonestly retaining it in his possession. The first accused was further charged with an offence under S. 471 for fraudulently and dishonestly using as genuine two forged documents namely, one acknowledgment receipt dated 2nd July 1927 and one counterfoil of rent bills book. The second accused was charged under S. 414 read with S. 511 for voluntarily assisting each other in attempting to dispose of the stolen deed of conveyance and he was also charged under S. 471 read with S. 114 for aiding and abetting accused 1 in the fraudulent use of the forged document. On 17th February 1928 accused 1 instituted a suit in the original side of the High Court on the aforesaid acknowledgment receipt claiming equitable mortgage on the basis of it. With the plaint he attached only an English translation of the receipt. On 4th April at the instance of the accused the documents said to be forged were sent to the Registrar, Original Side of this Court. On 2nd May 1928, the suit instituted by the accused was dismissed for non-prosecution. The application for its restoration also failed as the accused did not carry out the condition on which the learned Judge had ordered the restoration of the suit. On these facts the learned Magistrate is of opinion that a suit having been brought in a civil Court on the basis of the document which is said to have been fraudulently used sanction of the Court is necessary and that the prosecution cannot go on without such a sanction. In this view of the matter the learned Magistrate has discharged the accused under S. 253, Criminal P. C.

It is argued on behalf of the Crown that the view taken by the Magistrate is not correct in law, as the offences with which the accused were charged had been taken cognizance of before the suit was brought in the civil Court. With regard to the offences under Ss. 318 and 411 it is conceded by the learned counsel on behalf of the accused that there is no bar, legal or otherwise, to the accused being tried separately although he at the same time contends that all the offences should be tried together. With regard to the offence under S. 471 he tries to support the view of the Magistrate by saying that when a suit is brought in respect of a document said to have been used as genuine the accused cannot be prosecuted for offences under S. 471 even though he may have used this document prior to the institution of the suit. There is no authority for this proposition but we have been referred to some cases which apparently have no bearing on the question. There are many features in this case which distinguish it from the case of Nalini Kanto Laha v. Anukul Chandra Laha (1). In that case the suit was brought before the complaint was made in a criminal Court. There were charges of forgery and of using forged document before the Sub-Registrar subsequently, that document was produced and used in proceeding under S. 105, Criminal P. C., and since an offence of using a forged document was committed in connexion with proceedings in Court the learned Judges were of opinion in view of S. 195-1 (c), Criminal P. C., that for such a user the accused could not be prosecuted for using a forged document before it was used in Court. The learned Judges relied upon some cases which apparently do not support in its entirety the view that was taken and it is not necessary to consider those cases since in the present case the complaint was made by the complainant and the charge sheet was submitted by the police before the institution of the suit by the accused.

Another question was raised in the Court below as to whether calling of the documents from the custody of the Deputy Commissioner of Police by the Registrar is an user within the meaning of S. 471, I. P. C. It is contended on behalf of the Crown that it is not such an user and reliance has been placed on the case of Muni Sidami Mudaliar v. Rathnam Pillai (2). In that case the accused was prosecuted for offences among other sections under Ss. 465, 467 and 474. The document in support of which the offences are alleged to have been committed was not actually produced in Court in the suit but was disclosed in an affidavit filed therein and inspection thereof was allowed to the other side and it was filed in the office of the translator of the High Court for translation. On these facts it was held that it was not used or given in evidence in the suit and that therefore sanction under S. 195 was not necessary. This case apparently supports the view urged by the Crown but it is not necessary to go into this matter as on the facts of the case I am of opinion that the prosecution in the present case can proceed without a complaint by the civil Court. If effect were given to the contention of the accused that because he has brought a suit in the original side of the High Court the criminal Court is incompetent to take cognizance of the offence under S. 471 without sanction from such Court, it will make prosecution depend on the will of the accused. In the present case it may be presumed that the suit was brought in the High Court solely for the purpose of defeating the prosecution. It was not prosecuted and was allowed to be dismissed for default. It is difficult to hold that the prosecution of a party should be in his hand and should depend upon the course he adopts to defeat it. At any rate there was no occasion for the Magistrate to say that the prosecution required sanction under law.

I accordingly make this rule absolute set aside the order of the Magistrate dated 31st August 1928, discharging the accused and send the case back to him for disposal according to law.

Accused 2 who has appeared separately has urged that on the materials before us no substantive offence is disclosed against him. This is a matter with which we cannot deal in the present rule. It is only confined to the legality or otherwise of the order of the Chief Presidency Magistrate discharging the accused on the ground that he could not be prosecuted without sanction from the High Court.

Graham, J.—I agree that the rule should be made absolute. Having regard to the facts and circumstances it seems to me that the order of the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate discharging the accused cannot be supported. The main reasons which appear to have actuated the learned Magistrate, as stated by him, are that it is a very serious case involving a charge of forgery, and that as the accused had brought a suit in this

(1) [1917] 44 Cal. 1002=25 C. L. J. 255=39 I. C. 490=21 C. W. N. 640.

(2) A. I. R. 1923 Mad. 136=45 Mad. 928 (F.B.).

Court in which use was made, or is said to have been made of the forged document in question, a formal complaint by the High Court ought to have been made.

It is to be observed, however, that prior to the institution of the suit the accused had already been sent up by the police under Ss. 380, 411, 414, 511 and 471, I. P. C. and cognizance of those offences had been taken. It is difficult to understand why, because a suit was subsequently instituted by the accused, the case should not proceed in respect of the charges referred to above, none of which requires any sanction. Nor is it easy to appreciate why as a consequence of the action taken by the accused at a subsequent stage the complainant should be deprived of his right to redress so far as those charges are concerned. When upon the facts the commission of several offences is disclosed, some of which require sanction, and others do not, it is open to the complainant, if he so wishes, to proceed in respect of those only which do not require sanction.

It appears further that there was no trial of the suit in this Court and that it was dismissed for non-prosecution. The High Court could not therefore, make a complaint under S. 476 or S. 471 without first making an enquiry into the matter. That, however, is perhaps not a very material circumstance. The main point is that the complainant is entitled as of right to have his case tried in respect of the charges previously made, and in regard to which cognizance has already been taken. There does not seem to be any reason why he should be compelled, whether he is willing or not, to add to the other charges, a charge under section 476 in respect of the proceedings before this Court, these proceedings, as I have already said, having arisen in consequence of the action subsequently taken by the accused.

For these reasons I agree to the order which my learned brother has made.

Criminal Revn. Case No. 254 of 1929,

(a) Press Act (25 of 1867), "S. 13 — Press means press for printing books and papers and must be workable.

The press that is referred to in S. 13 is a press for the printing of books and papers, and so in order to sustain a conviction under S. 13 it is necessary to find that the press was in sufficiently fit condition to enable the printing of books or papers thereby.

(b) Press Act (25 of 1867), S. 13—Burden of proving that press is workable is on prosecution.

It is for the prosecution to establish that the press was one which required a declaration and in order to do so the prosecution must prove that it was in workable order.

Mrityunjay Chattopadhyaya and Bhola Nath Roy—for Petitioner.

Order.—The petitioner in this case has been convicted under S. 13, Press Act 25 of 1867. S. 13 runs thus :

"Whoever shall keep in his possession any such press as aforesaid without making such a declaration as is required by S. 4 of this Act shall etc."

To understand what is meant by "any such press" reference has to be made to S. 4 which says :

"No person in British India shall keep in his possession any press for the printing of books or papers etc."

It is clear, therefore, that the press that is referred to in S. 13 is a press for the printing of books and papers, in other words, to sustain a conviction under S. 13 it is necessary to find that the press was in a sufficiently fit condition to enable the printing of books or papers thereby. The trial Magistrate in the explanation which he has submitted is quite right in referring to his own findings in his judgment which are to the effect that there was printing of certain invitation cards in the press. The learned Sessions Judge who heard the appeal preferred by the petitioner from the conviction by the trial Court, however, has thought fit to disbelieve the evidence relating to such printing. Having done so the learned Judge has referred to the evidence that was adduced on behalf of the defence for the purpose of establishing that the press was at the place where it was found for the purpose of repairs and apparently being of opinion that it was for the defence to establish that the press was out of repairs has upheld the petitioner's conviction. In the view as regards the onus that the learned Judge took I am of opinion that he was wrong.

It was for the prosecution to establish that the press was one which required a declaration and in order to do so it was for the prosecution to show that it was a press in workable order. This has not been done and indeed the evidence that they adduced for that purpose has been disbelieved by the learned Sessions Judge. In this state of facts even if the evidence for the defence be not acceptable the conviction of the petitioner is not sufficiently justified.

The result is that the rule is made absolute, the conviction is set aside and the fine if paid by the petitioner will be refunded.

Appeals Nos. 432 to 445 of 1927, Decided on 25th February 1929, from appellate decrees of 1st Sub-Judge. Sylhet, D/- 15th September 1926.

(a) Registration Act (1908), S. 49—Admission in unregistered documents is admissible.

Although under S. 49 document which should be registered and is not registered is inadmissible as evidence of a transaction affecting property, yet when it is put forward as containing an admission it is not being put forward as evidence of a transaction affecting property and so it cannot be said to be inadmissible as evidence of an admission; 39 M. L. J. 382, Foll. [P 637 C 1, 2]

(b) Hindu Law—Joint family—Separate property—If owner waives his right and voluntarily throws it into common stock it can become joint property.

Property originally self-acquired may become joint property if it has been voluntarily thrown into the joint stock with the intention of abandoning all separate claims upon it. Question whether he has done so or not is entirely one of fact to be decided in the light of all the circumstances of the case. But a clear intention to waive his separate rights must be established and will not be inferred from acts which may have been done merely from kindness or affection. [P 638 C 1, 2]

(c) Transfer of Property Act, S. 41—"Reasonable care"—It is not enough for party attempting to invalidate sale to show that proper enquiry was not made, but must show what circumstances there were to put purchaser on enquiry, and what facts would have been revealed—Onus then lies on purchaser to prove reasonable care on his part.

It is not enough to say that proper enquiry was not made. It must be shown that there was something to call attention and invoke an enquiry. It must be shown that there were means of answering the enquiry. It must be shown what enquiry would have revealed. Then it is that to entitle the purchaser to the benefit of S. 41 it must be shown by him to the satisfaction of the Court that he took reasonable care within the meaning of the section. It is when the preliminary burden is discharged by the party attempting to defeat his title that the onus of proving reasonable care lies on the purchaser for value without notice. [P 638 C 1]

Brojo Lal Chakravarty and Hemendra Kumar Das—for Appellants.

Biraj Mohan Majumdar and Birendra Kumar Dey—for Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff brings his suit for arrears of rent and he is met with a defence to the effect that the suit for rent is bad because the plaintiff has title only to four annas share of the superior interest and he has not proved or did assert any right to a separate collection of his share of rent. The suit not being brought in accordance with the special provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act which enable a cosharer by suing the other cosharers to claim a part of the rent the whole suit is defeated unless the plaintiff can show himself to be entitled to sixteen annas of the rent. Mr Brojo Lal Chakravarty for the appellant does not dispute that proposition as a matter of law. The contest in this case is whether or not the learned Subordinate Judge has correctly dealt with the issues which arise upon the question whether or not the plaintiff has made out his title to the whole of the rent.

Now it appears that at first sight there is something startling about the way in which the Courts below have dealt with this case. It would appear that Dolegovinda was a mukhtear and according to the findings of fact he had an elder brother Radha Kanta who had an even larger practice as a mukhtear than himself. He bought this property now in question in 1884. He took the conveyance in his own name. He got it entered in the books of the Collectorate in a separate account in his own name. He took kabuliats from these very tenants or their predecessors in his own name. It appears that at least on one occasion he took for himself the money which represented a land acquisition award. Then after his death when his representatives had sold to the plaintiff these tenants set up this defence that the whole suit was bad because the property as a matter of fact did not belong to Dolegovinda but belonged to the family of which Dolegovinda was merely one member. That certainly seems to me paradoxical and I must say that I have examined the judgments of the Court below with some care to see whether it is really in accordance with the correct view of the law.

Mr. Brojo Lal Chakravarty for the appellant takes three objections. First of all he says that there is a part of a compromise deed which is void for want of registration but which nevertheless is admissible in evidence as an admission by the brother and cousins of Dolegovinda that this property belonged to Dolegovinda alone. He says that that is a matter which the Court below has brushed aside under the impression apparently that for want of registration the document can be looked at for no purpose. In the second place he says that under S. 41, T. P. Act, the Courts below have brushed aside his client's claim to be treated as a purchaser for value without notice on the ground that he made no proper enquiry into the title. He says that if one looks at the decisions in Gholam Sidhique Khan v. Jogendra Nath (1) and in MacNeil & Co. v. Saroda Sundari Debi (2) one would find that one cannot defeat a claim to the protection given by S. 41 without definitely showing what circumstances there were to put the purchaser upon enquiry, what facts would have been found out by enquiry and so forth. Complaint is made that this matter has not been properly dealt with as a matter of law. The third complaint which is made is that the judgment of the Subordinate Judge misplaces the onus of proving that the self-acquired property of Dolegovinda was thrown into the common stock.

There is something in each of these objections. In my judgment the document Nirdeshpatra as it is called cannot be said to be inadmissible as evidence of an admission. If one looks at S. 49, Registration Act, one finds that documents which should be registered and are not registered are inadmissible as evidence of a transaction affecting the property, but when they are put forward as containing an admission it does not seem to me that they are being put forward as evidence of a transaction affecting that property. An authority for that proposition is to be found in Rajangam Ayyar v. Rajangam Ayyar (3). When one comes, however, to see what the effect of this admission would be together with the other evidence in the case one finds this that a particular term out of a lot of others was that the representatives of the other branch should admit that the land in question—taluk No. 4—was self-acquired property of Dolegovinda.

"We the other parties never had nor have any claim or title thereto. As we are not aware of the details of our properties we filed a written statement alleging that we have title thereto. We shall withdraw our said objection."

The Munsiff in the first Court took the view that this was a part of the bargain. The bargain having gone off there is no great evidentiary force in that paragraph if it be looked at as an admission, and the learned Subordinate Judge has not looked at the matter from that point of view at all. It does seem to me that this admission is something that is being bought, if one may put it so, by the other terms of the deed. At the same time it is just noticeable that the parties do not say:

"we give up claim as one of the terms of this deed, to any title in taluk No. 4."

They go on to explain that they never had a claim and that their pretension to a claim was under a mistake. That I think has to be considered when we come to the question of fact in this case.

The next point that arises is as regards S. 41, T. P. Act. I am quite satisfied that it is idle in this case to say that S. 41 does not apply because Dolegovinda was not a benamdar. What the section deals with is a person with the consent, express or implied, of the persons interested in an immovable property being the ostensible owner of such property. That is just exactly the position of Dolegovinda according to the defendants. The property stood in his name and a separate account was made; and it seems to me therefore, that the only question under S. 41 for our consideration is the question whether the plaintiff having bought from Dolegovinda's representatives took reasonable care to ascertain that his transferrer had power to make the transfer.

(1) A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 916.

(2) A. I. R. 1929 Cal. 83.

(3) [1920] 39 M. L. J. 382=57 I. C. 18=12 M. L. W. 435.

There, as I have said, the appellant says:

"It is not enough to say that proper enquiry was not made. It must be shown that there was something to call attention and invoke an enquiry. It must be shown that there were means of answering the enquiry. It must be shown what the enquiry would have revealed."

That is quite sound law, but in the present case we have to apply the doctrine to a somewhat peculiar position. It is clearly for the plaintiff to satisfy us that he took "reasonable care" within the meaning of the section, and when we look at the evidence it seems that it is pretty plain that it is impossible to say that the plaintiff has affirmatively shown that he took reasonable care over this transaction at all. He did not even see the main document of title passing the property to Dolegovinda. It is true that he got certain title-deeds from his vendor. Certain title-deeds he got in that way and we have the fact that the property was entered in his name as separate estate No. 41. But in view of the plaintiff's evidence and of the burden of proof being upon him I find it very difficult to see how any Court can say that he has satisfied the burden which lay under S. 41. Both Courts have dealt with the matter rather summarily just for the reason that the plaintiff's evidence is in so perilous a condition. The Munsiff paid a good deal of attention to the fact that shortly before a near neighbour of the plaintiff made an offer for this property and finally the contract for sale went off. I find it a little difficult to gather from the judgment what exactly the facts were about that and whether if the plaintiff had made an enquiry he would have known anything in particular and if so what. Putting that matter on one side altogether, it remains that if the Courts have dealt with this contention somewhat similarly it is because the evidence is in a state which is highly unsatisfactory.

I now come to consider the way in which the learned Subordinate Judge has dealt with the main point. The learned Subordinate Judge finds that this property was bought with Dolegovinda's own money. So far, therefore, it is the self-acquired property of Dolegovinda. It is quite true that it is possible even so to apply the principle that a property originally self-acquired may become joint property if it has been voluntarily thrown by the owner into the joint stock with the intention of abandoning all separate claims upon it. The learned author Mr. Mayne in his well known book on Hindu Law says:

"The question whether he has done so or not is entirely one of fact, to be decided in the light of all the circumstances of the case but a clear intention to waive his separate rights must be established and will not be inferred from acts which may have been done merely from kindness or affection."

The learned Subordinate Judge in this case having found that the property was self-acquired goes on to say:

"Now the question arises whether he treated this property as his exclusive and separate property. The evidence does not support this theory."

The learned Judge should have asked himself whether there was sufficient evidence to support the opposite theory and to show that Dolegovinda had thrown it into the common stock with an intention to abandon his individual right. There are other passages which seem to show that the learned Judge was equally unhappy in expressing himself. However, when I come to look at the basis of the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge I find this: I find first of all that the question of the admission in the Nirdehpatra is overlooked. Then I find that there is in the year 1888 in connexion with Dolegovinda's application for mutation of names a very strong piece of evidence to the effect that this property in the name of Dolegovinda was really of the joint family. I regard that piece of evidence as particularly strong and again in the written statement Ex. F—it is true that it is a written statement to a suit by a stranger—Dolegovinda does, unnecessarily it is true but quite clearly, state after reciting his title that he has been in possession of this property along with the other members of his family. These are I think extremely strong pieces of evidence to show that Dolegovinda was putting this property into the joint fund and when I come to look at the circumstances of the case I find this that the elder brother Radhakanta, who was apparently a gentleman with a larger practice of the two had admittedly left his self-acquired property to go to the common stock. Radhakanta was the karta of the family till his death. After him Dolegovinda became the karta; and in these circumstances, it does seem to me that the mere fact that the property was bought with Dolegovinda's funds is by no means conclusive and there is very strong evidence on the record to show that in any case Dolegovinda did put this property into the common stock. That evidence is assisted in various ways by evidence which by itself, I confess, would not be enough to persuade me. It would appear that so far from keeping a separate clerk and a separate set of books for this particular estate Dolegovinda let it be managed like the other family properties and it certainly appears that from time to time the proceeds of the rent are differently shown to have been applied for the joint family purpose. There was evidence of a gentleman named Dwarakanath Dutta who was a family friend and acted for the brothers; and, as far as I can make out, his evidence was definitely in favour of the defendants.

In these circumstances the real question that we have to consider is this:—Having regard to the fact that the Nir-deshpatra was not treated exactly in accordance with the principles of law and having regard to the fact that the learned Subordinate Judge has expressed himself at times as though the burden were on the plaintiff to show that Dolegovinda did not put this property into the common stock, is it desirable or necessary for us to send this matter back to have another adjudication upon this question of fact. I do not think so for two reasons: first of all because I take very much the same view of the evidentiary value of para. 5 of the Nir-deshpatra as was taken by the Munsiff. I think it would be unsafe to rely upon that as anything except a term of bargain. However that may be having regard to the other evidence to which I have referred I think its weight is comparatively slight. On the other question of onus what I feel is this that while the learned Subordinate Judge has thought that though there was a presumption in the circumstances that this property was bought with Dolegovinda's own earnings he has not sufficiently considered this that the treatment of the property is in itself evidence as to whether or not the property was bought for Dolegovinda alone or for his family including himself. It appears to me that if this case were sent back with the best instructions which we can give on points of law it would be very little likely that any different result would have been arrived at. We have examined into the evidence ourselves with very considerable care and have spent a good deal of time and I am satisfied from what we gather from the evidence that it is better that we should here bring this matter to a decision and in my judgment the broad finding of fact that the property belonged to the family is on the whole right and we ought not to disturb the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge merely because on the two points that I have mentioned it could possibly be criticized. I think the appeals must fail and be dismissed with costs. The application for taking additional evidence in this Court is withdrawn. Let the documents be returned.

Criminal Revn. No. 1130 of 1928, Decided on 27th February 1929.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 4—Scope.

Any person who knows about the commission of an offence may make a complaint.

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 439—Exercise of discretion—The Crown not moving against order of acquittal in private prosecution—Interference by High Court on grounds of justice, error or public interest alone is warranted.

In private prosecutions where the Crown does not think it proper to move against the order of acquittal the High Court should not ordinarily interfere and it does so only when it is satisfied that there has been an error of law committed by the acquitting Court or where there has been a gross miscarriage of justice or in public interest. Suhrawardy, J.—In this case the accused were convicted by the trying Magistrate under Ss. 426 and 323, I. P. C. and sentenced to pay fines. On appeal the learned District Magistrate held that the mischief was committed with reference to a hut which had not belonged to the complainant but to his father from whom he was living separately. In this view he acquitted the accused. About the end of his judgment the learned District Magistrate commented upon the evidence of two of the witnesses for the prosecution which he thought was not true. He concludes his judgment with these words :

"As already stated the case fails because the person interested, complainant's father, has taken no interest in the matter."

The real ground upon which the learned District Magistrate acquitted the accused was that the complainant was not entitled in law to make the complaint. Against the order of acquittal this rule has been obtained on the ground that the view of law taken by the Magistrate is erroneous. There can be no question that a complaint may be made by any person who knows about the commission of an offence and not necessarily by the injured party. The definition of "complaint" in S. 4, Criminal P. C. supports the view accepted on several occasions. It has not been seriously contended on behalf of the opposite party before us that the view which the Magistrate has taken that the complainant in this case is not entitled to maintain the complaint is correct.

The next question is whether we should interfere in this matter when the accused has been acquitted by the lower appellate Court. There is no doubt that the principle which we generally keep in view is that in private prosecutions where the Crown does not think it proper to move against the order of acquittal we should not ordinarily interfere and we do so only when we are satisfied that there has been an error of law committed by the acquitting Court or where there has been a gross miscarriage of justice or in public interest. The present case, it seems, is one of these cases. The view of the law taken by the appellate Court is wrong and the case has not been disposed of by that Court upon an examination of the entire evidence in the record. The complainant had several injuries on his person which the medical evidence shows were severe. The defence admitted the occurrence but they accounted for the injuries on the complainant by saying that they were caused by a tin shed falling upon him. This theory, the medical evidence, does not support. Other witnesses were examined for the prosecution some of whom seem to be disinterested and were relied upon by the trying Magistrate. We do not think that there has been a proper enquiry into the facts of this case and the order of acquittal should accordingly be set aside.

I should note here that with regard to the capacity of the complainant to make the complaint he had undoubtedly such a right for the injuries inflicted on him. There can be no doubt that so far as that charge was concerned the complainant was the proper person to make the complaint. We, therefore, make the rule absolute, set aside the order of acquittal passed by the appellate Court and direct that the appeal be reheard.

Graham, J.—I agree that the rule should be made absolute. It is the long established practice of this Court not to interfere with orders of acquittal in revision on the ground that the Local Government can be moved to file an appeal against the acquittal. In this instance the Local Government has been moved and has declined to take action. Speaking for myself I do not think we should in such cases allow our discretion to be fettered in any way, and, where there has been an error of law as opposed to fact I would be prepared to interfere in order to prevent a miscarriage of justice. The learned District Magistrate seems to have formed the opinion that the complainant had no locus standi in the case, and that he could not institute it on behalf of his father. This is not correct as a proposition of law. The general rule is that any one, who is aware of the commission of an offence, may complain. Moreover in this instance the complainant was obviously fully justified in protecting his father's house against aggression and he received several injuries, which, as the learned District Magistrate has himself observed, were proved by the medical evidence, and by some of the defence witnesses. That being so he clearly had every right to complain, and the order of acquittal which is based mainly, if not entirely, upon this erroneous ground, must be set aside.

It is true the District Magistrate has remarked that the prosecution witnesses are practically all interested but he has not dealt with that evidence and has based his decision, as I have said, mainly on the view which he has taken on the point of law. For these reasons I agree with my learned brother and to the order which he has made.

Chandra Kamal Bezboruah — Defendant.Original Civil Suit No 568 of 1924, Decided on 12th March 1929.

(a) Limitation Act, Art. 85—"Mutual account" means that each party must have received and paid to other party.

"To constitute mutual account it is not sufficient that one of the two parties should have received money and paid it on account of the other. The reason of that distinction is that in the case of proceedings at law, where each of the two parties has received and paid on account of the other what would have to be recovered would be the balance of the two accounts; and the party plaintiff would be required to prove, not merely that the other party had received money on his account, but also to enter into evidence of his own receipts and payments, a position of the case, which to say the least, would be difficult to be dealt with at law. Where one party has merely received and paid moneys on account of the other it becomes a simple case, but it is otherwise where each party has received and paid." *Phillips v. Thus where an account and the agreement upon which it was based provided for a loan by the plaintiffs to the defendants to be discharged by the proceeds of goods transmitted by the defendants to the plaintiffs the account is an account for the money paid and received by the plaintiffs and not an open mutual and current account. Judgment.—This is a suit to recover Rs. 69,942-15-0 and interest thereon alleged to be due under an agreement between the parties of 3rd February 1920 as the balance of a mutual open and current account.

The defendant does not pretend that he has not received from the plaintiffs the money for which he is being sued but I do not conceive it to be my duty to pass any comment upon his conduct in relying upon the defence which has been urged before me. In this connexion I desire to cite and make my own the words of Lord Justice Fry in Reeves v. Butcher (1),

"I have not to determine whether the defence here set up is handsome or conscientious but whether it is good in law, and I am of opinion that it is."

Now, the defence is that the claim is barred by limitation.

The suit was brought on 22nd February 1924, and therefore, unless the account in respect of which the claim is made was a mutual open and current account it is barred by limitation under Art. 59, Lim. Act.

This suit originally was tried before my brother Buckland, and a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiffs for Rs. 909-7-0. Against that decree an appeal was preferred, and the case was remanded by an Appeal Bench because the learned trial Judge had decided the case solely upon the form of the account annexed to the plaint, without taking into consideration the agreement of 3rd February 1920, and it was ordered that the suit should be tried de novo.

The Appeal Bench delivered judgment on 5th January 1928, and on 18th May the plaintiffs by petition applied for leave to amend the plaint with a view to alleging that after 18th September 1920 the parties had agreed that the defendant should be given a further year from 3rd February 1921 within which to pay off the loans advanced to him. That petition was rejected.

Again at the retrial an application was made by the plaintiffs for an amendment of the plaint in order that it might be alleged that if this account was not a mutual, open and current account, and prima facie was time barred there had been a part payment of the principal on 25th February 1921 which took the case out of the Statute of Limitation.

Having regard to O. 7, R. 6 and to prevent any embarrassment to the defendant in my discretion I have refused to allow such an amendment of the plaint. The issue to be determined therefore is, whether the account which is the foundation of the claim is governed by Art. 85, Lim. Act, which runs as follows:

"For the balance due on a mutual, open and current account where there have been reciprocal demands between the parties, three years from the close of the year in which the last item admitted or proved is entered in the account, such year to be computed as in the account."

Now, the last item in the account is a credit item in favour of the defendant of Rs. 1,103-11-5 on 25th February 1921; i. e., within three years before the suit was filed. But, what is "a mutual, open and current account where there have been reciprocal demands" within the meaning of Art. 85. At the trial a number of authorities were cited for the purpose of showing that an account in one particular form or another came within the ambit of Art. 85. But an authority is only of value for the principle of law to be extracted from it, and when once the principle is understood it tends to confuse the issue for the Court to consider the special facts of other cases instead of concentrating its attention upon the facts of the particular case to be determined.

The meaning of a mutual account was stated with singular clarity by Vice Chancellor Turner in Phillips v Phillips (2) and no better explanation of the meaning of the term mutual account is, I think to be found in any of the authorities:

"I understand a mutual account to mean, not merely where one of two parties has received money and paid it on account of the other, but where each of two parties has received and paid on the other's account. I take the reason of that distinction to be that, in the case of proceedings at law, where each of two parties has received and paid on account of the other, what would have to be recovered would be the balance of the two accounts; and the party plaintiff would be required to prove not merely that the other party had received money on his account, but also to enter into evidence of his own receipts and payments, a position of the case, which to say the least, would be difficult to be dealt with at law. Where one party has merely received and paid moneys on account of the other it becomes a simple case. The party plaintiff has to prove that the moneys have been received, and the other party has to prove his payments. The question is only as to the receipts on one side and the payments on the other, and it is a mere question of set off; but it is otherwise where each party has received and paid: see also Hirada Bassappa v. Gadigi Mudappa (3); Velu Pillai v. Ghose Mahomed (4); Ram Pershad v. Harbans Singh (5) and Shivi Gowda v. Fernandes (6)."

A perusal of the account annexed to the plaint by itself would lead to the conclusion that it is not a "mutual open and current account whether there have been reciprocal demands between the parties."

It is an account of payments made and received by the plaintiffs alone, and does not purport to refer to any receipts or payments by the defendant on the plaintiffs' account. The terms of the agreement of 3rd February 1920, in my opinion, lead to the same conclusion. To my mind it is clear that the object and effect of that agreement was to create a security for the repayment of any sums which might be advanced by the plaintiffs up to Rs. 80,000 by the hypothecation of the tea crop for the current year in which the advances were to be made. It appears that the defendant was anxious to obtain financial assistance in order to exploit the resources of his tea garden during the year 1920-1921, and approached the plaintiffs with that object in view. It was for this purpose that the agreement of 3rd February 1920 was entered into. It is an agreement whereby the plaintiffs agreed to accommodate the defendant to an extent not exceeding Rs. 80,000 subject, inter alia, to the condition that

"advances will be made for so long and to such extent only as you shall, under the condition and circumstances of my gardens and crop in your discretion think fit, and that you may discontinue them as and whenever you consider expedient under such condition and circumstances with one month's notice to me."

It was agreed that the defendant's account in the plaintiff's books should bear interest at 9 per cent per annum with half yearly rests and incidental charges, "and the amount for the time being due to you on the said account will be repaid by me to you on demand, or if no demand be made within one year from the date hereof."

The security was created by a hypothecation of the entire tea crop and produce of the garden, and the defendant agreed to:

"send and transmit the said tea to Calcutta to you for the purpose of same being sold in Calcutta by public auction for such price as you consider reasonable."

Provision was also made to enable the plaintiffs to take steps by seizure of the crop or otherwise to protect their security if the defendant did not hold or transmit the crop to the plaintiff pursuant to the agreement. On 18th September 1920 the plaintiffs gave notice under the agreement, as they were entitled to do, demanding repayment of the advances made up till that date :

"with interest thereon within 7 days from date otherwise we shall take such steps to realize same as advised by our solicitors."

It appears from the account, and is not now disputed by the defendant that after 18th September 1920 certain sums were debited against him in the account as having been paid under the agreement by the plaintiffs, and it was proved by oral evidence before me that on 28th December 1920 and the 25th February 1921 two sums of Rs. 999-11-11 and Rs. 1,103-11 5 being the sale-proceeds of tea transmitted by the defendant to the plaintiffs under the agreement, were received by the plaintiffs.

In my opinion upon the evidence adduced at the trial this account was not :

"a mutual open or current account where there have been reciprocal demands between the parties" within Art. 85, Lim. Act. To my mind the account and the agreement upon which it was based provided for a loan by the plaintiffs to the defendant to be discharged pro tanto by the proceeds of tea transmitted by the defendant to the plaintiffs under the agreement, and the account is what it purports to be, namely, an account of moneys paid and received by the plaintiffs on the defendant's behalf and :

"where one party has merely received and paid moneys on account of the other it becomes a simple case : per Vice-Chancellor Turner, Phillips v. Phillips (2) "

I invited learned counsel for the plaintiffs more than once to state whether there was any period of time after the agreement was entered into when the defendant was in a position to say to the plaintiffs : "I have an account against you" and the only answer that I received was that inasmuch as the sales by the plaintiffs must be by public auction the defendant was entitled to claim that the plaintiffs should satisfy him that the tea had duly been sold by public auction. But that is no evidence of a mutual account. The agreement provided that the defendant should not be entitled to challenge the quantum of the proceeds of the sales, and the right to call upon the plaintiffs to satisfy the defendant that the sales had been by public auction is one thing, it is quite another that the defendant should be in a position to say that having received and made payments on behalf of the plaintiffs he was entitled to demand from the plaintiffs payment of the balance due from the plaintiffs to him in respect of such receipts and payments. In my opinion, the account in suit was not a mutual account; indeed it was not pretended that the account was one in which there had been reciprocal demands made between the parties, for there was no evidence and no argument to the effect that the defendant had ever made or was in a position to make any sort of demand whatever upon the plaintiffs in respect of this transaction. In my opinion the claim in the present case is a claim for money lent under an agreement that it shall be repaid on demand and inasmuch as the demand was made on 18th September 1920 the suit is barred by limitation. It is not uninteresting although in no way do I base my judgment upon it, to recall that on 1st June 1928 after the application for the amendment of the plaint had been dismissed the present plaintiffs became the assignees from the Indian Planters' Agency Company, Limited, of all their rights against the defendant in respect of the agreement of 3rd February 1920 for a consideration of Rs. 5,000, which, however, according to the oral testimony at the trial it so happens has not yet been paid. Learned counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs further urged that even if the account was not a mutual open and current account within Art. 85 the demand of 18th September 1920 was not to be regarded as putting an end to the account and in support of his contention he referred to subsequent entries of payments appearing in the account as having been made on behalf of the defendant by the plaintiffs. But there was no evidence and there was no argument to the effect that these subsequent payments were made under the agreement at the request or with the assent of the defendant. In my opinion the plaintiffs are entitled to receive no more than the amount decreed by my brother Buckland at the first hearing namely, Rs. 909-7-0, and there will be a decree for that amount in favour of the plaintiffs.

As regards costs, this suit is governed by S. 22, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (15 of 1882). In Chandanmull

Kanoria v. Debi Chand (7) I held that the question whether 'the suit was cognizable by the Small Cause Court by reason of the amount or value of the subject-matter depended upon the amount or value claimed by the plaintiff and set out in the plaint. I observed that, in my opinion:

"it is not to be supposed that the legislature intended ex post facto to penalize a plaintiff because he had failed to guess correctly which was the proper Court in which to launch his suit."

I still am of opinion that the construction that I then put upon S. 22 was the reasonable one: see per Imam, J. in Sukumari Ghose v. Gopi Mohan Goswami (8). In that case, however, my attention was not drawn to the decision of a Division Bench of this Court (Maclean, C. J., Machpherson and Trevelyan, JJ.) in Ismail Ariff v. Leslie (9) in which their Lordships determined that S. 22 is applicable to cases where the sum decreed is within the amount cognizable by the Presidency Small Cause Court. My decision in Chandanmull Kanoria v. Debi Chand (7) is, I think, inconsistent with Ismail Ariff v. Leslie (9) which is binding upon me, and I take this opportunity of stating that the construction which I put upon S. 22 in Chandanmull's case (7) was not in accordance with the ratio decidendi of Ismail Ariff v. Leslie (9) and cannot be regarded as stating as correctly the law: see also Shridhan Gopinath v. Gordhandas Gokuldas (10) and per Buckland, J., in suit No. 1657 of 1922 and per Costello, J. in Rameswar Prosad Kessur Prosad v. Ramapada Ghose and Sons (11).

In the present case, the plaintiffs have recovered Rs. 909-7-0 but in my opinion, the case was a fit one to be brought in the High Court and the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for that amount with costs on the scale that is appropriate to suits in this Court in which sums under Rs. 1,000 are received.

Such costs will be awarded to the plaintiffs up to the date of the decree passed by my brother Buckland on 2nd

December 1926. The costs incurred thereafter by reason of the appeal and the retrial in my opinion have all been thrown away by reason of the fact that the plaintiffs at the retrial have recovered the same amount as was decreed in their favour at the first trial and all the costs incurred after the date of the decree of my brother Buckland, both in respect of the appeal and of the rehearing, must be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant on scale No. 2, including any reserve costs, and the costs of the commission which have been incurred since the date of the decree in the first trial.

"Profit or gain" is the cardinal constituent of the definition of a "common gaming house." [P 645 C 1]

(b) Calcutta Police Act, S. 44—Conviction under S. 44 requires sufficient evidence of gain.

For conviction under S. 44 it is necessary to have sufficient evidence of the element of "profit or gain." [P 645 C 1]

Satindra Nath Mukerjee—for Petitioner.

Order.—The petitioner Puran Mull Biwani has been convicted under S. 44, Act 4 of 1866, and sentenced to pay a fine. The offence complained of against him was under the first part of S. 44, viz., that he being the owner or occupier of a room kept or used it as a common gaming house. As I understand the case no question of permitting any other person to keep or use the room as a common gaming house, under the latter part of the section, enters into the case.

The fact that a note book (Ex. 3) was found in the room in which the petitioner's name appeared in print on the pages in the absence of any evidence as to the contents of the notebook (for the police officer says that he could not read the Hindi writing in it and did not have it translated) is very poor evidence to establish that the notebook was an "instrument of gaming." This is a serious difficulty in the way of the prosecution.

A still greater difficulty in upholding the conviction arises when the definition of "common gaming house" is considered. The definition as given in S. 3 of the Act plainly shows that the room must be one in which instruments of gaming are kept or used for the profit or gain of the person owning or keeping the room whether by way of charge for the instruments or for the room or otherwise. The learned Magistrate in his explanation has stated the following:

"It was clear from the facts and the circumstances of the case that the room in question was kept and used for the profit and gain of the man who kept or used it. It is not always possible to get direct evidence of that in such cases. It has been proved that the room was known as the accused's gadi."

Now, I do not find any evidence on the record of "profit or gain" which is the cardinal constituent of the definition of a "common gaming house." It is quite true that it is often very difficult to get direct evidence of this fact, but at the same time it is not enough to satisfy the requirements of the law that two witnesses (P. W's. 2 and 3) should have deposed that it was the accused's gadi. The matter should have been explained further and evidence should have been given, if it was at all possible to do so, to make out this element of "profit or gain" as against the petitioner.

As the evidence shows it must be held that it is wholly insufficient for the petitioner's conviction which as well as the sentence passed on the petitioner, are accordingly set aside.

The rule is made absolute. The fine, if paid will be refunded.

Raj Kumar Sinha and others—Respondents.

Appeals Nos. 1012 and 1013 of 1928, with Revision Cases Nos. 802 and 806 of 1928, respectively, Decided on 31st May 1929, against appellate decrees of Dist. Judge, Nokhali, D/- 23rd December 1927.

Bengal Tenancy Act (8 of 1885), S. 153—Suit for recovery of rent not exceeding

Rs. 50—Defendants disclaiming liability by pleading transfers—Suit involves question of title within meaning of S. 153.

If in a suit for recovery of rent valued at less than Rs. 50 some of the defendants disclaim their liability to pay rent to the landlord under the cover of transfer in favour of other defendants, then the suit involves a question of title, whether the title lay in the alleged transferees or in the transferring tenants, and liability of such tenants to pay rents and as such there is surely a question of title between persons having conflicting claims thereto within the meaning of S. 153: 31 C. W. N. 140 s.n., Foll. [P 646 C 1]

Radhika Ranjan Guha and Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta—for Appellant.

Upendra Kumar Roy—for Respondents.

Judgment.—These two appeals arise out of the same suit. They are preferred by defendants 1 and 2 separately. The suit in which these two appeals arise was brought by the plaintiffs for recovery of arrears of rent of their eight annas share at the rate of Rs. 8 and odd for the years 1327 to the Pous kist of 1330 B. S. The claim was laid at less than Rs. 50. Defendants 1 and 2 appeared and said that they were not liable for the rent of this period as defendant 1 had made a gift of this property in favour of his sister one Basanta Kumari Sur who is defendant 3 in the present litigation so far back as 2nd Chait 1321 B. S. The defence of defendant 2 was that he sold his interest in the tenure to one Omar Ali who is defendant 4 in the present suit on 26th Sravan 1319 B. S. The Munsif held that the two transfers by way of gift and sale respectively were colourable transactions and that consequently defendants 1 and 2 were liable to the plaintiffs for the rent. The suit was accordingly decreed against defendants 1 and 2 only.

Against this decision two separate appeals were preferred by defendants 1 and 2 to the Court of the District Judge of Nokhali and the learned District Judge came to the conclusion that the two appeals by the two defendants were incompetent as the suit was valued at less than Rs. 50 and the Munsif who tries the suit was vested with final powers under S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act. He accordingly dismissed the appeals on the preliminary ground and held that he would not be justified in exercising his powers of revision under the provisions of that section. The result was that the appeals

Advocate High Court

Jammu & Kashmir

by the defendants were dismissed on the preliminary ground.

Against this decision of the learned District Judge the two defendants have preferred two separate appeals and the main contention which has been raised by the learned advocate for the appellants is that the lower appellate Court was clearly in error in holding that no appeal lay to him from the decision of the Munsif. It appears to me that this contention is well founded and must prevail. There was surely a question of title as between persons having conflicting claims thereto within the meaning of S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act. Defendants 1 and 2 disclaimed the liability for rent on the ground that they had transferred their interest to defendants 3 and 4 respectively. The question arose, therefore, in this suit as to whether the title as tenant lay in defendants 1 and 2 or in defendants 3 and 4. Plaintiffs were surely concerned with the decision of the question as to who was the person to whom they would look for the rent. There is a clear conflict between the plaintiffs and defendants 1 and 2 with regard to the relationship of landlord and tenant and defendants 3 and 4 whose title as tenant is set up by the appealing defendants are parties to the present case. The case will seem to be covered by a decision to which I was a party which is not fully reported but is reported in short notes in the case of Lakhi Narayan Das v. Jharu Mohan Santra (1). That case has been sought to be distinguished by the learned advocate for the respondents on the ground that there one of the tenants claimed a certain share in the tenancy whereas here both the tenants 1 and 2 disclaimed all liability with regard to rent. I fail to see the point of this distinction. There is really no distinction in principle.

The result is that the judgments and decrees of the learned District Judge dismissing the appeals as incompetent must be set aside and the cases remitted back to him in order that he may retry the questions of fact and other questions of law involved in the case. Costs of the appeal will abide the result.

The petitions of revision are not pressed. They are accordingly dismissed without costs.

Criminal Revns. Nos. 468 and 469 of 1929, Decided on 30th May 1929.

Bengal Alluvial Lands Act, S. 10—Effect of S. 10 is to stay earlier proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C.—Criminal P. C., S. 145.

Some char lands became the subject-matter of proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., and at the time of the proceedings being initiated an attachment order was made against the lands. Various steps were taken in those proceedings and subsequently the Magistrate after reviewing the situation passed an order directing that the lands be released from attachment under S. 145 and decided to replace those proceedings with others under the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act, 1920. It was contended that S. 10 of that Act was intended to apply to proceedings under S. 145 so far as their institution or carrying on was concerned and not to the attachment order made under that section and that once an attachment was made, S. 10 conferred no right on the Collector to make a further attachment under that Act.

Held: that if the contention were sound it would result in nullifying the provisions of the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act of 1920. The provisions of S. 10 were wide enough to apply to all proceedings, including an attachment that may have been had under S. 145. The effect of S. 10, Bengal Alluvial Lands Act, would, therefore, be to stay the earlier proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C.: 13 C. W. N. 125; A. I. R. 1921 Cal 631, Dist. [P 648 C 1]

Order.—These two rules relate to two orders one of which is dated 9th January 1929 and the other dated 10th January 1929 relating to a considerable area of char lands. These lands became the subject-matter of proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., some months previously. The proceedings were drawn up about the beginning of October and at the time of the proceedings being initiated an attachment order was made against the lands. Various steps were taken in those proceedings up to the beginning of January 1929 and on 9th January 1929 the Magistrate passed an order after reviewing the situation at some length as a result of which he directed that the lands should be released from the attachment made in the S. 145 proceedings and decided to replace those proceedings with others under the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act 1920 (Bengal Act 5 of 1920). The way he puts it is this :

"The land is released from attachment under S. 145, Criminal P. C. It will be attached under the Alluvial Lands Act tomorrow."

On the following day, proceedings under the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act were instituted and an attachment was made.

The grounds which have been argued on the present rules are that the order of the Magistrate staying proceedings under S. 145 and removing the attachment is an illegal order which he had no power to make and which is not warranted by any of the provisions of S. 145. The contention is that under S. 145, sub-S. (5), there is only one method provided by law by which an order under S. 145 can be cancelled and that is where any party or any other person interested has shown that in point of fact there is no dispute which exists and in such a case, as the section says, the Magistrate shall cancel his said order and shall stay all further proceedings but subject to such cancellation the order of the Magistrate under sub-S. (1) shall be final. Reference has been made to the case of Tara Charan v. Bengal Coal Co. Ltd. (1) where the question was whether under certain circumstances proceedings under S. 145 could be quashed and it was held that the Magistrate could only quash the proceedings in accordance with the provisions of sub-S. (5), S. 145, on facts being brought to his notice which were sufficient to satisfy him that no dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace existed. Another case to the same effect, namely, the case of Ranada Ranjan v. Bharat Chandra (2) was referred to. But the question raised in that case is entirely different to that which arises in this present case. There the question concerned the procedure as to the correct method of disposal of the proceedings under S. 145. Where the question arises in those proceedings themselves there was no question, as it is here, of the method of disposal of the proceedings in a case where as in the present the alternative method of procedure has been laid down by another statute. At the time of the cases to which we have just referred the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act 1920 had not yet been passed. It is therefore necessary to decide the present case upon a consideration of the provisions of that statute. In the preamble of that Act it is stated that :

"previous sanction of the Governor-General has been obtained under S. 79, sub-S. (2), Government of India Act 1915" and the statute is directed towards making provisions to prevent disputes with regard to possession of alluvial or derelict lands in Bengal. S. 3 of the Act confers power on the Collector to attach lands of this nature and provides a procedure which is in some way analogous to the procedure already existing under S. 145. The Collector has power to make any attachment of alluvial lands and then to refer the matter to a civil Court, besides the power of giving certain directions as to costs. S. 10 of the Act is an important one for our present purposes. It provides that when the Collector has attached any alluvial land under S. 3 no proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., 1898 shall be instituted in any Court in respect of the same land or of any part thereof and that any such proceedings already commenced and pending in any such Court shall be stayed. It has been contended that that section is intended to apply to the proceedings under S. 145 so far as their institution or carrying on is concerned, and not to the attachment order which may be made under S. 145 and that once an attachment order has been made in a proceeding under S. 145, S. 10, Bengal Alluvial Lands Act of 1920, confers no right upon the Collector to make a further attachment under the powers under that Act. The answer to that contention, we think, is that it introduced limitation upon the general words in the section itself which was not to be found there. Moreover, it is to be remembered that in most, if not all, of the cases which are instituted under S. 145, Criminal P. C., this order of attachment is commonly made at the time of the institution of the proceedings.

(2) A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 631.

If the contention were sound it would result in nullifying the provisions of the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act of 1920. The position in our opinion is that the provisions of S. 10 are certainly wide enough to apply to all proceedings, including an attachment that may have been had under S. 145. The result, therefore, is as regards these two orders of the 9th and 10th January that assuming that the order of the 9th January was not strictly correct in that the proceeding under the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act should have been instituted first and it is not a matter of substance in the present case because if the order were wrong and if the proceedings under S. 145 had been allowed to continue and a proceeding had then been instituted under the Bengal Alluvial Lands Act the effect of S. 10 of that Act would be to stay the earlier proceedings.

The rules are, therefore, discharged. Let the record be sent down at once.

Appeal No. 1681 of 1925, Decided on 7th June 1928.

Civil P. C., O. 22, R. 4—Mortgage suit—Preliminary decree made—Death of one of several mortgagors and one of plaintiffs who was not necessary or proper party before final decree—Non-substitution of legal representative of deceased persons does not abate suit with respect to mortgagors on record.

Effect of non-substitution in a mortgage suit where a preliminary decree was passed in favour of the mortgagees and one of the judgment-debtors mortgagors and one of the plaintiffs who was neither a necessary nor a proper plaintiff died before the final decree, is that the suit does not abate with respect to the mortgagors on record and the mortgagees are entitled to a decree for a proportionate amount of the mortgage money as against the mortgagors on record: A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 554; A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 152; A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 792, Rel. on. [P 649 C 2]

C. C. Ghose, J.—The facts involved in this appeal, shortly stated are as follows:

One Kushai Sardar for himself and as guardian of his nephew who was then a minor, being defendant 2 and one Amrita Sardarni, as mother and guardian of a minor son, being defendant 3, executed a mortgage in favour of one Nafar Chandra Mandal on 17th Ashar 1310, for a sum of Rs. 525. Kushai had a brother named Kunai, who is dead, and defendant 2 is the son of Kunai. Defendant 3 is the son of one Gadai who was another son of Kunai. The original mortgagee died sometime ago leaving him surviving his three sons being plaintiffs 1, 2 and 3. The plaintiffs including one Poran plaintiff 4 brought a suit on the mortgage on or about 20th February 1918, the total claim being laid at Rs. 997. Defendant 4, Nitai Mandal, was added as a party defendant as the subsequent purchaser of an 8 anna share in the mortgaged premises from defendants 2 and 3.

The suit came on for hearing before the Munsif at Khatra and by his judgment dated 12th February 1919, the learned Munsif decreed the suit with costs, i. e., passed a preliminary decree on the mortgage. There was appeal to the Subordinate Judge of Bankura but the appeal was dismissed with costs on 23rd January 1920. Thereafter an application was made for a final decree and it appears that on 26th August 1922 an ex parte order was made by which the preliminary mortgage decree was made final and absolute. Subsequently it was sought to set aside the ex parte order of 26th August 1922, on the ground that no notice had been served upon the defendants before the final decree was passed and that one of the plaintiffs namely Poran Mandal had died in Pous 1328 and one of the judgment-debtors had died in Ashar 1328, and that, therefore, the suit itself had abated under O. 22, R. 4, Civil P. C. The matter came before the learned Munsif on 29th March 1923, and by his order of that date the learned Munsif refused to set aside the previous order of 26th August 1922. There was an appeal against the last mentioned order and it appeared that substitutions had been made in the records in places of the deceased plaintiff and the deceased defendant on a date which was beyond the usual period of three months from the deaths in question. The learned Subordinate Judge by his order dated 30th July 1923, allowed the appeal and sent the matter back to the Court of first instance for retrial of the plaintiffs' application for substitution and final decree. Thereafter the matter having come back to the learned Munsif, the latter by his order dated 29th March 1924 held that the prayer for substitution could not be granted and that the suit having abated should be dismissed. The ground of this decision was that no substitution had been made in place of the deceased plaintiff, Poran Mandal, within three months from the date of his death. There was appeal to the Subordinate Judge of Bankura against the last mentioned decision and that officer held by his judgment dated 28th February 1925, that so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, the claim had not abated in the circumstances of the case, and that so far as the defendants were concerned their liability remained intact at any rate to the extent of 5/6th share. The result was that according to the learned Subordinate Judge, the order of abatement was set aside and a final decree passed to the extent of a 5/6th share in the mortgaged premises.

The present appeal is against this last-mentioned order and it is contended on behalf of the surviving defendants that, having regard to the facts disclosed on the record, it ought to have been held that the suit having abated as against one of the plaintiffs mortgagees, it remained improperly constituted and that no final decree could be passed; in other words, the contention is that the mortgaged security being one and indivisible, it can neither be enforced nor redeemed piecemeal.

As will be seen from what is stated above, the contention on behalf of the appellants arises because of the fact that one of the plaintiffs i. e., plaintiff 4 and one of the mortgagors had died and that no substitution had been made in their places. As regards the question of what is the effect of the non-substitution of the heir of one of the mortgagors, the matter has now been set at rest by the decision of this Court about to be referred to. In the case of Hara Chandra Roy v. Mahomed Hussain (1) which was a suit on a mortgage in which all the heirs of the mortgagor had not been made parties, it was held that the suit could not be dismissed. Mookerjee, J., observed as follows :

(1) A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 554.

"It is clear that the plaintiffs were at the least entitled to a decree for a proportionate share of the mortgage money as against the defendants who were on the record. Even if it is assumed that the persons who had been left out, could, if joined, have successfully urged the plea of limitation that would not afford a defence in favour of the persons who had been joined as parties within the prescribed time. This view is supported by the decision in Imam Ali v. Baijnath Ram Sahu (2). In that case an objection was taken that certain parties had not been brought on the record in time and that if they were added as parties the suit must be deemed as bound by limitation as against them. It was ruled that where the purchaser of a portion of the equity of redemption is added as a party (defendant) not by the Court but upon an application by the mortgagee after the prescribed period of limitation although the mortgage suit is barred as against the added defendants, yet such mortgagee is entitled to succeed in respect of a proportionate part of his claim as against the remaining owners of the equity of redemption."

To the same effect is the decision of the case of Khirodamayi Dassi v. Habib Shaha (3). In that case a person having a share in the equity of redemption had not been made a defendant but it was held that there should be a decree proportionate to the shares of the persons actually made defendants mortgagors. My learned brother Suhrawardy, J., went through all the cases and applied the rule laid down in the case reported in Hara Chandra Roy v. Mahomed Hussain (1). In this connexion reference may also be made to the case of Dina Nath v. Nabo Kumar (4). I am, therefore, of opinion that the present suit in the circumstances which have happened could not fail and there should be a decree proportionate to the shares of the mortgagors who were already on the record.

But it is argued that the matter is complicated by the fact that no substitution was made in place of the deceased plaintiff Poran Mandal who died in Pous 1328. It appears that the suit was properly constituted at the time when it was instituted. Now on the facts in this case it appears that the mortgage in question was in favour of one Nafar, the father of plaintiffs 1, 2 and 3. The plaintiff who had died, i. e., Poran Mandal, was plaintiff 4. He was neither a proper nor a necessary plaintiff, because he was in no way a successor-in-interest of Nafar. The heirs of Nafar being on the record, the suit in my opinion was clearly maintainable, and that it did not matter in the slightest if no substitution was made in place of the deceased plaintiff Poran Mandal.

In this view of the matter the present appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 430 of 1923, Decided on 21st May 1929, from appellate order of Dist. Judge, Midnapore, D/- 2nd June 1928.

Limitation Act, Art. 182 (4) — Decree amended — Limitation for execution runs from date of amendment—Executing Court cannot question propriety of the amendment.

Where the legislature has provided that the time from which period of limitation for execution of a decree should begin to run where a decree has been amended, is the date of amendment, it is not for the Court of execution to enquire whether the amendment was properly made, whether the original decree was capable of execution or whether for any other reason the Court was wrong in making the order for amendment of the decree. The executing Court does not sit as a Court of appeal over the Court which has made the decree or which has made the amendment; but it has only to see whether the decree has been amended in order to decide whether the application for execution was barred by limitation or not. To introduce other considerations as regards the correctness or propriety of the amendment made would be to usurp the functions of the Court of appeal to which the judgment-debtor might have brought the matter of amendment when the Court made the amendment. Gopendra Nath Das—for Appellant.

Panchanan Ghose and Pulin Behary Das—for Respondents.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the legal representative of judgment-debtor 4 against the order of the District Judge of Midnapur affirming the decision of the Subordinate Judge allowing the execution of the decree in favour of the respondents. A final decree on a mortgage was made on 8th May 1924. The original judgment-debtor 4 died on 18th August 1924. An application for execution was made on 7th May 1927 against all the judgment-debtors and in which the name of the deceased judgment-debtor 4 was also mentioned. On 28th July 1927 by an ex parte application made by the decree-holder the present appellant was substituted in the place of the deceased judgment-debtor 4. Previous to that, the decree-holder made an application for amendment of the decree of 17th December 1926. A further application was made on 10th May 1927 for certain other amendments of the decree. An order was made by the Court on 6th June 1927 amending the decree in certain particulars. That Court, however, refused to amend the decree by striking out the name of the judgment-debtor 4 who was dead at the time and in place of that name to put in the name of the appellant as his legal representative. This was made on the objection of the present appellant who appeared in support of his objection. Both the Courts below have held that the decree as originally made was incapable of execution and the application for execution now made was not barred. It is unnecessary to mention that the execution was asked for of the amended decree in continuation of the application presented in Court on 7th May 1927. It has been argued on behalf of the appellant that the application for execution of the decree should be held to be barred as against the present appellant. It is urged that when the present appellant was substituted in place of his deceased predecessor by the order of 28th July 1927, more than three years had elapsed from the date of the decree and therefore the execution as against him was barred. It is contended on the other side that the period of limitation should commence from the date of the amendment of the decree under para. 4, Col. 3, Art. 182, Lim. Act, where it is provided that the date of amendment of the decree is the time from which period of limitation begins to run. It is contended on behalf of the respondents that the application for execution was quite within time having been made on 7th May 1927 and reference is made to the last portion of the proviso to Expln. 1, Art. 182,

Lim. Act, where it has been provided that "where the decree or order has been passed jointly against more persons than one, the application if made against any one or more of them or against his or their representatives, shall take effect against them all."

It is contended that the application having been made in proper form against the surviving judgment-debtors the application against the heir of the deceased judgment-debtor was effective as if made against them all.

With regard to the first point that limitation should begin to run from the date of the amendment it is argued by the learned advocate for the appellant that the amendment must be a proper amendment; and further it is argued that the amendment should be also a necessary amendment, that is to say, that the original decree must be such as to be incapable of execution. It is argued that the present decree as drawn up on 8th May 1924 was one capable of execution and the amendment only made certain alterations as regards the interest and so forth. If the decree was capable of execution the period of limitation should not be allowed to run from the date of the amendment. In support of this contention an unreported case was cited before us. With great respect I am unable to accept the proposition of law laid down in that case. Where the legislature has provided that the time from which period of limitation for execution of a decree should begin to run where a decree has been amended, is the date of amendment, it is not for the Court of execution to enquire whether the amendment was properly made, whether the original decree was capable of execution or whether for any other reason the Court was wrong in making the order for amendment of the decree. The executing Court does not sit as a Court of appeal over the Court which has made the decree or which has made the amendment; but it has only to see whether the decree has been amended in order to decide whether the application for execution was barred by limitation or not. To introduce other considerations as regards the correctness or propriety of the amendment made would be to usurp the functions of the Court of appeal to which the judgment-debtor might have brought the matter of amendment when the Court made the amendment. In my judgment therefore, the only point which we have to see in deciding the question of limitation is what should be considered the starting point of limitation and under para. 4, Col. 3, Art. 182, Lim. Act, we must take it that the starting point is the date of amendment of the decree which was in this case the 6th June 1927.

I was somewhat pressed by the other point urged on behalf of the appellant that the amendment was made in the absence of the appellant, or in other words, that the deceased defendant could not be served with notice of the amendment and the appellant his legal representative was not brought on the record for the purpose of amendment and therefore the order of amendment should be considered to be invalid. But it seems that notice was served upon the present appellant as the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor and on his objection his name was not put in the place of his deceased predecessor. As a matter of fact the amendment was made in his presence and the learned Judge did not substitute the name of the appellant in the place of his deceased ancestor, probably because he thought that the name of the judgment-debtor as drawn up in the original decree should appear in the final decree. Moreover on account of the proviso to the explanation cited above the application for execution of 7th May 1927 was effective and was within time as against the heir of the deceased judgment-debtor. On these grounds this appeal must stand dismissed with costs, hearing fee being assessed at five gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 2199 of 1926, Decided on 6th February 1929, against appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Dinajpur, D/- 24th May 1926.

(a) Power-of-attorney—Notice—Power to issue notices may be oral—Transfer of Property Act, S. 106.

Proper execution of am-mukhtearnamas, giving authority to sue in ejectment, confers also power to issue notices but it is not necessary that the authority should be in writing.

(b) Transfer of Property Act, S. 106—Notice by registered post—Acknowledgment purporting to be signed by addressee—Notice is proved.

Where it is proved that notice was sent by registered post and an acknowledgment purporting to be signed by the addressee and received through post office is produced and proved it should be held that service of notice was proved: A. I. R. 1918 P. C. 102; (1870) W. N. 119, Rel. on.

(c) Cosharer—Notice to one joint tenant is notice to others—Transfer of Property Act, S. 106.

In the case of joint tenants service of notice to quit upon one joint tenant is prima facie evidence that it has reached the other joint tenants: A. I. R. 1918 P. C. 102, Rel. on. A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 752, Ref.

(d) Landlord and Tenant—Notice to quit and suit in ejectment excluded a portion of tenancy—Defendant-tenants in possession—Plaintiffs cannot eject.

If the whole of the land forming the subject matter of the tenancy is included in the notice and suit in ejectment but there is an understatement of the area the defect would not be fatal. But if it be a fact that a part of the land of tenancy was excluded from the notice to quit and from the suit in ejectment and of such part the defendants are in possession as tenants under the plaintiff, the plaintiff cannot possibly obtain a decree in the suit.

Judgment.—This appeal has arisen out of suit which was instituted by the plaintiffs for recovery of possession on ejectment of the defendants. The trial Court decreed the suit on contest as against some of the defendants and ex parte against the others. It declared the plaintiffs' title to the land and directed that they would recover khas possession on evicting the defendants therefrom. The defendants thereupon preferred an appeal. The learned Subordinate Judge who dealt with that appeal dismissed the plaintiffs' claim holding, that although he found in favour of the plaintiffs on the merits, the decree of the trial Court was to be reversed and the suit dismissed on the ground that notices under S. 106, T. P. Act, were neither sufficient nor properly served.

The plaintiffs have then preferred this second appeal and on their behalf the findings of the Subordinate Judge, both on the question of sufficiency of the notices as also on the question of their service, have been challenged in this appeal.

As regards the sufficiency of the notices what has been found against the plaintiffs by the Subordinate Judge is that the notices purported to have been signed by certain persons as am-mukhtears on behalf of certain ladies and that it had not been proved in the case that the persons who purported to sign on behalf of the said ladies as such am-mukhtears had been duly authorized by the said ladies to issue the said notices. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that upon the evidence in the case proper execution of the am-mukhtearnamas had not been duly proved, and further more that although in the am-mukhtearnamas power was given to the am-mukhtears to sue in ejectment there was nothing said conferring any authority to the am-mukhtears to issue notices to quit. As regards this matter it is sufficient for us to say that in the written statement that was filed on behalf of the defendants no question as to the want of a power of this character in the am-mukhtearnamas or as to the am-mukhtearnamas not having been duly executed by the ladies appears to have been raised. If it was the defendants' desire to contest the validity of the notices upon grounds such as these, it was clearly their duty to put forward their objection on this head definitely and specifically in the written statement in order that the plaintiffs could have produced necessary evidence showing due and proper execution of the am-mukhtearnamas and the fact that the power to issue notices on behalf of the ladies was conferred thereby. Moreover even if there was any defect in the am-mukhtearnamas as regards these matters the plaintiffs could have proved that the notices were issued under authority duly given by the ladies because the law does not say that such authority must necessarily be given in writing. It may also be mentioned that the power to sue in ejectment should ordinarily be taken to include power to take up such action as may be necessary as preliminaries to the institution of such a suit. In view of the fact that the objection was not taken in the written statement and the matter did not form the subject matter of discussion in the trial Court and was not even mentioned in the grounds of appeal which the defendants preferred to the lower appellate Court, it was not right on the part of the learned Subordinate Judge to have gone into this question at all.

As regards service of notices the learned Subordinate Judge has held that the notice that was meant for one Emajuddin had not been duly served. Emajuddin, it appears, denied in the written statement that there was any service of notice on him. But he did not appear as a witness and did not adduce any evidence to the effect that the notice meant for him was not received by him. On behalf of the plaintiffs it was proved that notice was sent by registered post and an acknowledgment purporting to have been signed by Emajuddin and received back through the post office was produced and proved in the case. On these facts the learned Subordinate Judge should have held that the service of notice upon Emajuddin had been proved in view of the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Harihar Banerji v. Ramshashi Roy (1). In that case their Lordships quoting the decision in the case of Gresham House Estate & Co. v. Rossa Grande Gold Mining Co. (2) observed that if a letter properly directed containing a notice to quit is proved to have been put into the post office it is presumed that the letter reached its destination at the proper time according to the regular course of business in the post office and was received by the person to whom it was addressed. That presumption would appear to their Lordships to apply with still greater force to letters which the sender has taken the precaution to register and is not rebutted but strengthened by the fact that a receipt for the letter is produced signed on behalf of the addressee by some person other than the addressee himself. In this particular case as I have already stated Emajuddin had not come forward to deny his signature on oath and in view of the presumption which arises upon the circumstances of the case it must be held that until that presumption is rebutted the service of notice upon Emajuddin had been duly proved. The learned Subordinate Judge in our opinion was wrong in not giving effect to this presumption.

With regard to the service of notice again the second question that arises is with reference to the notice of Foijannessa. The notice meant for Foijannessa was also sent per registered post and served on one Noshan Ali. Noshan Ali has been examined on behalf of the defendants and he has said that he forgot to make over the notice to Foijannessa. The postal peon who delivered the letter to Noshan Ali was examined but he was unable to say that he made over the notice to Noshan Ali at the request of Foijannessa. The learned Subordinate Judge thought that it was the duty of the plaintiffs to go further and to prove that the notice that was served on Noshan Ali had actually reached Foijannessa. He held that her evidence to that effect was not forthcoming and it should be taken that the notice was not served on Foijannessa. The notices that were given in this case were addressed to all the joint tenants and copies of such notice are alleged to have been served upon the joint tenants severally. The Judicial Committee in the case of Harihar Banerji v. Ramshashi Roy (1) to which reference has already been made, pointed out that in the case of joint tenants each is intended to be bound and it has long been decided that service of notice to quit upon the joint tenant is prima facie evidence that it has reached the other joint tenants. In view of the fact that we have found that service of notice to quit upon Emajuddin had been established, applying to the case the dictum of the Judicial Committee referred to above it follows as a matter of course that the other joint tenants including Foijannessa had been served with notice. Our attention has been drawn to the decision of this Court.

in the case of Bejoy Chand Mahatab v. Kali Prosanna Seal (3) in which, according to the contention of the respondents, some observations have been made which may be taken to have detracted from the correctness or applicability of the dictum to circumstances such as arise in the present case. On examination of the facts of that case, however, it appears that all that has been laid down in that case is that the notice in order to give rise to this presumption must be addressed to all the joint tenants and that where no notice was addressed to one of the joint tenants the mere service of the notice on the other joint tenants is not sufficient notice to quit according to law. In the present case the notices that were issued were addressed to all the joint tenants. On the question of service of notice also therefore the decision of the Subordinate Judge is not correct.

The respondents have then drawn our attention to two passages in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge which are somewhat in conflict with each other and from a perusal of which the conclusion may not unreasonably be arrived at to the effect that the notice as well as the suit excluded a portion of the tenancy which is in the occupation of the defendants. One of the passages runs in these words:

"Derajtulla's land must have been in regard to a portion of it on the north of the District Board Road. . . . The suit is for eviction from the land lying to the south of District Board Road. The plaintiff's case is 2 bighas 12 cottahs of land lying in the south of the road was let out. But this cannot be possibly true as I have seen that Derajtulla had also some land to the north of the road and his brother Muzafar's boitakhana was situated there."

The other passage runs in these words:

"The plaintiffs have sued for all the lands in the possession of Derajtulla's heirs as appertaining to the jote but they have understated the area. They have resorted to this understatement with two objects in view. They would not admit that any land of Derajtulla lay to the north of the District Board Road and had been acquired by Government. In the next place they thought it necessary to minimise the area of the land to make it appear that the land could not have been let out for agricultural purposes."

What exactly was the finding of fact of the Subordinate Judge on this question we are not in a position to appreciate. If it was only an understatement in the area, the whole of the land forming the subject-matter of the tenancy having been included, the defect in the notice or in the suit would not be fatal to the plaintiff's case. It has been held in the case of Shama Charan Mitter v. Uma Charan Haldar (4) that where a notice to quit stated the area of the defendant's holding to be 1 bigha 5 chitaks but the true area was  $1\frac{3}{4}$  cottahs less and no boundaries were given, it was not a defect which would make the notice bad in law. But if it be a fact that a part of the land of this tenancy was excluded from the notice and from the suit and of such part the defendants are in possession as tenants under the plaintiff the plaintiff cannot possibly obtain a decree in the suit.

The question whether the notice and the suit covered the entire tenancy or whether they have left out a part of it which is in the defendants' occupation will have to be re-investigated and in view of the fact that it was not specifically raised in the pleadings and there is not much indication in the judgment of the trial Court showing that it was canvassed there we think that while we shall make an order for remand to the lower appellate Court for proper investigation of that question and for a clear finding on it we shall give the parties an opportunity to adduce such further materials as they may desire to do in connexion with this question. All other questions that arose in the suit have now been concluded and the question referred to above is the only question that will be left open for consideration by the learned Subordinate Judge. On arriving at his finding on that question he will proceed to dispose of the appeal in accordance with law.

Costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Judgment.—This rule was obtained by the Bengal Nagpur Railway Company, Limited, for the revision of a judgment of the Small Cause Court Judge of Sealdah by which the defendant company were made liable in an action brought by the plaintiffs opposite party for recovery of compensation from the defendant company on account of damage to some goods booked from Tirosa Station to the Shalimar Station belonging to the defendant company. The case made by the plaintiffs opposite party is that out of a large number of bags of Biri consigned from Tirosa, 11 bags were found to have been damaged by wet and the allegation is that this was due to the fault of the defendant's servants and consequently plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages. It is necessary in particular to refer to para. 3 of the plaint upon which some argument has been advanced before me. Para. 3 of the plaint runs as follows :

"That it was ascertained on enquiry that the said damage was due to the consignment having been evidently carried on a wagon which was defective and that sufficient and reasonable care was not taken by the railway staff."

After the defendant company had filed their written statement the matter proceeded to trial. Evidence was led on behalf of the plaintiffs to show that the Biris were carried in a wooden topped wagon contrary to some rules of the defendant company by which it was the duty of the Company not to carry such goods in monsoon weather in foreign railway wagon with roof other than the iron topped roof. The Subordinate Judge held after examining the evidence on both sides that the goods were carried in a wooden topped wagon. The Railway Company led evidence to show that the goods were not carried in a wooden topped wagon but in an iron topped wagon and this case was not believed by the Small Cause Court Judge and the learned Judge held that as the goods were carried in a wooden topped wagon and that water was dropping from the roof according to the evidence, the goods were damaged by wet and the Railway Company were responsible for such damage. The Small Cause Court Judge granted a decree to the plaintiffs for Rs. 179-10-0 with proportionate costs.

The Railway Company moved this Court and obtained this rule on several grounds. The first ground on which the rule was granted was that the Court below was wrong in allowing the plaintiffs to raise a new case at the time of the hearing at variance with that made in the plaint and in awarding the plaintiffs a decree on the basis of such new case made a case which is inconsistent with that made in the plaint. It has been argued by Mr. Sen who ap-appears for the Railway Company that his clients have been considerably prejudiced by this change of case and there had been a variance between pleadings and proof and in the circumstances the judgment of the Small Cause Court Judge ought to be set aside and the matter remanded for retrial. It appears, however, from para. 3 of the plaint which has been quoted in extenso in the previous part of my judgment that the plaintiffs pleaded a case of negligence in so far as they stated that the goods were carried in a defective wagon. The Railway Company did not ask for further and better particulars of negligence.

At the time of trial plaintiffs led evidence to show that the wagon, according to the rules, was not suitable to the carrying of goods of the description which were carried. The Railway Company led evidence to show that as a matter of fact the goods were not carried in such wagon namely wooden topped wagon. The Station Master was called and he gave evidence that as a matter of fact the goods were carried in an iron topped wagon, but his evidence was not accepted. I do not think, therefore, that the Railway Company had no notice of the precise grounds on which the plaintiffs led evidence. It is only singular that the Railway Company did not make any application either oral or written before the Small Cause Court Judge asking him to postpone the hearing in order that the Railway Company might furnish evidence to rebut the new case of the carrying of these goods in a wooden topped wagon made by the plaintiffs in evidence. Para. 3 of the plaint sufficiently covered the case of negligence or of misconduct for in certain circumstances a negligence is good evidence for misconduct or mismanagement of the Railway Company.

It has next been argued that the suit ought to have been dismissed as the plaintiffs did not disclose in their plaint that the liability of the Railway Company as a bailee under Ss. 151 and 152, Contract Act, was limited by two risk-notes in the new forms A and B and it is said that as the plaintiffs paid reduced freight, the liability of the defendant company was to carry the goods free from all responsibilities except for any misconduct. It will appear that before 1924 the Railway Company were liable for wilful neglect but since 1924 instead of those words "wilful neglect" the word used in the risk-note is simply 'misconduct' and it cannot be argued now in view of the change in the form of the contract which limits the responsibilities of the Railway Company that the Railway Company were not liable for mismanagement of the kind which has occurred in the present case. The Railway Company certainly had notice of the class of goods which had been carried. The damage, it is not said or proved, is due to any event or any circumstance over which the Railway Company had no control. The ordinary damage itself is presumptive evidence of negligence. The Railway Company might have discharged that burden which although it did not lie prima facie on them was shifted on to the Railway Company after evidence was led to show that it was carried in a particular class of wagon to establish or to repel the presumption which arose in the circumstances of this case in favour of the plaintiffs.

I think the decision of the Small Cause Court Judge was right. He holds as a matter of fact that the damage was caused by water dropping from the roof by which these goods were wet and by the fact that the goods were carried in a wagon contrary to the rules of the Railway Company. It is said that those rules are not statutory rules. That may or may not be so but the Railway Company have not denied that these rules existed and that shows that in their view the goods of this class should not have been carried in a wooden topped wagon and the servants of the Railway Company did not conform to the rules as it was their duty to do and the Railway Company are to be held liable. This rule therefore is discharged with costs hearing fee one gold mohur.

Facts.—One Musa Singh is a motor lorry driver ; that on the 6th March 1928 when he was driving the motor lorry "Amaya Bhulona" of his master Jung Bahadur, one Gosto Behari Chatterji was also driving another motor lorry "Bijoli" on the Midnapore-Bankura Road within the police station of Garbetta in the District of Midnapore ; that the latter lorry collided with the lorry driven by Musa Singh and his lorry was badly injured. Musa Singh instituted a criminal case under S. 426, I. P. C., against the accused Gosto Behari Chatterjee before the Sub-Divisional Officer of Midnapore Sadar and the accused was duly summoned. Before the accused entered appearance in pursuance of the said summons the Sub-Inspector of Police of Barberta submitted charge sheet under S. 5, Act 8 of 1914 (Motor Vehicles Act) against both the complainant and the accused. These two cases along with the case in which Musa Singh was the complainant were transferred to the file of Babu S. N. Sarkar, Deputy Magistrate, First Class, of Midnapore Sadar ; that the said learned Deputy Magistrate disposed of the two police cases on 16th May 1928 convict-ing Musa Singh and acquitting Gosto Behari Chatterjee.

After the disposal of the said two cases on the same date the same learned Deputy Magistrate wanted to proceed with the trial of the said case under S. 426, I. P. C., the said Musa Singh apprehending that the said learned Deputy Magistrate had already formed an opinion in favour of the opposite party and as such he could not expect a fair and impartial trial at his hands filed a petition praying for an adjournment on the ground that he was going to move the higher authorities for a transfer of his case from his file and the learned Deputy Magistrate adjourned the case to 18th May 1928.

On the next day i. e., on 17th May 1928 Musa Singh filed a petition under S. 528, Criminal P. C., before Mr. S. C. Ghatak, the Additional District Magistrate of Midnapore for the transfer of his case from the file of the said learned Deputy Magistrate to that of any other Magistrate and the said Additional District Magistrate called for the records of the case to his file and stayed further proceedings pending in the Court of the said Deputy Magistrate on the same date i. e. on 17th May 1928.

The complainant came to Court on 18th May 1928 and he was very much surprised to learn that his case was being called on in the Court of the said Deputy Magistrate, though it was stayed by the learned Additional District Magistrate on the previous day and the complainant at once ran to call his muktear who was engaged in some other Court and that when he came back with his muktear to the Court of the said Deputy Magistrate he was informed that his case was dismissed under S. 247, Criminal P. C., owing to his absence.

Being aggrieved by the order of the said learned Deputy Magistrate Musa Singh moved an application before the Additional District Magistrate praying for his kind recommendation to the Hon'ble High Court for the setting aside of the order of acquittal passed by the learned Deputy Magistrate under S. 247 on 18th May 1928.

Musa Singh obtained a rule and the date of hearing of the said rule was fixed on 26th May 1928.

On 26th May 1928 the learned Additional District Magistrate disposed of the said Rule No. 23 of 1928 and his application for transfer numbered 56 of 1928 together rejecting both the petitions.

Order of the lower Court

1. I have heard pleader for the petitioner and seen the records. The case being a summons case, the Magistrate's order under S. 247, Criminal P. C., (which evidently in this case was an unfortunate one) stands in the way of a re-opening of the question in view of S. 403, Criminal P. C.

2. That S. 403, Criminal P. C., is a bar to further trial of a case in which an acquittal has been ordered under S. 247, Criminal P. C., will appear from many rulings beginning with olden times and that is the accepted view up to present times : see Suraiya Sastri v. Venkata Rao (1), Panchu Singh v. Unnor Mahomed Sheikh (2), Kedar Nath Biswas v. Adhin Manji (3). This is also the view taken in Guggilappu Paddyaya, In re (4) and a contrary view taken (Ayling and Napier, JJ.) in unreported case Dudekula Lal Saheb, In re (5) referred under S. 429, Criminal P. C., to the Chief Justice Sir John Wallis on a point of disagreement between Abdur Rahim and Napier, JJ.: see full discussion in Dudekula Lal Saheb, In re (5). It will appear from this that the expression "tried" in S. 403, Criminal P. C., affords no ground for re-opening an order under S. 247, Criminal P. C., and that there can be no further trial in cases in which acquittal has been ordered (described as "statutory acquittal") under Ss. 494, 247 and 345, Criminal P. C. I think this is the latest decision on the subject, while valuable light is thrown on the situation by Guggilappu Paddyaya, In re (4) which points out that the non-mention of S. 247, Criminal P. C., in the explanation under S. 403, Criminal P. C. shows that it was not intended by anything in S. 403, Criminal P. C., to limit the force of acquittal under S. 247, Criminal P. C.

3. In my opinion there can be no further trial in this case. The application is rejected.

Order.—We have examined the record and perused the explanation submitted by the Additional District Magistrate and on the facts appearing therein there cannot be any doubt that the order of acquittal passed on 18th May 1928 must be set aside and the case against Gostha Behari Chatterjee retried by a Magistrate other than the Magistrate who passed the orders in the first instance to be nominated by the District Magistrate. The rule is accordingly made absolute.

S. C. Basak and Narendra Nath Dalal—for Appellant.

Sitangshu Bhusan Bose—for Respondents.

Judgment.—In these two appeals by the plaintiff the facts are not in dispute. The suits in which these two appeals arise were for arrears of rent. The plaintiff alleged that the original rental in one case was Rs. 22-9-0 and that the tenant subsequently agreed to an enhanced rental of Rs. 25-6-5 gds. The holding in question is the holding of an occupancy raiyat at a money rent and the enhancement exceeded very slightly the enhancement allowed under the law. S. 29, Ben. Ten. Act, prohibits an enhancement by contract of more than two annas in the rupee. So in this case the legal enhancement would have been Rs. 25-6-2½gds. Instead of that it is said that enhancement was agreed to Rs. 25-6-5gds. in other words there is an enhancement of more than 2½gds.

Both the Courts below have granted the plaintiff a decree in this suit at the rate of Rs. 22-9-0 which was the admitted rental. It was argued before them and that argument has been repeated before me that there has not really been a contravention of the provisions of S. 29 seeing that the excess is indeed so slight that the principle of deminimis non curat lex should be attracted to the facts of this case and that the Courts below are wrong in not allowing the enhancement at the rate claimed because in spirit there is no violation of S. 29. I cannot agree with this contention. The statute enacts in the most explicit terms that there is to be no enhancement of more than two annas in the rupee. Ex concessis there is an enhancement however small over two annas in the rupee and therefore the statute has been violated. This principle of deminimis non curat lex has no application to a prohibitory statute which says that the excess can in no case be more than two annas. I have had to consider this question in another unreported case (Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 2314 of 1926, Bidhu Bhusan Das Mazumdar v. Ghenu Nasya) and I came to the same conclusion at which the Courts below have arrived. The learned District Judge rightly points out that it may be a hard case because the enhancement is just over the legal maximum. But he rightly reasons that it is not advisable to stretch the law out of its obvious meaning. There is the plain direction of the law and it would not be right to make a departure however slight from its provision. If once you begin to make a departure with reference to the statute which is in the nature of prohibitory statute you know not where you will stop and you may ultimately come to a position where the very object of the prohibitory statute will be frustrated. I think the Courts below have come to the right conclusion in allowing a decree at the rate of Rs. 22-9-0 in the suit.

With reference to the other suit the original rental was Rs. 20-5-5gds. The amount which was contracted to be paid as enhanced rent was Rs. 22-14-0. The law allows the increase of only Rs. 22-13-16½gds. So there has been an increase of 3¾gds. The increase is also slight but the reasons which have been given with reference to the other case apply equally to this case and I think the Courts below were right in decreeing the plaintiff's suit at the admitted rate of Rs. 20-5-5gds.

The result is that both these appeals fail and must be dismissed with costs. There will be one set of costs in both the appeals.

Rankin, C. J.—In my opinion, this appeal must be allowed.

It appears that certain persons were owners of a colliery. One of those persons brought a suit for dissolution of partnership and the usual ancillary reliefs. While the suit was pending, the Court in 1917 made an order, first of all, appointing one Purna Chandra Barman to be the receiver of the partnership assets which had to be administered. On 28th June of that year, defendants 1, 2 and 4 put in an application agreeing to the appointment of Babu Purna Chandra as manager of the disputed colliery on Rs. 50 per month but objecting to his appointment as receiver. Accordingly, the plaintiff's pleader having intimated that his client had no objection to the appointment of Purna Chandra Barman as manager of the disputed colliery on Rs. 50 per month, the order appointing him receiver was cancelled and the Court appointed Purna Chandra Barman manager of the disputed colliery on Rs. 50 a month. That was the order on 28th June 1917. In January 1918 there is an order :

"Manager Purna Chandra Barman is directed not to pay any amount out of the profits of the disputed colliery to any of the partners without the permission of this Court;"

and, later on in February 1918 :

"the manager is directed to deposit in Court at once the profits of the colliery now in his hands as also the future profits."

It would appear that, in 1918, a preliminary decree was passed and it would appear that at some subsequent time a receiver was appointed and that the colliery has since been sold. The time with which we are concerned is December 1921 to February 1923 and, at that time, it would appear that this Mr. Barman had been acting as manager whatever that title may connote for some four years. Some timber was wanted for the colliery and the plaintiff supplied the timber. The plaintiff brings his suit against some five or six persons but does not include among the defendants Mr. Purna Chandra Barman. The plaintiff's case in his evidence, if not in his pleadings, is that he got the order to supply this timber direct from the defendants or some of them themselves. That is entirely disbelieved. The finding of fact is that he got the order straight from this Mr. Barman.

The first Court having dismissed the plaintiff's suit upon the ground, among others, that it was not shown that Mr. Barman had the authority of the defendants to pledge their credit for goods required for the colliery, the lower appellate Court deals with the matter in this way :

"Purna Chandra Barman had been the manager from before; and, after the preliminary decree in the suit referred to above, his appointment was confirmed by the Court with certain directions. In this state, I cannot think that he was only an officer of the Court and not an agent for the parties as well and, that being so, I cannot think that the plaintiff was to seek for payment from the Court or from the manager."

It seems to me that the plaintiff, if he is to be allowed to change his case and to show that the orders were given by some one who had the authority of the defendants to give the orders, has not proved the authority which it is necessary for him to prove. I confess some difficulty in understanding what the Subordinate Judge thought he was doing when he rescinded the appointment of Mr. Barman as receiver and appointed him manager of the disputed colliery. But, on the whole, it appears to me that Mr. Barman was intended to act as an officer of the Court, appointed by the Court and taking his directions from the Court. In these circumstances, it seems to me that it is in no way shown that Mr. Barman had authority from these defendants to pledge their credit for the goods which were required for the colliery. Generally speaking, a person who is appointed by the Court has got no power to pledge the credit of an individual party. While in law it is more usual to have that doctrine applied to a receiver or what is called a receiver and manager, the doctrine is equally applicable to any person appointed by the Court as an officer of the Court. In my opinion, the lower appellate Court was wrong in thinking that Mr. Barman was shown to sustain the dual capacity of being an officer of the Court and at the same time an agent for the parties. I do not think that the plaintiff has made good his case as alleged in the plaint or that he has made good his case as it was presented in Court.

In my opinion, this appeal must succeed and the plaintiff's suit must be dismissed with costs in all the Courts except the costs of defendant 4 in this appeal.

In the proceedings under S. 373 it is not open to the Judge to allow the exact character of the applicant's claim to be litigated. He has only to see if there is ground for entertaining the application. He is not required to ascertain whether the debts were due to the deceased within the meaning of S. 214 nor can he go into the question whether the succession certificate will be necessary or exigible under S. 214. He has to decide in a summary manner the question of right to certificate. A reasonable and sensible claim to be enabled to proceed against a person as being a debtor of the deceased is sufficient for the purpose of clothing the Court with jurisdiction under S. 373 and may be regarded as a ground for entertaining the application: 9 W. * * (b) Succession Act (39 of 1925), Ss. 289 and 291—Certificate taken by Hindu widow in respect of husband's estate—Death of widow—Certificate by husband's heir can be obtained.

On the death of the widow of the deceased who had taken out a succession certificate to the estate of the deceased and long after the death of the owner his heirs applied for succession certificate with respect to three items; one of which was (1) a sum of deposit in Court as compensation money with respect to land acquired under Land Acquisition Act during the lifetime of the owner. The application was dismissed as it was made after considerable delay after the death of the deceased and also on the ground that it should have been made for entire estate of the widow, but the Court of appeal allowed the application and ordered that the certificate may be granted with respect to the item claimed.

Held: that the decision was correct: 15 C. W. N. 1018, held rightly decided but its reasoning not approved. [P 666 C 1]

* * (c) Succession Act (39 of 1925), S. 373—Application by reversioners of estate of deceased, on death of widow who, had taken out letters of administration with will annexed, for their share in deposit in Court with respect to land compulsorily acquired under Land Acquisition Act during the lifetime of widow—Land Acquisition Court directing applicants to obtain succession certificate—Subsequent application for succession certificate objected to by other heir who insisted upon litigating title and claim—Court overruling objection granting certificate—Court held entitled to grant certificate.

B, a Hindu died leaving him surviving his widow and two daughters. In due course the widow got the letters of administration with the will annexed. One of the daughters predeceased the widow while other died after her. On the death of all the three, sons of the predeceased daughter applied for withdrawal of their share in deposit under S. 31 (2) for lands compulsorily acquired under Land Acquisition Act. The Land Acquisition Judge directed them to obtain succession certificates. The land was acquired during the lifetime of widow. Thereupon they applied for succession certificate with respect to the deposit. The application was objected to by a son of other daughter who insisted upon litigating the title and demanded the Court to decide the same before granting the certificate. The Court overruled the objection and granted the certificate. The objector made an application in revision to the High Court.

Held: that the Judge had jurisdiction to entertain the application and make the order granting the certificate and further the objector's opposition was misguided. [P 666 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—Rai Bankim Chandra Chatterjee Bahadur died in 1894 leaving a widow and two daughters. The first daughter had four sons and the second three sons. The widow and both daughters are now dead. In his will no mention was made of the land with which this case is concerned. The widow in due course got letters of administration to his estate with the will annexed. In 1926 land acquisition proceedings began and certain land was compulsorily acquired in the widow's lifetime. The compensation money Rs. 2,000 was kept in deposit under S. 31 (2), Land Acquisition Act. In 1919 the widow died. One daughter had predeceased her and the other died in 1927. Thereupon, in 1928, three sons of the daughter who had first died made applications to the Subordinate Judge for succession certificates with reference to the share due to each in the compensation money. A son of the other daughter objected to these applications but the certificates were granted. Thereupon he appealed to the District Judge, 24-Parganas, who dismissed his appeals with costs. He then applied for and obtained from a Division Bench of this Court three several Rules each calling on the applicant for certificate to show cause why the order of the District Judge should not be set aside. These rules were granted in the revisional jurisdiction and under the powers conferred by S. 115 of the Code.

It may be as well that it should here be explained that before making applications for succession certificates the applicants had petitioned the Land Acquisition Judge for payment to them of their share of the money. That Judge had on 18th April 1928, directed them to obtain succession certificates for withdrawal of the amount from the Court.

The rules granted by this Court came on for hearing before my learned brothers Suhrawardy and Jack, JJ. It was contended before them that a succession certificate could only be granted in respect of a debt due to the deceased and that the compensation money, even if it was a debt, was not a debt due to the deceased. This was the ground upon which the objector had resisted the grant of these certificates before the Subordinate Judge and before the District Judge. It has now been elaborately discussed in four Courts. In support of the decisions of the Courts below, the case of Abinash Chandra v. Probodh Chandra (1) was relied on. The learned Judges of the Division Bench disagreed with this decision and in their order of reference have discussed various other cases in which a similar question has come before the Courts: Bancharam v. Adya Nath (2); Annapurna v. Nalini Mohan (3); Bishnu v. Mungul Doss (4); In re, Mt. Tripura

Sundari (5); Ranchordas v. Bhagubhai (6) and Umesh v. Mathura (7). They have referred the following questions to the Full Bench:

(1) If a property is acquired under the Land Acquisition Act after the death of the owner when it was in the hands of his widow or a person having a life-estate and the compensation money is kept in deposit in the Land Acquisition Collector's Office under S. 31, Land Acquisition Act, 1894, is such amount a debt within the meaning of S. 214, Succession Act 1925, for which a certificate under Part 10 of that Act has to be obtained?

(2) Was the case of Abinash Chandra Pal v. Probodh Chandra Pal (1) rightly decided?

The reasoning of the learned District Judge was to the effect that if it was proper and necessary for him in this proceeding, and in the absence of the person or authority by whom the sum claimed was alleged to be payable, to determine whether or not in strictness the claim of the applicants for certificate was a claim for a debt due to the deceased, he would be disposed to answer that question in the negative; nevertheless it was not incumbent upon him before making the grant of a certificate to enquire too closely into the questions whether the sum of money claimed was due and whether it had been due to the deceased within the meaning of the provisions of the Succession Act.

The order of reference in my judgment does not at all points succeed in keeping separate two questions which are different. One question which can be raised is the question whether under S. 214, Succession Act, the Land Acquisition Judge was entitled to refuse an order for payment of any portion of the money unless a succession certificate was produced by the applicant. This question does not arise in the present case. Nor could it be decided between the present parties. The only question which in this proceeding is open for discussion is the question whether the Subordinate Judge, finding that the applicants desire, for the purpose of prosecuting their claim to be formally clothed with the character of representatives of the deceased, was entitled in all the circumstances of the case, and upon the usual safeguards, to give them a certificate which would have this effect for what it was worth; or whether, on the other hand, he was obliged to decide in the presence of these parties and in the absence of the person or authority from whom the money was claimed, the question as to the character and reality of the claim; and whether, if he reached the conclusion as a result of the evidence adduced, that the compensation money was not a debt due to the deceased, he was obliged thereupon to act upon this view and to refuse a certificate which would enable the applicants to put themselves forward to the Land Acquisition Judge in a representative character.

If the compensation money was not a debt due to the deceased no succession certificate could operate as giving title to the money. Before the Land Acquisition Judge a succession certificate would in no way prevent the objector from contending that the compensation money was not a debt due to the deceased and from putting forward his own title thereto. Indeed in any case in which there is room for serious controversy as to the nature and character of the claim to a sum of money, it is manifestly more convenient, and more in accordance with familiar notions of procedure, that the controversy as to this matter should be carried on and decided after the party desiring to do so has been put in a position to assert any claim of the deceased, rather than that it should be decided in the absence of the party who is interested in getting a good discharge and upon an issue whether or not a right to stand in the shoes of the deceased should be accorded to the person who asks leave to prosecute the claim in that character.

Section 372, Succession Act, provides that an application for a succession certificate must be verified like a plaint and shall set forth inter alia the right under which the petitioner claims and the debts and securities in respect of which the certificate is applied for. S. 373 provides that if the Judge is satisfied that there is ground for entertaining the application, he shall fix a date for hearing and issue certain notices and upon the date fixed or as soon thereafter as may be practicable "shall proceed to decide in a summary manner the right to the certificate." Cls. 2 and 3 are as follows ;

"(2) When the Judge decides the right thereto to belong to the applicant, the Judge shall make an order for the grant of the certificate to him.

(3) If the Judge cannot decide the right to the certificate without determining questions of law or fact which seem to him to be too intricate and difficult for determination in a summary proceeding, he may nevertheless grant a certificate to the applicant if he appears to be the person having prima facie the best title thereto."

An examination of this section leads me to the conclusion that the legislature contemplated first that the District Judge should be satisfied not that a succession certificate will be necessary or exigible under S. 214 or otherwise, but that there is "ground for entertaining the application." That is to say, that it is a serious and sensible application by a person who desires to make a claim in the representative character which he seeks. Cls. 2 and 3 contemplate that the Judge shall endeavour to determine whether applicant is the proper person or a proper person to be clothed with the representative character and it is made abundantly clear that any intricate questions of fact or law bearing upon this question may be solved in a summary manner. The legislature by exacting fees and by making provision for the requirement of a bond would seem to have taken away all temptation to apply for a succession certificate save in cases where a succession certificate will enable the grantee to prosecute a claim as a representative of the deceased with greater advantage than he would have been able to do in the absence of this representative right. S. 387 provides that no decision under this part upon any question of right between any parties shall be held to bar the trial of the same question in any suit or in any other proceeding between the same parties. In my opinion nothing could be more misguided, unnecessary and objectionable than that questions of the exact character of an applicant's claim should be litigated upon an application for a succession certificate and in the absence of the party or authority against whom the claim is made. The objector in the present case, for example, is in no way damaged by the grant of the certificate. He is entitled to object before the Land Acquisition Judge to any order for payment out of the compensation money upon any ground which he can establish showing that the money was not due to the deceased but is money which, in the events that have happened, is payable to him. If he has any grievance against the order of 18th April 1928, he has his remedy. To insist upon litigating the questions at issue between the parties under the provisions of S. 373, Succession Act, is merely the tactics of obstruction.

On the other hand it would clearly be inconvenient if in a case such as this the Land Acquisition Court should take the view that the nature and character of the claim was such as to entitle it to require the production of a succession certificate, while at the same time the Judge to whom application for such certificate must be made purported to decide between these parties that the debt in question could not be regarded as having been due to the deceased and that accordingly no right to represent the deceased for the purpose could be given to any one. In my opinion it is not the law that the Court upon an application for a certificate has to decide for itself, as a condition of granting the certificate, that the case is one in which the debt was due to the deceased person within the meaning of S. 214. A reasonable and sensible claim to be enabled to proceed against a third party as being a debtor of a deceased person is sufficient for the purpose of clothing the Court with jurisdiction under S. 373 and may be regarded as ground for entertaining the application.

As regards the case of Abinash v. Probodh (1) I desire to observe that I do not think that questions of this character can be decided merely upon the principle that it is not necessary or advisable "to place a narrow and restricted construction upon the provisions of the Succession Certificate Act."

If this case were a case in which it was proper or necessary to decide the question whether the Land Acquisition Court was entitled to refuse payment to the applicants under S. 214 of the Act, it would I think be very necessary to point out that this section is a restrictive section and must be carefully and accurately construed. I demur very strongly, for example, to a contention that arrears of rent accruing due in respect of premises comprised in the deceased's estate in respect of a period subsequent to his death cannot be recovered without a succession certificate. There can be no question under S. 214 of treating something as due to the deceased or to his estate by any kind of legal fiction or analogy. The question before us is to be settled in my judgment by a careful consideration of the summary procedure laid down by the legislature in S. 373. This shows with great clearness that the issue of a succession certificate may be justified without the Court arriving at a conclusion to the effect that such a certificate is a necessary condition without which the claim could not succeed, or that the debts were due to the deceased.

Under Act 27 of 1860 the effect of a certificate was not limited to the particular debts mentioned in the application. It was conclusive of the representative title against all debtors to the deceased. In Bhugobutty v. Bholanath (8) it was contended that there could be no debts due to the deceased and it was laid down that this was not a matter for the Judge's consideration. "I am inclined to think" said Jackson, J. :

"it would be convenient if the law provided that all applications for certificate should state that there are debts due to the estate and that the Judge should satisfy himself that there are grounds for making the application."

In a later case Loch, J., observed ;

"It might so happen that the applicant is not aware of the existence of debts, but applies for a certificate as a precaution. Shurut v. Thakoor Monee (9)."

In 1875 we find Glover, J., repeating the same rule and in the same way as Jackson, J., had done :

"The current of decisions in this Court..... seems to lay it down that the petitioner for a certificate need do nothing more than prove his title to collect the debts if there are any. I should certainly have thought that it was first necessary to show that there was a need for the certificate by giving at least prima facie evidence of the existence of debts; but as I have not been shown any decisions going to that length I am willing to follow the rulings mentioned above, and to hold that the petitioners' title was the thing to be looked to. Beemul v. Shibur (10)."

The basis of these decisions was that the language of S. 3 of the Act of 1860, on which it appeared that the one thing which the Court had to do was to "determine the right to the certificate." "It may be" as Jackson, J., observed in the case already cited :

"that the person who obtains such certificate obtains an entirely barren title, and that he would derive no benefit from it whatever, but that is his affair."

(8) [1867] 8 W. R. 317.

(10) [1875] 21 W. R. 211.

Now Bishnu v Mandal (4) which has been greatly relied upon by the objector in this case was decided under the Act of 1860 and the observations of Mitter, J., were made with reference to the construction put upon the Act by the cases to which I have referred and by other cases decided in the same sense. He says of them :

"It is sufficient to observe that they merely lay down that . . . it is not the business of the Judge to enquire into the question whether there were debts due to the deceased person or not. Granting that to be the case, it does not follow that when without any inquiry it is admitted by the parties that there were no debts due to the deceased the Court would still be bound to grant a certificate under Act 27 of 1860."

Mitter, J., was dealing with the case upon appeal ; he gives no support to the theory that there has to be a finding as to the existence of debts due to the deceased as a condition of the Judge's jurisdiction to grant a certificate. He is only saying that the Court is not helpless and is not bound to grant an application which can be seen without further enquiry to be baseless.

When the legislature came to amend the Act of 1860 it took occasion in the new Act (7 of 1889) to effect several changes. The most important change was that it permitted an applicant to confine his application to those debts which he chose to include and gave the certificate effect only as regards the particular debts specified therein. It made more clear that the Judge's enquiry was to be summary but it retained as the description of the subject-matter the phrase "the right to the certificate." There is every reason to think that the line of decisions from which I have cited had not escaped its attention. It seems indeed to have adapted, if not adopted, the language of Jackson, J., in Bhugbutty v Bholanath (8) (above cited). It required the Judge not to decide upon contest whether the particular debts included in the application were really due at all or were really due to the deceased but to satisfy himself before he fixed a day for hearing or issued notices "that there is ground for entertaining the application." To my mind there is both logic and policy in this. I do not say that the Judge may not change his mind and in the end dismiss the application as baseless altogether but the contest after notices have issued is still to be confined to "the right to the certificate." Prima facie a person disputing the title of the deceased to the debts in question is only putting himself out of Court, showing good reason why some willing person other than himself should be authorized to assert the claim in the right of the deceased. No doubt there may be baseless claims for a certificate and it is right that the Court should not be helpless to resist them. But I demur altogether to any doctrine which involves the Judge in finding upon contest at the enquiry that there is good prima facie evidence that the debts were due to the deceased. If Radu Rani v. Brindaban (11) involves this then I think it should be overruled. There the certificate had been granted without any evidence at all although it was opposed. The Judge would seem to have refused to consider at any stage whether there was any ground for entertaining the application. Maclean, C. J., said :

"I think he is bound to enquire into the matter and require at least some evidence to show that there is a prima facie case that the property "belonged to the deceased person."

This does not seem to mean that he must hear the objectors' evidence and argument upon the point and decide whether in the end a good prima facie case has been made out upon the evidence as a whole. In the present case for example the Judge if he thought the order of the Land Acquisition Court was "ground for entertaining the application," would have been entirely within his rights. Hurri Krishna v. Balabhadra (12) was a very different case ; It was an appeal by an applicant who claimed as adopted son and whose application for certificate had been dismissed without any enquiry at all as to his right to the certificate. I do not find in the judgments in Bai Kashi v. Parbhu Keval (13) any reference to the legislature's provision for the Judge being satisfied that there are grounds for entertaining the application, but the reasoning of Chandavarkar, J., in that case is unanswerable in so far as it shows that an enquiry into the existence of the debt is a useless proceeding. The question there was precisely as here whether the debt belonged to the deceased or to the objector in an independent right. The same view has been taken in Madras Srinivasachariar v. Gopalan (14).

Of the two questions which have been put to the Full Bench I would observe that the first question together with a considerable portion of the order of reference deals with a matter which in this case does not arise. We are not here concerned with the question whether a certificate "has to be obtained." We are only concerned with the question whether the learned Judge had jurisdiction to issue the certificate. As regards the question whether Abinash's case (1) was rightly decided, I am of opinion that it was open to the Court in that case to make the order which it made, namely, to send the case back to the District Judge for retrial in accordance with law. But I am not prepared to say that I approve of the reasoning by which this order was supported.

In my opinion the Subordinate Judge had jurisdiction to make the order in this case and the opposition on the part of the objector has been misguided throughout. In my judgment the case is not one, on any view of it, which calls for our interference under S. 115 of the Code and the correct order to make is that we should discharge the Rules with costs before the Division Bench and before us. Partition—Suit for — Rights determined must be between parties qua cosharers.

In a partition suit the rights of the parties are to be determined qua cosharers and the right which one cosharer may have against the rights and interests of another under a mortgage cannot be enforced as the parties qua cosharers have no interest whatever in the mortgage. [P 667 C 1]

Judgment.—This appeal was adjourned in order that the parties, who are close relations, should have an opportunity of considering their position, and arriving at some sensible and reasonable solution of the problem. Unfortunately they have been unable to agree as to what course they would invite the Court to take, and claim the rigour of the law. They shall have it.

The suit is one for partition, and the parties are the descendants of three brothers, the plaintiffs, the descendants of one; defendants 1 to 3, of the second, and defendant 4 of the third brother. It is not disputed that defendants 1 and 3 are entitled to eight annas share; neither was it challenged that defendant 4 was entitled to four annas and the plaintiffs to four annas. In 1902 the plaintiffs purchased two annas from defendant 4, and in this suit they claimed a declaration that they were entitled to a six annas share, that the property be partitioned by metes and bounds, and they be allotted khas possession of that share in the property which fell to them. Defendant 2, however, has raised this objection to the allotment of the full six annas to the plaintiffs, viz., that in 1881 the predecessor of the plaintiffs executed a kat kabola in favour of the mortgagees, the Shyam Chaudhuris, who were really the benamidars for the father of defendants 1 to 3, that under that kat kobala defendants 1 to 3 are entitled to possession, and under those circumstances the plaintiffs ought not to be given upon partition, khas possession of more than two annas. Now the Shyam Choudhuris are not parties to this suit, and any decree made which might affect their interest would be null and void as against them. Nevertheless, the lower Courts have held in truth and in fact the money advanced to the plaintiffs under the kat kabola was paid not by the Shyam Chaudhuris but by the predecessor of defendants 1 to 3, and that the Shyam Chaudhuris had executed the kat kabola merely as benamdars for the father of defendants 1 to 3. Pursuant to that finding the lower appellate Court refused to pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff. In our opinion the decision of the lower appellate Court cannot stand. This being a partition suit the right of the parties has to be determined qua co-sharers, and it is not disputed that the plaintiffs were entitled to a four annas share and to a further two annas share by reason of the purchase of two annas from defendant 4 in 1902. It may or may not be that defendants 1 to 3 have some rights and interests in the four annas share which formed the subject matter of the kat kabola as against the plaintiffs, but as qua co-sharers they have no interest whatever in the mortgage. Whether they have any rights under the mortgage will depend upon circumstances which it is neither proper nor necessary to consider in the present suit in which Shyam Chaudhuris are not impleaded. If defendants 1 to 3 have any rights as against the plaintiff's four annas share under the kat kabola, they will take such steps to enforce their rights as they may be advised. As to whether they had any rights, or if they had any rights whether they have now lost them, we express no opinion.

The result is that there will be a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to a six annas share in the ejmali property, that upon partition being effected, allotment of six annas shall be made to the plaintiff in khas possession as against the defendants as co-sharers. The plaintiffs are entitled to their costs from the contesting defendant 2 in all the Courts.

Appeal No. 455 of 1927, Decided on 8th February 1929, against appellate decree of 4th Addl. Dist. Judge, 24-Parganas, D/- 24th August 1926.

Civil P. C., O. 1, R. 3 — Suit for specific performance — Agreement by father to sell land held in jama — Father in conjunction with son selling part of jama in contravention of contract—Father dying pending suit —Son is necessary and proper party.

There was an agreement to sell land held in jama and it was not performed but on the contrary the part of the jama was sold by the party in conjunction with his son to a third person. The party affected by the non-performance filed a suit against the person who agreed to sell, his son and the vendee. During the pendency of the suit the person who entered into agreement died. The son contended that he could not be made a party to the suit as he held the jama under a title different from his father and the performance of contract was not maintainable against him.

Held: that the suit necessitated going into the question of whether son was interested in the subject-matter of the contract or not and he was a necessary and proper party to the suit: 10 Cal. 1061, Rel. on. Cases Ref. [P 669 C1]

Rupendra Coomar Mitter and Khitindra Nath Bose—for Appellant.

Santi Coomar Roy Choudhury — for Respondents.

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal in a suit for specific performance of a contract. The facts, on which the question of law raised by this appeal depends lie within a short compass. It appears that defendant 1 held a jama of Rs. 5 for two and half bighas of land under the superior landlords Ramsebak Sana and others. He contracted to sell this jama to the plaintiff for a sum of Rs. 250 on 29th Magh 1329 B. S. and executed a bainanama after taking an advance of Rs. 85. He promised further to execute a deed of sale within 15th Chaitra 1329 B. S. He, however, failed to perform his part of the contract notwithstanding repeated requests from the plaintiff and, instead of performing the said contract, he as the plaintiff alleged in his plaint, joined with his son defendant 2 who is the appellant in this Court in settling one bigha out of the two and half bighas of land in suit with defendant 3. The present suit had consequently to be instituted by the plaintiff. Defendant 1 died during the pendency of the suit in the primary Court. The main contention of defendant 2 who is the appealing defendant was that, as he was claiming under a title different from that of his father defendant 1, the suit for specific performance and for recovery of possession of the disputed land as against him was not maintainable, and that he had been improperly joined in the suit.

This objection was taken in the Court of first instance; but the Munsif negatived it and decreed the plaintiff's suit against defendants 1 and 2 and dismissed the claim for khas possession as against defendant 3 on the ground that he took his lease without notice of the contract for sale, in favour of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, it was ordered by the decree, was to get khas possession of one and half bighas of land and, with regard to the remaining one bigha leased out to defendant 3, the suit for khas possession was dismissed and the plaintiff was declared entitled to rent. The Court of first instance found that the land belonged to defendant 1 and that he was competent to enter into the contract for sale. On appeal to the lower appellate Court, the learned District Judge affirmed the finding of the trial Court on the question of fact as to the plaintiff's title and also held that the objection of the defendant that the suit was bad for multifariousness or misjoinder of parties and causes of action must be overruled, as having no substance in it.

A second appeal has been preferred to this Court by defendant 2 and the main contention advanced by the learned advocate for the appellant is that, as defendant 2 was claiming under a distinct title to that of his father, the suit was not maintainable as against him and that he ought either to have been dismissed from the suit or that the suit should have been dismissed as against him. In support of this contention, reliance has been placed on several decisions both of the English Court of Chancery and of the Indian Courts. It is argued that the general rule is that a person who is a stranger to a contract is not a proper party to a suit for specific performance of the said contract. It may be conceded that that is the ordinary rule as it is founded on the ground of convenience. But here the plaintiff's case being that defendant 2 in conjunction with his father defendant 1 set up a title in himself to a portion of the property contracted to be sold, in those circumstances, the ordinary rule, in my opinion, has no application to the facts of the present case. This case really resembles the case which was before this Court and is reported in Mukund Lal v. Chhotey Lal (1). It was pointed out by Romesh Chunder Mitter, J., that the plaintiff in that case:

"charged defendant 1 with having resorted to certain devices in concert with defendant 3 to defeat his rights arising out of the contract under which he was suing; he called defendant 3 a mere benamidar and there was no admission on the face of the plaint or in the plaintiff's case that defendant 3 had a separate or distinct interest from that of defendant 1."

That was the ground on which the English cases to which I will presently refer and the case reported in Luckumsey Oakerda v. Fazulla Cassumbhoy (2) on which reliance was placed were distinguished by Mitter, J.

The first case relied on is the case of De Houghton v. Money (3), in which it was admitted by the plaintiff that there was a conveyance in favour of Money, but it was said that the conveyance was executed under such circumstances as would make it a voidable one. Similarly, in the case of Luckumsey Oakerda v. Fazulla Cassumbhoy (2), it was distinctly admitted by the plaintiff that the third party who was not a party to the contract had a distinct interest. The position taken up by the plaintiff in the present case as appears from his allegations in the plaint is similar to the position of the plaintiff in the case reported in Mukund Lal v. Chhotey Lal (1). It has been argued by the learned advocate for the appellant that defendant 2 set up a case of distinct interest from that of his father. But it is plain that the case of the plaintiff does not rest upon the defence set up. The application of the case of De Houghton v. Money (3) to the present case, as contended for by the appellant, could not be justified seeing that, in that case, the plaintiff himself distinctly alleged in the plaint that the third party who was not a party to the contract had a distinct interest in the land contracted to be sold or conveyed. Piggot, J., who delivered a separate judgment in the case of Mukund Lal v. Chhotey Lal (1) also pointed out that: "it does appear to me that the point at which the rule in De Houghton v. Money (3) would be applicable would not be reached in this case. The question is: Are not defendants 1 and 3 identical and that question in itself, if answered in the affirmative, as it has been, precludes the application of these cases."

Reliance has also been placed on another decision of the English Court, namely, the case of Tasker v. Small (4).

(4) [1871] 3 My. & C.R. 63.

There what was contracted to be sold was the equity of redemption in a certain estate on which there was a previous mortgage and it was held, as is pointed out by Fry, L. J., that the mortgagee was not a necessary party in the suit for specific performance. Whatever the rule of the Court of Chancery might have been in early times, that rule, as Lord Justice Fry points out in his Treatise on Specific Performance of Contract at para. 175, has been considerably modified by S. 49, Chancery Procedure Act of 1852. The learned author remarks :

"In the Court of Chancery persons having adverse or inconsistent rights in the subject-matter of the suit could not be joined as plaintiffs : nor could a person who had no interest be joined as plaintiff with one who had. The importance of the doctrine of misjoinder was, however, diminished by S. 49, Chancery Procedure Act, 1852."

"In some cases," says the learned author, "persons claiming adversely might be made defendants." Again, in para. 192, the learned author remarks with regard to the matter in hand as follows :

"The plaintiff may unite in the same action and in the same statement of claim several causes of action, subject to a power in the Court or Judge to direct separate trials of any of such causes of action. Further, the Court or a Judge may at any stage of the proceedings order the name of any party, plaintiff or defendant, who ought to have been joined or whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the action, to be added."

It seems to me, having regard to the allegations in the plaint in the present case, that it was essential that the question as to whether defendant 2, who subsequent to the contract in favour of the plaintiff leased out a portion of the land to defendant 3 along with his father, was interested in the subject-matter of the contract or not should be gone into and decided and that the decision could only be arrived at effectually in the presence of defendant 2. In this view of the matter, I am of opinion that the Courts below are right in holding that defendant 2 was a necessary and proper party to the suit. This is the only contention which has been urged in appeal before us and, as this contention fails, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 765 of 1928, Decided on 6th February 1929, against the appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Murshidabad, D/- 11th November 1927.

(a) Ejectment—Suit for — Co-trespassers are necessary parties—Decree against defendants in the absence of other necessary defendants illegal.

Suit for khas possession on declaration of title is not maintainable in the absence of defendants who are co-trespassers and the decree passed against the defendants present is one not warranted by law: A. I. R. 1928, Cal. 138, Foll. [P 670 C 1]

* (b) Civil P. C., S. 96—Suit decreed against defendants present and dismissed against defendants unrepresented—Plaintiff's appeal barred.

Where a suit is decreed against some of the defendants and dismissed against the minor defendants as they were not represented it is not at all open to the plaintiff to prefer a cross-appeal against such dismissal as it does not amount to a decree.

* (c) Civil P. C., S. 2 (2)—Suit dismissed against some defendants on account of non-representation — Plaintiff not responsible for non representation — Dismissal is not-decree.

The dismissal of a suit against some defendants on account of non-representation for which plaintiffs are not to blame is not a decree within the meaning of S. 2 (2). As regards these defendants there is no adjudication, far less any expression of an adjudication determining the rights of the parties with regard to any of the matters in the suit. It merely struck those defendants out of the suit as being persons who were not really before the Court and is widely different from an order which purports to strike out a defendant on the ground that no cause of action has been made out against him, or an order striking out from the array of parties a defendant as an unnecessary party and dismissing the suit as against him which orders clearly fall within that definition.

Judgment—This appeal has arisen out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiff for khas possession on declaration of his title. The allegations in the plaint were that the land in suit formerly belonged to one Domon Sheikh, that by successive transfers it eventually came to belong to the plaintiff and he was in possession of it till he was dispossessed by the defendants. The defence was that the holding was a non-transferable occupancy holding and the plaintiff acquired no title by his purchase, nor was he in possession thereof. Two of the defendants were minors, whose natural guardian did not appear though served with summons, and through some mistake on the part of the officers of the Court the matter was not put up before the Court for proper orders and the plaintiff being unaware of the fact that the natural guardian had not appeared did not take steps to have a guardian appointed by the Court. The trial Court overruled the defence on the merits and finding the facts in plaintiff's favour dismissed the suit as regards the minor defendants namely defendants 3 and 7 as they were not represented and decreed the suit as against the other defendants declaring the plaintiff's title and ordering that the plaintiff do get possession by eviction of those defendants. An appeal was preferred by the defendants against whom that decree was passed, but it was unsuccessful. They have then preferred this second appeal.

The contention of the appellants is that the suit was not maintainable in the absence of defendants 3 and 7, who were co trespassers as parties defendants and that the decree passed against the appellants is one not warranted by law. The contention is amply supported by the decision of this Court in the case of Arunodoy Chakravarti v. Mahommed Ali (1) and must be given effect to.

The question then arises as to the proper order that should be passed. The Subordinate Judge appears to have been of the view that if the plaintiff has preferred a cross appeal he would have allowed the plaintiff an opportunity to proceed with the suit after getting defendants 3 and 7 properly represented therein. While we agree with the Subordinate Judge in holding that the plaintiff was not to blame for non-representation of defendants 3 and 7 in the suit and consequently that such an opportunity should be given to him, we are unable to hold that it was necessary or at all open to the plaintiff to prefer a cross-appeal. It is true that in the formal decree that was drawn up the suit against defendants 3 and 7 was dismissed, but the dismissal in our opinion was not a decree within the meaning of S. 2(2) of the Code. As regards these defendants there was no adjudication, far less any expression of an adjudication, determining the rights of the parties with regard to any of the matters in the suit. It merely struck those defendants out of the suit as being persons who were not really before the Court and is widely different from an order which purports to strike out a defendant on the ground that no cause of action has been made out against them, Idan Khan v. Mendi Lal (2) or an order striking out from the array of parties a defendant as an unnecessary party and dismissing the suit as against him, Rama Rao v. Raja of Pittapur (3), which orders clearly fall within that definition. No appeal therefore in our opinion lay from that part of the Munsiff's decision and the plaintiff could not have preferred a cross-appeal.

In our judgment therefore the proper order to pass in this case is to set aside the decrees of both the Courts below and remand the suit to the trial Court so that the plaintiff may now get defendants 3 and 7 properly before the Court and proceed with it.

Costs incurred in this litigation up till now shall be costs in the cause.

Appeal No. 398 of 1927, Decided on 11th March 1929, against original order of Sub-Judge, Pabna, D/- 15th December 1926.

* Civil P. C., S. 47—Execution case dismissed on certification of satisfaction—

Mutual mistake—Order can be reopened—Unilateral mistake of fact (mistake by decree-holder in calculating amount due)—Order dismissing execution application on decree-holder's certifying full satisfaction cannot be reopened.

Where an order of dismissal of execution case is made on account of mutual mistake, the order by consent may be reopened. There is no authority that any order or proceeding can be reopened on the ground of mistake of fact of one of the parties to it.

An execution case was dismissed on the application of the decree-holder stating that the decree had been satisfied in full. Subsequently the decree-holder applied to have the execution proceedings reopened on the ground that the decree-holder made a mistake in calculating the amount due to him under the decree as a result of which the decree-holder got much less than what he was entitled to.

Held: that the execution proceedings could not be opened. It would be against all fundamental rules of relief on the ground of mistake to say that the mistake due to the negligence of one of the parties is sufficient to relieve him of his own agreement. [P 672 C 1, 2]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the judgment-debtors against an order of the Subordinate Judge reopening an execution proceeding on an application made by the decree-holder on 22nd March 1926. The ground on which the Court below has granted his application for reopening the execution proceeding and allowed him to execute the decree again for a sum of Rs. 2150-5-0, was that the decree-holder made a mistake in calculating the amount due to him under the decree and in stating in his petition dated 22nd March 1926 that the decree was satisfied on payment of Rs. 5,300 by the judgment-debtors on that date. The learned Subordinate Judge who was the predecessor of the Subordinate Judge who finally decided the case held that the Court had jurisdiction to reopen an execution proceeding on the ground of mistake on the authority of the case of Nil Ratan Khasnobish v. Ram Rutton Chatterji (1) on which the respondent also relies in this Court in support of the judgment of the Subordinate Judge. The Subordinate Judge who decided the case finally went into the question as to how much was due to the decree-holder on 22nd March 1926 on account of the decree that he had obtained against the judgment-debtors. He went into the evidence as regards the different payments made by the judgment-debtors and came to the conclusion that a certain payment of Rs. 2,000 which the judgment-debtors alleged to have made was not true and, therefore, the amount stated in the application for execution of the decree-holder which was made on 16th June 1925 was less by about Rs. 2,000 on account of a mistake made by the decree-holder and he held that the order of dismissal on satisfaction should, therefore, be set aside.

On appeal by the judgment-debtors it was contended on their behalf that the Court was functus officio and that their case came within the ruling of Fakaruddin Mahomed Ahsan v. Official Trustee of Bengal (2). It may, however, be conceded that the Court can reopen an order or decree on the ground of fraud, misrepresentation or mistake; and where an order has been made by consent of parties, it is well settled that that order can be reopened on grounds on which a contract may be set aside or rectified. The application made by the decree-holder on 22nd March 1926 stated that in the execution case of the decree-holder:

"out of the entire sum due to the judgment-debtor Rs. 5,300 was settled as payable to the decree-holder after deduction of the amount remitted" and as this sum was paid, nothing remained due on account of the decree. Upon this application the execution case was dismissed on full satisfaction by the order of the Court. The question is: can the execution proceedings be reopened on the ground stated by the decree-holder that he did not desire to make a remission of more than Rs. 114 while his dues on the decree were over Rs. 7,000. In our opinion, it cannot. Strong reliance has been placed by the respondent on the case of Nil Ratan Khasnobish v. Ram Rutton Chatterji (1), cited above. In that case, the only question that was debated was whether the Court had jurisdiction either under S. 244, Civil P. C., of 1882 (corresponding to S. 47 of the present Code) or under S. 623 of the old Code (as a matter of review) to reopen an order made of dismissal of an execution proceeding on full satisfaction. It appears from the judgment that some other points were sought to be raised on behalf of the appellants in that case before the Court; but the learned Judge disallowed the endeavour to raise them. What appears in that case is that both sides had represented to the Court that the decree had been satisfied and I think it must have been held by the Court of appeal below that the order of dismissal was made on account of mutual mistake of the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor. In such a case, as I have already stated, an order by consent may be reopened. No authority has been shown nor can it be urged, in my opinion, that any order or proceeding can be reopened on the ground of the mistake of fact of one of the parties to it. The general principle as to mistakes of fact is codified in S. 22, Contract Act, where it has been laid down that "a contract is not voidable merely because it was caused by one of the parties to it being under a mistake as to a matter of fact."

What appears in this case was that in the application for execution which was made by the decree-holder on 16th June 1925 it was stated in the Col. 7 that the amount of the decree was Rs. 12,000 and odd. The amount credited was Rs. 8,000 and odd. Therefore deducting this amount the sum of Rs. 4,234 was stated by the decree-holder to be due. To it, he said, the interest and the costs of the previous execution should be added. It was urged in the Court below on behalf of the decree-holder that the mistake in calculation was due to the execution clerk. But that can hardly be put forward as a ground. It was not for the execution clerk to say how much was paid to the decree-holder by the judgment-debtors on previous occasions. He found in the petition for execution which asked for Rs. 4,234 as the principal amount due and upon that the execution clerk made some calculations. If he found that Rs 5,414 was due to the decree-holder and if any mistake was made by him, that mistake was made in favour of the decree-holder and not against him and the pleader for the judgment-debtors simply said, if the decree-holder's evidence is to be believed, that what has been calculated by the clerk has been correctly calculated. It has not been pointed out that taking the decree holder's figure as given in the petition for execution, the calculation would be wrong. However that may be, the sole ground upon which the decree-holder sought for reopening the proceedings was that there was a mistake, which must have been due to his own negligence or to the negligence of his own agents. This cannot be a ground for reopening the proceedings. It would be against all fundamental rules of relief on the ground of mistake to say that mistake due the negligence of one of the parties, is sufficient to relieve him of his own agreement. This appeal will, therefore, be allowed with costs, hearing-fee being assessed at five gold mohurs.

Pearson, J.—The facts here are as follows: The land in suit was a non-transferable occupancy holding belonging to one J. N. Moitra and held under him by two brothers Jadab and Madhab in equal shares. The holding was brought to sale by the landlord for arrears of rent and purchased by himself in 1915. In 1916 Jadab mortgaged his  $\frac{1}{2}$  share to plaintiff. In February 1917 the two brothers sold a portion of the jote to defendant 1 and defendant 2 in the present suit. In 1918 plaintiff sued on his mortgage against Jadab making defendant 1 and defendant 2 also parties: the suit was decreed in March 1919 on compromise against Jadab and ex parte as regards defendant 1 and defendant 2. On 22nd June 1921 Jadab's half share was brought to sale in execution and purchased by the plaintiff. Upon his going to take possession he was resisted by defendant 1 and defendant 2 on the ground that they had taken a settlement from the landlord in January 1918. Hence the present suit. This settlement has been found as a fact by the lower appellate Court, which dismissed the suit with costs.

The main argument before us has been upon the question whether defendant 1 and defendant 2 are not now estopped from raising this question of paramount title in the settlement of 1918 seeing that they failed to raise it in the previous mortgage suit brought by the plaintiff against Jadab to which defendant 1 and defendant 2 were also made parties, though they did not appear. The question was not argued in the lower appellate Court for it was there conceded that no estoppel existed in the present case. The rule of res judicata is set out in S. 11, Civil P. C., 1908, which provides that no Court shall try any suit in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties litigating under the same title, in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit, and has been heard and finally decided. If this part of S. 11 were in itself exhaustive it would be impossible in the circumstances of the present case to support the plea. But then comes Explan. 4 which lets in the principle of constructive res judicata by explaining that any matter which might and ought to have been made ground of defence or attack in such former suit shall be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in such suit. In the circumstances of the present suit it is conceded that the matter of the paramount title might have been made a ground of defence in the previous mortgage suit, and the dispute is narrowed down to the question whether it ought so to have been.

It is clear enough that as a general rule the proper scope of a mortgage suit is to cut off the equity of redemption and bar the rights of the mortgagor and those claiming under him; the only proper parties to such a suit being the mortgagor and the mortgagee and those who have acquired an interest under them subsequent to the mortgage. In such a case a stranger setting up an adverse claim of title cannot be made a party for the purpose of litigating that in the mortgage suit: Jaggewar Dutt v. Bhuban Mohan Mitra (1). In Nila Kant v. Suresh Chandra (2) certain defendants impleaded in a mortgage suit as being interested in the equity of redemption subsequent to the mortgage set up a title paramount and claimed not to be proper parties; they were accordingly dismissed from the suit, and the Judicial Committee agreed that that was the correct view; otherwise it was said, the suit would have been multifarious and confused in the highest degree if it had gone on in that shape, as the defence raised was quite foreign to the scope of a mortgage suit. Certain other decisions are to be found in the reports bearing upon this question where, as in the present case, the person subsequently setting up a claim of paramount title is a party to the former litigation in another capacity which brings him within the legitimate arena of the mortgage suit.

(1) [1905] 33 Cal. 425=3 C. L. J. 205.

(2) [1886] 12 Cal. 414=12 I. A. 171=4 Sar. 685 (P.C.).

(3) [1901] 8 C. W. N. 865.

paramount title had been raised by a defendant whom the mortgagee had made a party as being interested in the equity of redemption; the plaintiff accepted the issue on that footing, and was not allowed subsequently to maintain that it should not have been raised. In Girja Kanta v. Mohim Chandra (4) the facts were that three brothers A, B and C were owners of the disputed property. A and B executed a mortgage of the entire property to the plaintiff. Then A died and subsequently the mortgagee sued B and C to enforce his security. B was made a party as an original mortgagor and as one of A's representatives: C only as the representative of his deceased brother A. There was no suggestion that the mortgage was operative otherwise against C. A decree was then made ex parte in the mortgage suit and the property was brought to sale and purchased by the plaintiff. He failed to get actual possession and sued to eject B and C. It was held that C was entitled to plead his paramount title and was not bound by the doctrine of res judicata; that as C was a party to the previous suit only as representing his brother A the question whether the mortgage was operative against him in his personal capacity was not and could not have been raised in that litigation, as the suit was framed. The principle of this case was followed in Gobardhan v. Munna Lal (5) where a puisne mortgagee holding also a paramount title in one instance did not appear, and in the other attempted to set up his paramount title but was not allowed to do so: see also Ramanna v. Venkatanarayana (6). In the case of Srimanta Seal v. Bindubasini (7) the facts were very similar to those in the present case and the position is thus summarized, that:

"the plaintiff was joined as a defendant in the suit instituted by the mortgagees to enforce their security. At that time he had a twofold character ..... He was no doubt joined as a defendant as the purchaser of the equity of the redemption. But he could also set up his title paramount derived from the landlords."

The learned Judge (who was also a party to the decision in Girja Kanta's case (4) case above cited) then refers to the case of Hare Krishna v. Robert Watson & Co. (3) and continues:

"Here the plaintiff was a defendant in the mortgage suit. He had a twofold character. As purchaser of the equity of redemption he was properly before the Court; as settlement holder from the superior landlord, he could set up a defence that the mortgage could not be enforced against the property in his hands. He did not take that defence and the result was that a decree was made for sale of the mortgaged property in his presence. The decree is operative against him and he will be bound by the result of the sale in execution. In the present litigation, he seeks to avoid the decree and to make it inoperative, though it was passed in his presence and is obligatory upon him. Clearly such a course is not permissible: if this suit were allowed to be maintained, the only possible result would be a multiplicity of litigation."

This decision in Srimanta v. Bindubasini (7), has been strongly urged on behalf of the appellant in the present case. It is a matter for observation, however, that throughout the judgment the mind of the Court is directed entirely towards whether the defence of the paramount title "could" be set up in the mortgage suit; nowhere does it appear that the Court applied itself to the consideration of the question whether that was a matter which not only might but also ought to have been made a ground of defence in the former suit, within the meaning of Expln. 4, S. 11, Civil P. C. Unless both conditions are satisfied the rule will not apply.

The question whether a matter ought to have been made ground of defence or attack in a previous suit is one which has been said to depend upon the particular facts of each case; and where matters are so dissimilar that their union might lead to confusion the construction of the word becomes important: Kameswar Pershad v. Rajkumari (8). Nilakant v. Suresh (2), has been already mentioned as a case of a mortgage suit where a defendant being impleaded as having purchased subsequent to the mortgage set up a title paramount by way of defence, and was dismissed from the suit and their Lordships of the Judicial Committee approved that procedure. It is true that there were other parties in the suit also claiming paramount titles in respect of other portions of the property, which would have served to accentuate the multifariousness and confusion to which reference is made, but there is no indication that a Court must go into a question of title paramount, even if raised in a mortgage suit by only one defendant who is impleaded in another capacity as having an interest in the equity of redemption. In Radha Kishan v. Kurshed Hossein (9) already referred to, where a prior mortgagee was made a party in a suit on a subsequent mortgage and did not set up his title, their Lordships say, at p. 15:

"The rule is clear; the controversy is narrowed down to the question whether the facts invite its application. It becomes necessary therefore to see what the position (of the prior mortgagee) was in the former suit."

The position as their Lordships proceed to show was that he was a prior mortgagee with a paramount claim outside the controversy of the suit unless his mortgage was impugned. Consequently to sustain the plea of res judicata it was incumbent on the subsequent mortgagee in the circumstances of that case to show that they sought in the former suit to displace the prior mortgagee's title and postpone it to their own, which meant that it would have been necessary for them as plaintiffs in the former suit to allege a distinct case in their plaint in derogation of the paramount claim of the prior mortgagee.

I think these matters above set out afford a guide for the decision here. It must be seen what the position of defendant 1 and defendant 2 was in the former suit as framed. So far as the plaint was concerned there was no case made in derogation of any paramount claim: on the contrary, it was an ordinary mortgage suit brought for the realization of the mortgage security and the barring of the equity of redemption, defendant 1 and defendant 2 being impleaded therein as possessing an interest in the equity of redemption and in no other capacity. They did not appear. In my opinion in order to sustain the plea of res judicata in the present case it would have to be shown that in the previous suit the question of paramount title had been alleged in order to displace it: and that is not the case. Had defendant 1 and defendant 2 appeared and endeavoured to raise the question themselves in the suit as framed, it is possible that the plaintiff might have objected and it would have been open to the Court to sustain the objection and refuse to enlarge the scope of the suit. If, as I think, the Court had at any rate the discretion, if not the duty, to refuse, it cannot now be contended that the matter was a ground which ought to have been raised. If admitted, it might open the door to the addition of other parties concerned, in this case, for instance, the landlord through whom the paramount title was claimed. It would have altered the whole character and scope of the suit by the introduction of matters outside the limits assigned to the controversy by the plaintiff himself, within which the relief he sought was confined. Having chosen those limits, I do not think that in the circumstances here existing it is permissible for him to contend, as he does, that because the doctrine of res judicata has its root in the policy of avoiding multiplicity of suits, therefore it was obligatory on the defendant in the previous suit to raise the question of title which the plaintiff himself might have endeavoured to put in issue by his pleading had the suit been differently framed and properly framed for that purpose. I would therefore reject the contention that in the circumstances of this case the matter is one which ought to have been raised in the previous suit, and hold that the facts do not attract the operation of the principle of res judicata.

A further point has been raised in the appeal, that in deciding whether the landlord did or did not recognize the old tenant after the rent sale the Court has wrongly placed the burden of proof. The appellant seems to argue that it was for the plaintiff to get from the landlord's man any explanation of the entry of four annas in the landlord's register. He argues that the entry of four annas was a piece of evidence in his favour and it was for the opposite party to explain it away, inasmuch as it would by itself show recognition by the landlord. What the Judge says in that the so called payment of four annas only was extremely curious and no explanation was sought for from the landlord's man who was examined. By this I think the learned Judge means that the fact that only four annas was paid in two years was curious and that plaintiff did not attempt to get from the landlord's man why only four annas was paid. What the plaintiff was asked to explain was not why four annas had been paid which was a fact in his favour but why only four annas had been paid and not more. The important word in the judgment is the word "only." There is no substance in this contention.

The result is that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeals Nos. 101 and 134 of 1928, Decided on 14th May 1929, against the appellate orders of Dist. Judge, Zillah 24 Parganas, D/ 7th November 1927.

(a) Limitation Act, Art. 182—Appeal from amended decree is same as other appeal and postpones execution.

Upon strict construction of Art. 182 or in principle, case of an appeal from amended decree is in no way different from case of an appeal from any other decree and as in the other case, appeal from an amended decree postpones the date from which limitation runs for execution purposes: A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 646, (S.B.), Dist. [P 677 C 2]

(b) Limitation Act, S. 5—Date of decree whether amended or not is date of judgment and amendment does not extend time for appeal.

Whether a decree is amended or is not amended the date of the decree is the date of the judgment and the fact that the decree is amended does not operate of itself to extend the time for appealing: 3 C. L. J. 188, Ref. [P 677 C 2]

(c) Limitation Act, S. 5—Amendment of decree—Time for appeal may be extended under S. 5.

When there has been an amendment of decree and it is reasonable that the time for appealing should be extended recourse has to be had to the power of the Court under S. 5. [P 677 C 2, P 678 C 1]

(d) Civil P. C., S. 104—No appeal lies from order granting amendment unless it is considered as question of review.

There can be no appeal from an order granting an amendment as such unless indeed it be considered as sometimes it has been considered as a question of review in which case it may be possible to maintain an argument that there can be an appeal from that order. [P 678 C 1]

* (e) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 16—Mortgage of mortgage decree—Subsequent mortgagee agreed to be competent to realize sum of mortgage by being made party to execution or by withdrawing deposit or on failure by

If a mortgagee who has obtained a decree upon the mortgage, mortgages the decree with specific provisions that the subsequent mortgagee should be competent to realize the sum of his mortgage by being made a party to the execution proceedings, and should have full powers to withdraw the deposit by the mortgagor judgment-debtor and that if the original mortgagee failed to pay the money lent within a certain period the subsequent mortgagee would be competent to realize the sum due by bringing a suit against his borrower or by execution of the mortgaged mortgage decree the subsequent mortgagee has the decree assigned to him within the meaning of O. 21, R. 16. [P 679 C 2]

(f) Limitation Act, Art. 182—Appeal does not operate as stay of execution but only postpones it.

In execution purposes an appeal by itself never operates as a stay. There is the right to execute the moment the decree is passed; but if there is an appeal the time of limitation is postponed and does not run until the decree determining the appeal is made. So the broad principle in India as regards execution matters is that time is not computed from the date when the right to apply accrues but is postponed in cases where there is an appeal. [P 678 C 2]

* (g) Limitation Act, Art. 182—Decree amended long after judgment—Appeal preferred from amended decree—Amended decree modified—Second appeal preferred to High Court dismissed—Correct date for determining time for execution is date of dismissal of second appeal.

A decree which appeared to be a final mortgage decree was passed on 10th October 1917 and on 8th April 1919 on the application of the decree-holder it was amended upon more than one point. From the decree as amended the judgment-debtor appealed and the decree was modified in this way that while part of the matter added by way of amendment was retained part was set aside. On further appeal to the High Court the appeal was dismissed on 24th July 1924. The application for execution was presented on 18th November 1925.

Held: that the application was not barred for the correct date for determining the time of limitation was 24th July 1924. [P 678 C 2]

(h) Practice—Amendment of decree should not be allowed after considerable delay.

On a mere question as to whether they should get such and such a sum of money or a little more the Court should refuse to entertain application for amendment of decree after a considerable delay such as of 18 months unless there is a reason justifying delay. [P 679 C 1]

No. 101.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case, it appears that one Nagendra Nath Banerji has appealed from an order dismissing the application for execution of one Kartik Chandra Sen. This appeal cannot be sustained and must be dismissed with costs. Hearing fee two gold mohurs.

No. 134.

In this case, an application for execution has been made by one Kartik Chandra Sen who is a sub-mortgagee of the decree of which execution is sought. The first question is the question of limitation. The lower Court has found that execution is time barred. The facts are these: The decree in question which appears to have been a final mortgage decree was passed on 10th October 1917. On 8th April 1919, on the application of the decree-holder that decree was amended. It was amended upon more than one point. It was amended in respect of interim interest; it was amended upon some questions of costs and there was further question of post diem interest at six per cent upon which it was also amended by the trial Court. From that decree as amended, the judgment-debtor appealed and the learned District Judge modified the amended decree in this way that, while a part of the matter which had been added to the decree by way of amendment was retained, another part, namely, that relating to post-diem interest was set aside. From that decision of the District Judge an appeal was taken to this High Court which was dismissed on 24th July 1924.

Now, the petition for execution in this case was presented on 18th November 1925. The question is what is the terminus a quo from which time has to be computed under Art. 182, Sch. 1 to the Limitation Act of 1908. It seems reasonably clear that the date 10th October 1917, the date of the original decree cannot be the period of time from which limitation runs because that decree was modified in various ways by subsequent orders, and so to hold would be contrary to Cl. 4, Art. 182. The next date which may be considered is 8th April 1919 on which date the decree was amended. It has been contended before us, that, on a strict interpretation of Art. 182, that really is the correct date. I am of opinion that that too cannot be the correct date because it is quite clear that, from that amendment or from the decree as amended on 8th April 1919, an appeal was brought and the decree was subsequently modified so that it ceased to be in all respects the test of the liability of the parties. The question, therefore, is whether the next date 21st January 1922 the date on which the District Judge modified the amended decree can be regarded as the date from which limitation runs. No doubt, it would be the date from which limitation would run but for the fact that an appeal was brought from that decree of the District Judge which appeal was dismissed on 24th July 1924. We have to consider whether it is true to say that the case of an appeal from an amended decree is different from the case of an appeal from any other decree so that, while it is clear law that an appeal from any other decree postpones the date from which limitation runs for execution purposes, an appeal from an amended decree has no such operation.

In my judgment, there is no ground either upon a strict construction of Art. 182 or in principle for that contention. The matter may be looked at in this way: when a decree is amended and for this purpose it matters nothing whether in amending the decree the Court has confined itself within the powers given by S. 152, Civil P. C. or not the only decree that exists is the decree as modified by the amendment and the only decree from which an appeal can be brought is the existing decree by which the proposed appellant is aggrieved. For the purpose of computing limitation for appeals the law is clear enough. Under the Civil Procedure Code a decree has to be dated as of the date of the judgment. The appeal has to be brought within a certain time from the date of the decree. Whether a decree is amended or is not amended, the date of the decree is the date of the judgment and the fact that the decree is amended does not operate of itself to extend the time for appealing. That goes back to the date of the judgment and not to the date either of the drawing up of the decree or of the date of the amendment. Accordingly, when there has been an amendment and it is reasonable that the time for appealing should be extended recourse has to be had to the power of the Court under S. 5, Lim. Act. There is no appeal from an order granting an amendment as such, unless indeed it be considered, as sometimes it has been considered, as a question of review in which case it may be possible to maintain an argument that there can be an appeal from that order. But the view taken in such a case as Brojo Lal v. Tara Prosanna (1), is that the correct course is to get an extension under S. 5, Lim. Act and that the appeal that is brought, is brought from the decree that is to say, from the amended decree because there is no other decree in existence. In this case, we have to remember that, when the appeal was brought to the District Judge, it was an appeal from the final decree of 10th October 1917, the circumstance that it had been amended being a circumstance which has no fundamental importance in this case though it might have had importance if any question had arisen about the appeal being in time. The District Judge when on 31st January 1922 he modified the amendment really modified the decree dated 10th October 1917 the only decree that existed in the case.

Under these circumstances, we have to ask ourselves whether there is any ground in logic or in the language of the Limitation Act for refusing to apply the broad general principle that a decree operates as res judicata but when it is appealed from the matter becomes again sub-judice, and for execution purposes the party, although he is allowed to levy execution notwithstanding an appeal, is not, as a matter of limitation, required to do so until the appeal has been disposed of, a principle which dates so far back as 1871 and was enunciated in the judgment of Dwarkanath Mitter, J., in Ram Charan v. Lakhi Kani (2). The sole special feature is that the decree which the District Judge modified was a decree which had been amended. I am of opinion that on principle such a decree is exactly like any other decree and it is of no materiality for the present purpose whether the decree of 10th October 1917 had been amended or had not been amended. If we look at the language of Art. 182, it is quite true that Cl. 4 merely says that where a decree has been amended the time runs from the date of the amendment, but there is provision in Cl. 2 which deals with the question of appeals to say that appeals in the case of amended decrees are any different in their effect upon limitation from appeals in the case of other decrees. The only thing that was necessary in 1908 was to deal with the simple case of a decree which afterwards was amended and to give an extension of time for that. Mr. Brojo Lal Chuckerburtty in a very able argument has referred to the case of Hari Mohan Dalal v. Parameswar (3). That was a case where the question arose under Art. 181, Sch. 1. Lim. Act. Now there is this broad contrast between Art. 181 and Art. 182 that under the residuary Art. 181 time runs from the date, to use the exact language of the statute, "when the right to apply accrues." In execution matters, that is not usually the case. It never is the case of execution purposes that an appeal by itself operates as a stay. There is the right to execute the moment a decree is passed but if there is an appeal the time of limitation is postponed and does not run until the decree determining the appeal is made. So, the broad principle in India as regards execution matters is that time is not computed from the date when the right to apply accrues, but is postponed in cases where there is an appeal. It does not, therefore, seem to me that any case under Art. 181 can be expected to throw light upon the true position on a question of execution under Art. 182. The case in question was a case under S. 144 of the Code and the question was whether the right to apply for restitution arose under Art. 181 on the date of the order or on the date of the decree dismissing the appeal. It seems to me that there is a very broad distinction which would prevent us from regarding that case as being in point. In my judgment, therefore, there is no escape from the conclusion that the correct date for determining the time of limitation is 24th July 1924.

I would here observe that the fact that to amend a decree has consequences under Art. 182 and otherwise is very well worth bearing in mind when Courts are asked after an interval of eighteen months to amend a decree. On a mere question as to whether the plaintiff should get such and such a sum of money or a little more, I should have thought that no application to amend a decree ought to be entertained after so much as eighteen months. If a person came three weeks afterwards, I would not be surprised that his application was entertained. If he came three months afterwards, one might think it a bad case, but be open to consider whether there was reason which could justify the delay, when a person comes eighteen months afterwards to ask that a provision about interest be added to his decree, it would be a very good thing if the lower Courts would appreciate the consequences of entertaining such an application and would refuse to entertain an application of this character. If it be true that the appeal to the District Judge was an appeal from the amended decree bearing date 10th October 1917 though amended by an order of the Court dated 8th April 1919 it may be the right view that the Court of appeal had only to consider whether the decree as it stood was a proper decree to have been passed. I understand that in this case the view which was ultimately taken by the High Court was not that post-diem interest was an improper thing to order in itself but that it was a thing which was improperly added under S. 152, Civil P. C. Whether that is a matter proper to be considered when an appeal is brought from an amended decree is a question of some importance upon which I do not desire now to pronounce any opinion.

The next question which we have to determine is whether Kartik Chandra Sen is a proper person having regard to O. 21, R. 16, Civil P. C., to make an application in execution. If he is, then a further question will arise in the course of the execution proceedings as to whether Nagendra Nath Banerjee who appears to have been a subsequent transferee of the decree has or has not got priority. We have only to decide whether Kartik Chandra Sen is a proper person at whose instance the decree can be executed, in other words, whether he is a person to whom the decree has been transferred by an assignment in writing. We have before us the document under which he takes his interest in this decree. It is a mortgage for a certain sum of money Rs. 900 carrying a certain rate of interest and the mortgage is not a mortgage in general terms but has a certain specific provision. At the time apparently an application for execution had been made by the original mortgagee and the mortgage provided that Kartik Chandra Sen would be :

"competent to realize the above sum by being added as a party to the above execution case jointly with us."

It was further provided that, if the defendant deposited the sum due under the decree, Kartik Chandra Sen would be competent to withdraw the sum due to him together with interest and costs. It was further provided that should the original mortgagees fail to pay the money lent within a certain period Kartik Chandra Sen would be competent to realize the sum due to him by bringing a suit against his borrowers or by execution of the above decree in his own name. In these circumstances it appears to me that Kartik Chandra Sen is within the description of persons given by R. 16, O. 21, Civil P. C., and that his application for execution cannot be dismissed on the ground that he has no sufficient interest in the decree.

In these circumstances, this case must go back to the Court of execution and it will be for that Court of execution to see that any sum that is recoverable in the process of execution is properly distributed between the parties entitled to get it and to make such order as regards payment of money out of Court as may seem necessary.

The present appeal must succeed. The appellant must have his costs against the judgment-debtor. The hearing-fee in this Court is assessed at three gold mohurs.

(a) Bengal Public Demands Recovery Act (3 of 1913), S. 9—Certificate must be made against and served on proper persons from whom debt is due.

Section 9 gives a valuable right to the certificate debtor and therefore it is necessary that the certificate should be made against and served on proper person from whom the amount of debt is due. [P 681 C 1]

(b) Bengal Public Demands Recovery Act (3 of 1913), S. 20—To ensure indefeasible title certificate must be made against proper person.

Under S. 20 what purchaser gets in a sale under the Act is the right, title and interest of the certificate debtor. Therefore in order that the sale may pass title to the purchaser it is necessary to make the certificate against proper person. [P 681 C 1]

(c) Bengal Public Demands Recovery Act, (3 of 1913) S. 41—Certificate has same effect as decree of civil Court—Decree against person as representing minors is inoperative against minors unless person is entered as such in Collectorate Register.

A certificate under the Act is considered as equivalent to a decree of a civil Court. Therefore a decree against a person as representing minors without any mention about the same in Collectorate Register must undoubtedly be held not binding on the minors. [P 681 C 2] (d) Bengal Public Demands Recovery Act (3 of 1913), S. 37—Section presupposes existence of valid certificate against proper person.

Section 37 presupposes the existence of a valid certificate for it is the existence of a valid certificate against the proper person that gives jurisdiction to the certificate officer to sell the property of that person. [P 682 C 1]

Judgment.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was for recovery of possession of the plaintiff's moiety share of touzi No. 12713 of the Dacca Collectorate and also for mesne profits. The plaintiffs are the minor sons of one Sudhanya Chandra Roy deceased. It appears from examination of the papers of the Collectorate produced in this case that the touzi originally belonged to two brothers Arun Chandra Roy and Sudhanya Chandra Roy who owned eight annas share each. This was the state of things in 1919. In 1920 Sudhanya was recorded as the sole proprietor. Certificate was issued by the Certificate Officer on 16th September 1919 under the Public Demands Recovery Act in respect of cesses due from the estate. In the certificate the certificate debtor's name was mentioned as Joylakshmi Debya manager on behalf of (ka) Arun Chandra Roy and (kha) Sudhanya Chandra Roy. This certificate was duly filed and the property was ordered to be sold. In 1920 it was brought to the notice of the Certificate Officer that Sudhanya had become the sole proprietor and he ordered the sale proclamation to be issued in his name only. The property was subsequently sold for Rs. 50 and purchased by one Krishna Kishore who conveyed it later to defendant 1. This suit was instituted in April 1925 for declaration that the sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act did not pass any title to the purchaser and for recovery of possession of the property from defendant 1. Both the Courts below have found against the plaintiffs and dismissed their suit.

The only question raised before us is that the certificate having been issued in the name of a wrong person the right, title and interest of the owner did not pass by the sale and the purchaser accordingly obtained no title to the property. This question was not raised in this form in the Courts below. There is no reference to it in the judgment of the trial Court; but in the lower appellate Court it was urged on the ground that at the time the certificate was issued Sudhanya Chandra Roy was major. The question, however, is of some importance and does not depend upon any extraneous evidence but has to be decided on the documents filed in this case. We have therefore to consider as to whether the certificate was properly made in this case and was duly filed. Under S. 4, Public Demands Recovery Act (3 of 1913 B. C.), when the Certificate Officer is satisfied that any public demands payable to the Collector is due, he may sign a certificate in the prescribed form being form No. 1 in the Appendix to the Act. Col. 3 of the form requires that the name and address of the certificate-debtor should be given. Under S. 6 the Certificate Officer has to file the certificate in the prescribed form and shall cause the certificate to be filed in his office. On the filing of the certificate further execution will issue under S. 7 and notice under that section shall be served on the certificate debtor in the prescribed form. The notice should specify that a certain sum has been found to be due from the certificate debtor on account of some demand from him under S. 4 or 5 of the Act. The service of the certificate upon the certificate debtor has the effect under S. 8 of an attachment by civil Court and any transfer thereafter of the property or any of his immovable property is to be deemed bad in law. S. 9 is an important section and has to be considered in this connexion. If a certificate is duly made and filed by service of notice effected on the certificate debtor, he may within 30 days from the service of notice under S. 7 or from the date of execution of any process for enforcing the certificate present to the Collector or the Certificate Officer a petition denying his liability in whole or in part. This section gives a valuable right to the certificate debtor and therefore it is necessary that the certificate should be made against and served on the proper person from whom the amount of the debt is due. Part 3 of the Act deals with execution of certificates. S. 20 declares that if a property is sold in execution of a certificate, there shall vest in the purchaser merely the right, title and interest of the certificate debtor against whom the certificate has been issued, at the time of the sale. The following sections deal with the steps to be taken by the certificate debtor for having the sale set aside. Now under S. 20 what the purchaser gets in a sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act is the right, title and interest of the certificate debtor. It is therefore necessary in order to pass any title to the purchaser to make the certificate against the proper certificate debtor.

Now to come to the facts of the present case. As we have said, the certificate was issued against the mother of the minors in which she was described as the manager on behalf of her minor sons. The objection has been thus answered by the learned District Judge in appeal:

"Arun and Sudhanya never registered their names in the Collectorate and allowed their mother to represent them in the Collectorate. Therefore the certificate made was legal and binding upon Sudhanya the father of the plaintiffs."

The accuracy of this statement was challenged before us and we had therefore to send for the original D Register of the Collectorate and the original certificate issued. We have now looked into these papers and we find that in 1919 in the Collectorate Register the names of Arun and Sudhanya stood in respect of 16 annas of this touzi. There is no mention in the register of the name of the mother Joylakshmi Debi as representing the minors. There is nothing on the record to show at to how she came to be described as the manager of the minors. The District Judge therefore is not right in his observation that these minors allowed their mother to represent them in the Collectorate and that therefore the certificate was binding upon them. A certificate under the Public Demands Recovery Act is considered as equivalent to a decree of a civil Court. A decree in the form in which the certificate was issued if made by a civil Court must undoubtedly be held not binding on the minors whose interest is sought to be affected by it.

In the case of minors there is a provision in the Public Demands Recovery Act which has been held to be a complete Code in itself except on points to which the Civil Procedure Code has been made applicable. S. 41 of the Act lays down that when the Certificate Officer is satisfied that the certificate debtor is a minor or of unsound mind he shall in any proceeding under the Act, permit him to be represented by any suitable person. The certificate does not show that Arun and Sudhanya were minors at the time when it was issued and if minors that their mother was allowed to represent them in the proceeding. She has been described as the manager. Under S. 4 of the Act a manager is not a person from whom a public demand is due. If they were treated as minors, there is no order by the Certificate Officer permitting the mother to represent them in the certificate proceeding. In Mt. Raj Koer v. Ganga Singh (1), it was held that the effect of a sale under the Public Demands Recovery Act being to pass to the purchaser merely the right, title and interest of the person named as judgment-debtor in the certificate, the purchaser acquires no right if the person appears to have no interest in the property at the date of the sale. In that case the registered debtor had lost his interest before the sale by the Collector and it was held that the purchaser did not get any title under it.

Reference has been made to Ss. 36 and 37 of the Act. S. 36 prescribes the period of one year within which a suit has to be brought if the sale is sought to be set aside on the ground that no notice under S. 7 was served and that the plaintiff has sustained substantial injury by reason of the irregularity. The present suit is not of that character and does not come within the purview of the section. S. 37 says that every question arising between the certificate holder and the certificate debtor shall be determined, not by suit but by order of the Certificate Officer excepting that a suit may be brought in a civil Court on the ground of fraud. This section presupposes the existence of a valid certificate for it is the existence of a valid certificate against the proper person that gives jurisdiction to the Certificate Officer to sell the property of that person. It is well settled that when there are no arrears the Certificate Officer has no jurisdiction to issue certificate and to sell any property under it on the ground that the Act comes into operation on the existence of a public demand for the recovery of which action has to be taken. On the same principle the Certificate Officer is entitled to take action under the Act when there are arrears but he has no jurisdiction to sell the property of a person unless he has made and filed a proper certificate charging that person with liability.

As regards the merits of the case, it has been found by the learned District Judge that there is no evidence of service of notice under S. 7 and that the value fetched at the sale was certainly very low. But the learned Judge does not give effect to these findings on the ground that there is nothing to show that the inadequacy of price was due to non-service of notice under S. 7 and that the suit was not brought within one year from the date of sale under S. 36 of the Act.

Giving our anxious consideration to the facts of this case we have come to the conclusion that the certificate as made was not a proper certificate to charge the plaintiffs' predecessor with liability and that the sale under it did not pass any title.

The result is that this appeal succeeds, the decree of the Court below is set aside and the plaintiffs' suit decreed with costs in all the Courts against defendant 1. The case is remanded to the trial Court for ascertainment of mesne profits.

A declaration by a person that another person is his legitimate son born of his loins and in the womb of his married wife is an acknowledgment not merely of sonship but of legitimate sonship. And if direct evidence of marriage is adduced and the Court disbelieves it the effect of presumption arising from the acknowledgment is not lost and the failure does not absolve the opposite party from disproving or proving the impossibility of marriage and thereby rebutting the presumption: *A. The fact that the daughter of a woman whose marriage is disbelieved, obtained a dowry exactly the same as in case of admittedly legitimate daughter immensely adds to the presumption of marriage. [P 684 C 2]

Failure to prove kabinamah does not disprove marriage. [P 684 C 2]

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for establishment of title to and recovery of possession of certain properties and also for accounts. The plaintiff being unsuccessful in both the Courts below have preferred this second appeal.

Abdul Azim and Abdul Gani were two brothers. Abdul Gani died in 1318 B.S. leaving two sons, Makram Ali and Nizam Ali, the latter having been defendant 1 in the suit and he having died his heirs were substituted in his place. Abdul Azim had two daughters whose names were Kali Bibi and Choto Bibi. The plaintiff claims that he and the pro forma defendant Lal Bibi were the son and the daughter of Abdul Azim by his second wife Najibannessa. Abdul Azim died in 1328 B. S.

In 1295 Abdul Gani and his wife and Abdul Azim made a wakf in respect of their properties, providing that the sons of Abdul Gani and their heirs were to be mutwallis. On the death of Abdul Gani in 1318, Makram Ali instituted a suit in 1914 for a declaration that the wakfnama was invalid and for establishment of his title by inheritance to an eight-anna share of the properties left by his father. This suit was disposed of in 1919, the wakfnama being declared invalid, and amongst other declarations made it was declared that the properties mentioned in Sch. Ka and Kha of the plaint and some other properties were the properties of Abdul Azim. The plaintiff alleged in his plaint that after his decision Abdul Azim demanded possession of all his properties till his death in 1328 B. S.

There were various defences taken, which necessitated the framing of no less than 18 issues. Of these only one, namely issue 6, was really tried and it being decided against the plaintiff the suit has been dismissed. That issue was worded thus:

"Was plaintiff's mother married wife of Moulvi Abdul Azim deceased and is plaintiff his legitimate son?"

The proof that the plaintiff adduced falls under the following heads: (1) Acknowledgments made by Abdul Azim himself. (2) Evidence showing legitimacy of the plaintiff's sister Lal Bibi, as on the proof of her legitimacy the plaintiff's legitimacy follows as a matter of course. (3) Evidence of conduct on the part of other members of the family. (4) Direct oral evidence of marriage between Abdul Azim and Najibannessa. In disproof of the plaintiff's legitimacy the defendants have relied on: (a) the absence of a kabinnamah in respect of the alleged marriage between Abdul Azim and Najibannessa; (b) the fact that Abdul Azim joined with Abdul Gani and his wife in creating a wakf which was to be administered by Abdul Gani's sons and their heirs, (c) the evidence of a witness who happened to be the Sub-Registrar of Dacca. (d) The evidence afforded by the absence of the plaintiff from a photograph representing the family group. (e) Positive evidence to the effect that the plaintiff's mother was the kept woman of somebody else for some time and that she was but a woman who tended cattle in the house of Abdul Azim and Abdul Gani and of the latter's son, and (f) some evidence of the treatment she received from the family.

Now, of the different items of evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff, item (1) is of the utmost importance. Leaving aside the evidence of oral acknowledgment (as spoken to by P. Ws. Nos. 2, 3, 4, 7 and 10) and such documentary evidence of acknowledgment as may be said to be of doubtful import, describing the plaintiff merely as a son and not as a legitimate son (e. g., Exs. 5, 6, 10, 18, 72, 76 (a), 76 (b), 76 (d) and 80 (a), there are four pieces of documents the importance of which cannot be overrated. They are Exs. 13, 2, 3 and 4. In these the plaintiff was declared by Abdul Azim to be his legitimate son born of his loins and in the womb of his last married wife Najibannessa. These acknowledgments exactly fulfil the requirements of the law as explained by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in these words:

"This acknowledgment must be not merely of sonship, but must be made in such a way that the acknowledgor meant to accept the other not only as his son, but as his legitimate son: Habibur Rahman v. Altaf Ali Choudhury (1)."

Now item (4) of the evidence, namely, the direct evidence of the marriage has not been accepted as reliable by either of the Courts below, and in second appeal it cannot possibly be relied upon. But what is the legal effect of this position? It has been so summarized by the District Judge:

"But direct evidence of marriage has been put in, and I think that, in such circumstances when the appellant has put forward a definite marriage on a definite date, if the Court disbelieves that, then the respondent can rightly claim that some progress has been made towards the disproof of marriage, for it is recognized that it is for the respondent to disprove marriage."

(1) A. I. R. 1922 P. C. 159=48 Cal. 856=48 I. A. 114 (P.C.).

This was precisely the position in the case of Imambundi v. Mutsaddi (2), in which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee found the direct evidence of marriage by no means satisfactory and still proceeded to give effect to the legal presumption arising from acknowledgment holding that such presumption was not rebutted. Their Lordships thus observed:

"But their Lordships find clear evidence of a reliable character regarding the acknowledgment of her children. Her case thereupon comes within the rule of Mahomedan Law to which Garth, C. J. and Wilson, J. (afterwards Sir Arthur Wilson) gave expression in Mahatala Bibi v. Prince Ahmed Haleem-ooz-zaman (3)."

To hold that when the plaintiff has failed to add to the presumption by proving the marriage aliunde the effect of the presumption is lost in whole or in part, or in other words that the defendant has by such failure on the plaintiff's part made some progress for themselves is contrary to the view expressed as above by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee. The learned District Judge was, therefore, not right in his appreciation of the law in this respect.

It is as well here to consider what is the true effect of this legal presumption. In Sadik Husain Khan v. Hashim Ali Khan (4), Lord Atkinson delivering the judgment of the Board said as follows:

"If this be so the rule of the Mahomedan Law applicable to the case is well established. No statement made by one man that another (proved to be illegitimate) is his son can make that other legitimate, but where no proof of that kind has been given such a statement or acknowledgment is substantive evidence that the person so acknowledged is the legitimate son of the person who makes the statement provided his legitimacy is possible."

Much to the same effect are the words of the judgment in the case of Mt. Nawabunnissa v. Mt. Fuzloonissa (5), which was quoted by Garth, C. J. and Wilson, J., in the case of Mahatala Bibi v. Prince Ahmed Haleem-ooz-zaman (3), a case cited approvingly by the Judicial Committee as already mentioned. It was said in that case:

"When a man has openly, and for a long course of time, lived with a woman, as a man lives with his wife, and has habitually and openly treated the children as his children before the world or whom he has publicly and advisedly said, of a boy begotten by himself, "this is my son," then the presumption takes its full effect. In that case, we think that the law not only raises a presumption of marriage, but in practice prohibits any counter proof short of establishing a legal impossibility. In such a case we may not really believe that there was an actual celebration of marriage; we may have little doubt that there was nothing of the kind; but marriage is legally possible, and it must be presumed, not as much by presumption of fact, as by presumption of law."

If item (1) creates a presumption of which the plaintiff can avail notwithstanding that item (4) has not been accepted, let us examine the effect of the other two items, viz. (2) and (3). As regards item (2) it appears that Lal Bibi married the brother of the wife of defendant 1's brother and the dower was exactly the same as in the case of Kali Bibi an admitted legitimate daughter of Abdul Azim and in the kabinnamah she is described as daughter of Abdul Azim and designated Khanum. All this immensely adds to the presumption and the District Judge was also of opinion that it is weighty. As regards item (3) the account books as well as the signature of the plaintiff as an identifier do not go very far, but that certainly does not take away from the presumption.

To rebut the presumption the defendants have adduced evidence which has been classified above under six heads, (a) to (f). The plaintiff's failure to prove the kabinnamah which is item (a) is something which cannot possibly be held to disprove the marriage. Item (b) is sufficiently explained by the fact that the plaintiff was not born at the date and the consideration that weighed with the District Judge, namely, that if there was hope of a lawful issue Abdul Azim would not create such a wakf, may be explained on more hypotheses than one. Item (c) is a mere matter of opinion, and hardly any evidence in disproof of legitimacy. The District Judge himself has set no store by item (d) and has definitely disbelieved item (e). As regards item (f), two witnesses for the defendant have deposed to the effect that Najimannessa was not buried in the family burial ground. The trial Court relied on these witnesses, but the District Judge has not referred to them. Their evidence, on other points, is scarcely believable for they deposed that Najimannessa tended cattle and slept in the baitakkhana, which she would never do in any view of the case. In any event, the District Judge does not appear to have been impressed with their evidence, for he says that Najimannessa had some sort of footing in the household.

None of these items of evidence, (a) to (f), nor all of them together disprove the marriage or make the marriage an impossibility. The presumption in plaintiff's favour stands un rebutted and must have its effect.

The result is that issue 6 must be answered in the affirmative, with the result the other issues framed would require trial.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed, and the judgments of the Courts below being set aside the case will be sent back to the trial Court for trial and determination of the other issues in the case, and on that being done the suit will be disposed of by that Court.

Costs heretofore incurred will be costs in the cause. The cross-objection is dismissed but without costs.

Where the decision under S. 105 does not determine what the correct rent of the holding is but merely decides what the rate of the enhancement should be, the decision will not operate as res judicata in the investigation of the question as to what the true rent was at the date of the entry in the khatian: 44 Cal. 783; A. Judgment.—The plaintiffs who are dar-ijaradars of a mahal instituted this suit for recovery of arrears of rent at the rate of Rs. 38-6-6 for the years 1327 to 1330 B. S. for a certain holding. The defendant alleged that the rent was Rs. 26 and was recorded as such in the settlement khatian and that as a result of proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, the said rent was enhanced to Rs. 29-10-6 the enhancement operating from 1328. There was also a plea of deduction which, however, was given up.

The Munsif decreed the suit at the rate of Rs. 38-6-6 for the year 1327 B. S. and at the rate of Rs. 29-10-6 for the years 1328 to 1330 B. S. The Subordinate Judge on appeal by the plaintiffs gave them a decree for all the years at the rate of Rs. 38-6-6. The defendants have then appealed to this Court.

The Subordinate Judge has found the following facts: The mahal in which the holding in suit is situate is in the hands of a receiver who lets it out in ijara for terms, and the ijaralar in his turn also sub-lets it in dar-ijara for similar terms, that although there was abundant evidence in the shape of contested decrees, etc., for rent showing that the rent of the holding was Rs. 38-6-6 the dar-ijaradar who preceded the plaintiffs in collusion with the defendants got the rent of the holding to be recorded in the settlement khatian as Rs. 26 and also collusively got a decree for rent passed for the years 1325 and 1326 B. S. at that rate, that the receiver being ignorant of the real facts took the said rent as recorded in the khatian to be real rent and on the footing of that entry instituted proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, and an order was passed by the Assistant Settlement Officer in the said proceedings allowing enhancement at the rate of 2 annas 3 pies in the rupee and thus the rental was enhanced from Rs. 26 to Rs. 29-10-6, the said enhancement to take effect from 1328. Being of opinion that the decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer was vitiated by fraud and collusion the learned Subordinate Judge decreed suit at the real rate, namely, of Rs. 38-6-6.

The contentions urged in support of the appeal are that there was no duty cast upon the defendants to bring the real rate of rent to the notice of the Assistant Settlement Officer who dealt with the proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, and there was no fraud or collusion in those proceedings, that the decision under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act cannot be challenged collaterally in the present suit for rent and that effect must be given to the said decision as contemplated by S. 107, Ben. Ten. Act.

Reading the decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, it appears that the question as to what was the then existing rent of the holding was never put in issue before him, but that all that was decided by him was what the rate of enhancement should be. Quite apart from any question of fraud or collusion the decision under S. 105, therefore, will not operate as a bar to the investigation of the question as to what was the rate of rent at the date of the khatian for no such question was raised or decided in the proceedings under S. 105 Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad v. Ahmad Hossain (1) and Priyambada Debi v. Priya Nath Banerjee (2). The present suit being one in which the plaintiffs have asked for a decree at the old rate of rent, and they having succeeded in establishing by evidence notably, contested decree for rent previously obtained against the defendants which in the opinions of both the Courts below was sufficient and satisfactory what that rent was and in thus proving that the entry in the khatian was incorrect the decision under S. 105 cannot stand in the way of their getting a decree at the correct rate. This conclusion, in my opinion, is sufficient for the disposal of the appeal.

I shall now turn to the line of reasoning upon which the learned Subordinate Judge has proceeded and deal with the grounds upon which that reasoning has been assailed. In the proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, there may not have been a duty cast upon the defendants to tell the Assistant Settlement Officer what the real rent of the holding was when the receiver had asked that officer to proceed on the footing of the rent as recorded in the khatian but it is clear beyond doubt that the collusion between the outgoing dar-ijaradar and the defendants which was productive of the erroneous entry in the khatian had also for its object the perpetration of a fraud, the laying in of a trap in which the defendants' opponent, whoever it may happen to be, would fall and by keeping the opponent as well as the Court in ignorance of the real facts by means of a mediated contrivance secure to the defendants an unfair advantage which would bring about an erroneous decision when the question would arise as to what the real rent was. This sort of collusion and fraud is quite different from mere production of perjured evidence and satisfies the requirements of the decision in the case of Nanda Kumar v. Ramjiban (3); and is, in my opinion, sufficient to vitiate the order of the Court that is procured thereby. When a subsisting judgment, order or decree is set up by one party as a bar to the claim of the other party, it is not necessary for the latter to bring a separate suit to have the same set aside but it is open to him in the same suit in which it is sought to be used against him to show that it was obtained by fraud or collusion. Rajib Panda v. Lekhan Sendh (4), Nistarini Dassi v. Nundo Lall Bose (5), Aswini Kumar Samuddar v. Banamali Chakrabarty (6), Bansi Lal v. Dhapo (7) and Rangnath Sakham v. Govind Narasivu (8). That the same principle is applicable to decisions of Settlement Courts has been held in the case of Hare Krishna Sen v. Umesh Chandra Dutt (9). The case of Fazuluddin Muhammad v. Khetra Ghorai (10); and the line of cases upon which it proceeds is entirely distinguishable from the present case because the plaintiff in this case was not a party or privy to the settlement proceedings, and he has acquired from the receiver who was a party to the decision under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, not the right to realise the particular rent of the holding. Once collusion and fraud is established the decision loses all its force and effect which otherwise it would have of a decree of a civil Court and the finality that S. 107, Ben. Ten. Act, attaches to it. The appellant's contentions, therefore, are not well founded.

The appeal fails and is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 85 of 1929, Decided on 22nd July 1929, from appellate order of 1st Sub-Judge, Pabna and Bogra, D/- 15th September 1928.

(a) Civil P. C., S. 48—Compromise entered into during execution proceedings by which part of claim was given up and part agreed to be paid in instalment—If default in payment on specified date decree-holder entitled to execute for whole—Application for execution made on default—Application filed for execution of substituted decree and held not barred under S. 48.

A decree-holder applied for execution of his decree. There were more than one execution proceedings. At one such proceedings the parties came to terms and a compromise was entered into between them by which the decree-holder gave up part of his claim and judgment-debtor promised to satisfy the remaining claim in instalments. It was further agreed that in default of payment of instalment on specified dates decree-holder would be entitled to realize entire sum by execution. The first instalment was not paid on the specified date, and so the decree-holder made an application for execution. The application was made within three years of the default but more than 12 years after the passing of decree.

Held: that the application was an application to execute the substituted decree and the provisions of S. 48, Civil P. C., did not operate as a bar to it provided the application was otherwise sustainable: 27 C. W. N. 43n, Dist. [P 689 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. O. 21, R. 2—For execution of adjusted decree adjustment must be certified—No limitation applies to decree-holder's application.

In order to enable an executing Court to execute an adjusted decree the only requirement is that the adjustment should be certified under O. 21, R. 2. The decree-holder can certify such adjustment at any time as there is no limitation with regard to his application. [P 689 C 1]

(c) Jurisdiction—Provided there is no want of jurisdiction in Court agreement between parties can invest Court with jurisdiction for certain proceedings contrary to ordinary cursus curiae.

Provided there is no inherent want of jurisdiction in the Court with regard to the subject matter before it or with regard to person, parties should be held to the agreement that the questions between them should be heard and determined in proceedings quite contrary to the ordinary cursus curiae. If, therefore, there is an agreement that the money due under an agreement was to be realized by execution rather than by regular process of separate suit, the agreement can be given effect to: *Pisani v. B. B. Ghose, J. — We have heard learned advocates on both sides at some length and we must express our acknowledgment to them for the very careful way in which this case has been argued before us.

This is an appeal by the decree-holder or rather the person who has applied for execution of an agreement against the judgment and order of the learned Subordinate Judge affirming the decision of the Munsif by which the application of the appellant was dismissed. The facts are shortly these:

The appellant obtained a decree for money against the respondents dated 17th December 1913. There were intermediate executions which it is unnecessary to relate now. In one of the execution proceedings the parties came to terms and a compromise was entered into between them dated 16th September 1922, by which the decree-holder gave up a part of his claim and it is alleged in the petition of compromise that the judgment-debtor entreated the decree-holder to accept only Rs. 350 in satisfaction of the decree including costs. They paid Rs. 100 in cash and the balance was agreed to be paid in certain instalments. It was further agreed that if there was default in payment of one of the instalments, the decree-holder would be entitled to realize the entire sum by way of execution against the properties of the judgment-debtors. The first instalment was due in October 1923. The present application was made on 8th November 1926. It has been found by both the Courts below that this application was made within three years of the due date, as holidays intervened. Both the Courts below have dismissed this application on the ground that it is barred under the provisions of S. 48, Civil P. C., as it was made more than 12 years after the date of the original decree passed in the year 1913. It was argued in the Court below that the present petition is a continuation of the petition of 1922 which ended in the compromise. That argument the learned Subordinate Judge refused to accept and, in my judgment, he gives good reasons for rejecting it. He held that the nature and the scope of the two petitions of 1922 and 1926 are quite different and, therefore, the last petition cannot be considered as a continuation of the previous proceedings. It was also argued that under the circumstances of the case it falls within proviso (b), sub-S. (ii), S. 48, Civil P. C. The Subordinate Judge also rejected that contention. The learned advocate for the decree-holder, however, while not giving up the points that were urged in the Court below has presented the case in a different aspect. His argument amounts to this, that the decree was adjusted by the compromise dated 16th September 1922 and the result of the adjustment was that the original decree was extinguished. That being so, the appellant might have brought a suit upon the agreement dated 16th September 1922; but as both the parties agreed that the money should be realized by execution, the executing Court was given jurisdiction to proceed with the execution of the claim and give relief to the appellant. In support of his contention he has relied upon the case of Thakoor Dyal Singh v. Sarju Pershad Misser (1), Sheo Golam Lall v. Beni Prosad (2) and Subramania Pillai v. Corera (3). The learned advocate for the respondent naturally takes exception to the case being presented in this new form. If the appellant can support his contention from the records of the case, it would only be a matter for costs.

What the appellant did in the trial

Court was to ask for the execution of what he stated to be an instalment decree on compromise dated 16th September 1922. The question therefore resolves itself into this: can the appellant realize the money under the compromise by way of execution on the allegation that he is entitled to the money by that compromise of 1922. If the decree-holder has sought for execution of the decree of 1913, there is no question that that application would be barred by limitation. But the question is whether it is an application to execute that decree. The Court below has referred to the case of Rani Syama Sundari Devi v. Sree Raj Gopal Acharya Gossami in M. A. 328 of 1920 which the learned Subordinate Judge cited from 27 C. W. N. Notes portion, p. 43. That case has a strong resemblance to the present but is not quite like it. There a decree was passed on 14th December 1905. Parties came to certain terms in adjustment of the decree in 1910 for payment of the decretal amount in instalments. The application for execution was filed on 16th September 1919 and it was held by the Court that this application was barred under S. 48 of the Code. In so deciding, Sir Lancelot Sanderson, C. J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, stated that in his judgment the application was clearly one for execution of the decree dated 14th December 1905. If that was so, then an application made for its execution on 16th September 1919 was clearly barred under the provisions of S. 48, Civil P. C. The reason why the learned Chief Justice held that the application in that case was for execution of the decree of 1905 is clear from the terms of the compromise entered into by the parties. One of the terms ran as follows:

"As long as the amount due under the instalments remains unpaid, the said original decree shall remain in force."

From these words it is quite clear that the original decree was not superseded by the compromise but it was only an intermediate arrangement for payment of the original decree and it seems to me that on that ground it was held in that case that the decree-holder desired to execute the original decree of December 1905 in September 1919. Therefore although there is some sort of resemblance of that case with the present, they are quite different because in this case the original decree is altogether superseded and a new arrangement has been entered into and as I have pointed out that in his execution petition the decree-holder wanted to execute the substituted decree of 16th September 1922. The provisions of S. 48 cannot bar that application if that application is otherwise sustainable.

The objection raised by the learned advocate for the respondent is that the appellant cannot ask for execution because the parties by entering into a contract cannot give jurisdiction to a Court to realize any money due under a contract by way of execution. The point is not quite free from difficulty. It has, however, been held in a series of cases following the well known case of Pisani v. Attorney General for Gibraltar (4) that where there is no inherent want of jurisdiction in a Court in the subject-matter before it or with regard to the person, the parties by agreement may arrange their own procedure and give jurisdiction to the Court to adopt that procedure. Pisani's case was followed in an Indian case by the Privy Council in Sadasiva Pillai v. Ramalinga Pillai (5), and then in a series of cases in the High Courts of India. In the case of Dyal Singh v. Sarju Pershad Misser (1) a Division Bench of this Court following the Privy Council case held that the parties should be held to the agreement that the questions between them should be heard and determined by proceedings quite contrary to the ordinary cursus curiae and applying this rule to the case, they held that the money due under the agreement there could be realized as in execution of a decree rather than by a recourse to a separate suit. In the case of Muhammad Sulaiman v. Jhukki Lal (6), Mahmood, J., at p. 233 discussed this question in detail. It is necessary, however, to mention that in these cases S. 257-A was referred to because under the Code of 1882 it was necessary to have the sanction of the Court with regard to any adjustment of a decree as without such sanction the adjustment would be void in law. There is no such provision in the present Code and therefore the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor can enter into any agreement for adjustment of a decree. In order to enable the executing Court to execute the decree as adjusted, the only requirement is that the adjustment should be certified under O. 21, R. 2 of the Code. The decree-holder can certify such adjustment at any time as there is no limitation with regard to his certification. But the only question in this case is that if the decree-holder might have brought a separate suit on the agreement, can he not ask for relief in execution by reason of the agreement entered into between the parties that the money should be realized in execution? The cases that have been cited above are authorities for that proposition.

The result is that the order of the Court below is set aside and the case sent back to the trial Court for allowing the appellant to proceed with the execution of the agreement and to recover the money due under it in the usual way as in the case of a decree. As, however, the case was not presented in the Courts below in the way that it has been done here, the appellant is not entitled to his costs hitherto incurred in any of the Courts. Future costs will abide by the discretion of the Court.

Rankin, C. J.—The plaintiff brought a suit in the Court of the Munsif on the allegation that the defendant was in possession of certain land under a mortgage by conditional sale made to him by the plaintiff and claimed to redeem the mortgage and to recover possession of the land. The defendant contended that the mortgage was not genuine, and that the land was his own. A preliminary decree for redemption was made on 8th December 1924 and on 19th December a final decree for redemption was made, the defendant not appearing. The defendant, on 6th January, preferred an appeal to the lower appellate Court against the preliminary decree. When this appeal came on for hearing no objection was raised that the appeal was incompetent, and on 14th December 1925, the appeal was allowed and the plaintiff's suit was dismissed altogether. Two years afterwards the plaintiffs applied to the Court of the Munsif for execution of the final decree. The defendant objected to the execution on the ground that the preliminary decree upon the basis of which the final decree had been passed, having been set aside, the final decree was not a subsisting decree of which execution could be had. The Munsif, and, on appeal from him, the District Judge, have upheld this objection. On second appeal to the High Court by the plaintiff a Division Bench has expressed the opinion that the judgments of the lower Courts are correct, but, in view of certain previous decisions of this Court, has referred the case to a Full Bench for final decision and has formulated the following questions:

(1) Whether an appeal from a preliminary decree is incompetent if a final decree is made before the appeal is presented?

(2) Whether it is necessary for a party aggrieved by a preliminary decree to appeal both from that decree and the final decree in order to maintain his appeal against the preliminary decree, although the final decree apart from its being based on the preliminary decree may be otherwise correct?

In the present case no question arises of the defendant having by his conduct subsequent to the passing of the preliminary decree precluded himself from exercising any right of appeal therefrom conferred upon him by the general law. It is not necessary, therefore, to discuss such cases as Baikuntha Dey v. Salim-ulla Bahadur (1) or Sheik Salim v. Hajira (2) or to enquire what kind of conduct will debar a litigant from exercising a right of appeal given to him by Statute. The mere fact of a final decree is not evidence of such conduct or even of laches. Again, whether or not the defendant, after the passing of the preliminary decree, ought to have preferred an appeal from the final decree as well, it is by no means manifest that the lower appellate Court was without jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the preliminary decree. As it did, in fact, dismiss the plaintiff's suit, it may well be contended that this decision must govern the parties' rights even if it be supposed that the appeal ought not to have been decreed. Indeed the decision in Abdul Jalil v. Ameerchand (3) is an authority to this effect.

I propose, however, to examine the two questions referred to us. In practice they have been found to give rise to much difficulty both in this Court and in the lower Courts.

The terms "preliminary" and "final" decree were probably in general use before 1908, but S. 2, Civil P. C., of that year introduced them as technical expressions and provided a definition:

"A decree is preliminary when further proceedings have to be taken before the suit can be completely disposed of. It is final when such adjudication completely disposes of the suit. It may be partly preliminary and partly final."

Under the present Code suits to redeem or to enforce a mortgage, suits for partition, partnership suits, suits for accounts and other classes of suits are now disposed of by means of two decrees, the preliminary decree which usually settled the rights of the parties, and in this sense is final, (cf. Rahimbhoy v. Turner (4), but which looks forward to a further decree to be made after the rights of the parties, thus declared, have been worked out by subordinate enquiries and other means. Under the Code of 1882, different provisions were made for different classes of suits. Thus, as regards suits for possession of immovable property and for mesne profits, S. 212 provided that :

"the Court may, however, determine the amount by the decree itself or may pass a decree for the property and direct an enquiry into the amount of mesne profits and dispose of the same on further orders."

As regards administration suits the provisions of S. 213 was that :

"the Court before making the decree shall order such accounts and enquiries to be taken and made and give such other directions as it thinks fit."

As regards suits for dissolution of partnership S. 215 provided that :

"the Court before making its decree may pass an order fixing a date on which the partnership shall stand dissolved and directing such accounts to be taken and other acts to be done as it thinks fit."

So too, under S. 215-A, in a suit for accounts between principal and agent, "the Court shall before making its decree pass an order directing such accounts to be taken as it thinks fit."

In suits to enforce a mortgage the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act did not require that a mortgage decree under S. 88 should be followed by any supplemental decree, but only, if necessary, by an application for an order absolute for sale under S. 89. This was clearly brought out by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Amluk Chand v. Sarat Chandra (5). The order absolute for sale was regarded as an order for the realization of the decree or as an order giving the plaintiff execution for the amount of the decree. Under the Code of 1882, however, the general definition of decree was wide enough to cover orders, if these were formal expressions of adjudication upon any right, claim or defence set up in a civil Court when such adjudication, so far as regards the Court passing it, decided the suit or appeal so that many orders were appealable as being decrees. Other orders were made appealable by S. 588 and by

S. 591 it was provided as regards all orders that :

"if any decree be appealed against, any error, defect or irregularity in any such order affecting the decision of the case may be set forth as a ground of objection in the memorandum of appeal."

The Code of 1908, by providing for preliminary and final decrees introduced a uniform practice for many different classes of suits, and by S. 97 provided that :

"where any party aggrieved by a preliminary decree does not appeal from such decree, he shall be precluded from disputing its correctness in any appeal which may be preferred from the final decree."

This last provision is also applied, by S. 105, Cl. (2), to orders of remand from which an appeal lies. The difficulties which have been referred to us for solution arise from these provisions. A litigant, aggrieved by a preliminary decree, cannot seek remedy for his grievance in an appeal from the final decree; a litigant aggrieved by an order of remand from which an appeal lies, must appeal therefrom directly or be precluded from disputing its correctness.

The decisions from which the Division Bench has in this case dissented are decisions which purport, in the altered circumstances, to apply or adopt principles which the Court had applied under the Code of 1882. Under the old Code the first decision to be noticed is that of Jatinga Valley Tea Co. v. Chera Tea Co. (6). The suit was for possession of land. The first Court had given the plaintiff a decree and the lower appellate Court had remanded the case for a local investigation. Thereupon, it would seem that the plaintiff appealed to the High Court against the order of remand and that subsequent thereto, the trial Court had proceeded with the case and passed a decree dismissing the plaintiff's suit. Whether this decree was made before or after the presentation of the appeal to the High Court is not quite clear from the report and the original record of the appeal throws no light on the question. It may be taken, however, that the presentation of the appeal preceded the dismissal of the suit. In the High Court it was contended that the existence of the final decree was a bar to the hearing of the appeal. This contention was rejected on the ground that S. 588 of the Code gave an appeal in such a case. Field, J. said :

"that provision is not in any way qualified. The Code does not say that there shall be an appeal only if the case has not been finally decided in the Court of first instance before that appeal is preferred or comes on for hearing."

The Court not only set aside the order of remand but set aside the decree which had been made upon it and which was held to be based upon it.

Twenty years afterwards, in Madhusudan Sen v. Kamini Kanta Sen (7) the question again arose in a suit for ejectment. The Munsiff had dismissed the suit ; the Subordinate Judge had ordered a remand for the trial of certain issue : before the defendant appealed to the High Court from the order of remand, the Munsiff had tried the suit for the second time and had made a decree in favour of the plaintiff ex parte. Maclean, C. J. and Mitra, J., held the appeal to be incompetent and the decision in this case lies at the root of the present difficulty. The Court distinguished the Jatinga Valley case (6) on the ground that the appeal from the order of remand had been presented before the suit had been dismissed. Maclean, C. J., reasons that the orders specified in S. 588 comprise first of all some whose force lasts only as long as the suit is pending and that the right of appeal from such orders should cease with the disposal of the suit. He admits, however, that other orders do affect the decision on the merits and that an order of remand is of this nature. He observes that S. 588 makes no distinction between these two classes and that : "a party failing to appeal from an order of remand is not without a remedy. He may appeal from the final decision and on that appeal take exception to the validity of the order of remand."

He concludes therefore :

"If a party desired to avail himself of the privilege conferred by S. 588 in relation to an order of remand, he ought to do so before the final disposal of the suit. He cannot be permitted to wait until after the final disposal of the suit and then appeal from the interlocutory order without appealing from the decree in the suit."

Now the judgment of Field, J., in the Jatinga Valley case (6) had pointed out that S. 588 contains no such qualification of the right of appeal. In subsequent cases the reasoning of Sir Francis Maclean has on this ground been condemned as a matter of construction : see Laxmi v. Maru Debi (8), Kanahaya Lal v. Tirbeni Sahai (9) per Champier, J., at 537. Again, to say that S. 588 of the Code deals with two classes of orders: those which do not affect the decision of the case and those which do, is to give no very strong reason for laying down a rule for both which is appropriate to the former only. There is no doubt a distinct convenience to be gained by requiring a litigant when he brings his appeal, to attack the final decree if such a decree has been passed. This, however, depends entirely upon the right of the appellant to challenge the previous decree in his appeal from the later one, and it has to be remembered that in a case where the appeal has been brought before the final decree had been passed, the advantage aimed at by this decision is unattainable. It may here be observed that the language of Maclean, C. J. though clear enough with reference to the Code of 1832, has given rise to some confusion. When it was said that the appellant cannot be permitted to wait until after the final disposal of the suit and then to appeal against an interlocutory order without appealing from the decree in the suit, it was not meant that one appeal would be competent or incompetent according as another had been brought or not brought. What was meant was that after a final decree had been passed, an appeal from an interlocutory order was incompetent as such, but that in an appeal from the decree an interlocutory order could be reversed or varied if it affected the decision of the suit. Maclean, C. J., was not arguing for two appeals but for one appeal in which the whole case would be disposed of.

The next case was that of Mackenzie v. Narsingh Sahai (10). This was a partition suit and the appeal from the preliminary decree (so to call it though it was made in 1907), was not preferred until the final decree had been passed. A Division Bench held that a preliminary decree was subject to the rule laid down in Madhusudan's case (7) for interlocutory orders. This was said to be obvious and to follow from the application of a simple test. The test was as follows :

(8) [1914] 37 Mad. 29=12 I. C. 664=21 M. L. J. 1063.

"If the appeal is heard on the merits and the preliminary judgment of the Subordinate Judge set aside, what would be the position of the parties ? The final decree which up to present moment, has not been questioned by way of appeal, would still stand and that decree would entitle the plaintiff to eject the appellant. If the appeal is heard and decided in favour of the appellant, in order to give him any relief, the final decree, against which no appeal has been preferred, would have to be indirectly set aside. It is difficult to appreciate how such a state of things could possibly have been contemplated by the legislature."

This case, though decided in 1909 was decided under the Code of 1882 and it appears to be the first case to treat a preliminary decree as on the same footing as an interlocutory order made immediately appealable by S. 588 of the old Code. The basis of the reasoning is that the final decree, unless directly and formally attacked, will remain unaffected though the preliminary decree be set aside. The case does not explain the principles upon which the presentation of an appeal from the preliminary decree before the final decree is passed enables a final decree to be set aside indirectly without formal and direct attack.

Janki Nath v. Promotha Nath (11) was the first case under the new Code in which these doctrines were applied. They were applied to an appeal against an order of remand the appeal being filed after the disposal of the suit upon remand. They were applied notwithstanding the new provision in S. 105 (2) upon which the only observation made was that this clause:

"does not meet the present case but applies rather to the converse case."

The learned Judges failed to observe that this clause had made any difference at all to the reasoning of Maclean, C. J. in Madhusudan's case (7) or even that it had affected the doctrine as to "election of alternative remedies" laid down by Mookerjee, J. In the case of Baikantha v. Salimullah (1) under the Code of 1882 leaving aside cases in which the presentation of the appeal from the preliminary decree preceded the passing of the final decree. I come next to the case

Khirodamoyi Dasi v. Adhar Chandra (12). This case was governed entirely by the Code of 1908 but the principles of Mackenzie's case (10) were applied to it. It was laid down that whether or not an appeal has been preferred against the preliminary decree before the final decree has been passed, it is the duty of the party aggrieved by the final decree to prefer an appeal against the final decree if he desires a remedy, and it was further held that in either case an appeal against the preliminary decree alone would be useless. In this respect, it will be seen, this decision goes beyond Mackenzie's case (10) and beyond Madhusudan's case (7). Of S. 97 of the new Code it was observed:

"That section does not, however, relieve the person who appeals from the preliminary decree from the necessity of appealing against the final decree; nor does it provide how, if the preliminary decree is contrary to the terms of the final decree, the final decree is to be interfered with if it has been allowed to stand without any appeal being preferred against it."

In the end, however, and inconsistently with their reasoning, the learned Judges appear to fall back upon the consideration that the appeal was presented after the final decree has been pronounced. The logic of this case would appear to be that nothing which can happen upon an appeal against a preliminary decree can affect the final decree, and in keeping with this view no suggestion is offered as to any principle according to which the final decree can be held to stand or fall according as an appeal against the preliminary decree was preferred before or after the making of the final decree.

The next case is the Madras case already referred to, Laxmi v. Maru Debi (8). The appeal in this case was against a preliminary order in execution and it was not filed until after the date of the final order. The decision contains a criticism of the Calcutta cases to which I have referred. It lays down that the final order merely carries out the former order and does not supersede it; that the final order could not affect or take away the right of appeal against the preliminary order; that the final order depends for its authority upon the preliminary order and that upon the quashing of the latter it would cease to have any force; that under S. 97 a party whose grievance is against the preliminary order is bound to appeal against it and cannot dispute its correctness in any appeal from the final order; that in these circumstances he may have no grievance which he can raise against the final order and an appeal therefrom would be an empty formality. In Bagaband Chandra v. Ishan Chandra (13) the final decree was passed on 11th November though not drawn up or signed till 18th November. On 16th November an appeal was preferred against the preliminary decree. Fletcher, J., after pointing out that on 16th November the only decree against which the appellant could appeal was the preliminary decree, referred to a previous decision of his own in Atul Chandra v. Kunja Behari (14), saying:

(11) [1911] 15 C. W. N. 830=10 I. C. 514.

(12) [1912] 18 C. L. J. 321=21 I. C. 516.

"the right of appeal given by S. 97, Civil P. C., is one that is not taken away by the mere fact that the Judge has passed a final decree."

In Atul's case (14) the presentation of the appeal had preceded the passing of the final decree and the Court held that if the appeal succeeded, the final decree ought to be amended in accordance with the result of the appeal.

In Kulada Prasad v. Ramananda (15), the preliminary decree in a suit to enforce a mortgage had been followed by the final decree before the defendants filed an appeal against the preliminary decree. Mookerji, J. re-affirmed the principles upon which he had decided the case of Mackenzie v. Narsingh Sahay (10):

"If we were now to reverse the preliminary decree at the instance of the appellant, the final decree would still remain unaffected as no appeal has been made to challenge the propriety of that decree."

Referring to Khirodamoyi's case (12), he says, but not so far as I can see correctly, that it was ruled:

"that the final decree must be deemed to have been made on the assumption that if the preliminary decree should be modified or set aside in the appeal, the final decree also would be similarly modified or set aside."

In this case, however, the Court allowed the appellant to amend his memorandum of appeal so as to turn it into an appeal against both decrees. Again in Nanibala v. Ichhamoyee (16), the same learned Judge re-affirmed the principles that the right of appeal from interlocutory orders ceases after the disposal of the suit, and that this rule is applicable to cases in which there is a preliminary decree and a final decree distinguishing certain cases in which the appeal against the preliminary decree had been lodged before the final decree was made, he says:

"It was ruled that the final decree must be deemed a contingent decree or in the words of Turner, L. J. in Shama Purshad v. Hurro Purshad (17), a subordinate and dependent decree liable to be superseded by the modification or reversal of the preliminary decree which was the subject matter of appeal before a superior tribunal when the final decree was made on the basis thereof in the primary Court."

In this case also recourse was had to the device of amending the memorandum of appeal so as to enlarge its scope and convert it into a combined appeal against both the preliminary and the final decree.

Where an appeal has been brought from the preliminary decree before the final decree has been passed, this Court has consistently held that such appeal is competent and that if the preliminary decree be set aside the final decree falls to the ground along with it. In these cases attempt has been made to induce the Court to affirm that the passing of a final decree takes away from the appellate Court its jurisdiction over the appeal already lodged against the preliminary decree; or else to hold that the final decree is valid and subsisting until set aside formally and directly by an appeal therefrom.

Ugra Narain Singh v. Basanta (18) like the case now before this Court, arose out of an application to enforce a final decree in execution. The suit was for an account.

"At the time when he preferred the appeal no final decree had been passed. The appellate Court therefore certainly had jurisdiction to hear the appeal and that power was not taken away by the final decree . . . . The final decree in the case which merely determined the amount for which the defendant was liable to the plaintiff was dependent upon the preliminary decree which held that the defendant was liable to render accounts and the validity of the proceedings which resulted in the final decree depended upon the preliminary decree itself: and that decree having been set aside on appeal, the final decree necessarily fell through. It has been contended that it was at any rate necessary to have the final decree formally set aside and that at all events the question could not be gone into in execution proceedings and that the executing Court has no power to deal with it. We think, however, that the final decree was superseded by the order of the appellate Court setting aside the preliminary decree upon which it depended. We are therefore of opinion that it is perfectly open to the executing Court to determine whether the decree which it is asked to execute is a subsisting and operative decree or not and if such decree has been superseded and is no longer operative, the executing Court is entitled to refuse execution on that ground."

It will be noticed that in this reasoning the subordinate and dependent character of the final decree is rested not upon the fact of an appeal having been presented in the interim but upon the essential character of that decree and the nature of its relation to the preliminary decree. In Nistarini v. Raimohun (19) Mookerjee, J. rested it upon this:

"The party who obtained the final decree in his favour took it while the preliminary decree was under appeal. The final decree therefore must be deemed subject to the result of that appeal."

In Kanhaya Lal v. Tribeni (9) a decision of a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, the fact that the appeal against the preliminary decree had been filed before the passing of the final decree was not made the basis of the decision. The basis of the decision was the necessary dependence of the final decree upon the preliminary decree on which it was based. The Calcutta decisions were said to proceed on the basis that the final decree continued after the preliminary decree had been set aside, a view which was held to be erroneous.

In Wahidunnessa v. Dip Narain (20), Chamier, C. J. adhered to the Allahabad decision and Sharfuddin, J. affirmed that: "a preliminary decree has existence independent of the final decree and the final decree instead of extinguishing the preliminary decree gives effect to it."

It will be seen, therefore, that in this Court the decisions have followed two distinct lines according as the appeal from the preliminary decree was lodged before or after the final decree was passed. No difficulty has been felt in the former case. In the latter case it was not possible to say under the Code of 1908 that the appeal from the preliminary decree was incompetent, but it was said that its competence depended upon the bringing of another appeal from the final decree itself. The first effective challenge to this doctrine was made in Kasinath v. Himmat Ali (21), B. B. Ghose, J. said:

"In my opinion, therefore, where a preliminary decree has an independent existence and a person aggrieved by it is bound to appeal from it, that right cannot be taken away by a final decree being passed either before or after the person appeals from the preliminary decree."

The order of reference in the present case repeats and amplifies this reasoning.

In my judgment it is altogether unreasonable to treat a preliminary decree under the Code of 1908 as a mere interlocutory order whose force is spent when the suit is disposed of. The definition given by S. 2 of the Code makes any decree preliminary:

"when further proceedings have to be taken before the suit can be completely disposed of."

This certainly is a lame definition and if it were taken strictly one might well ask how any decree could be partly preliminary and partly final. In mortgage or partition suits, in suits for partnership or other accounts, the preliminary decree is what in the Court of Chancery would have been described simply as "the decree;" the final decree corresponds to the "order on further consideration." The "further proceedings" are proceedings under preliminary decree and consist mainly of what Lord Hobhouse in Syed Muzhar Hussain v. Bodha Bibi (22) described as 'subordinate enquiries.' S. 97 has expressly excepted preliminary decree from the position assigned to interlocutory orders, precluding an appellant from impeaching them in the course of an attack upon the final decree. If there be any general doctrine of law to the effect that interlocutory orders cease to have any effect after the final disposal of the suit and that therefore they lose their appealable character upon the passing of the final decree, and I do not here affirm such doctrine, it is in my judgment reasonably clear that preliminary decrees, under the Code of 1908, which determine such questions as liability to account, existence of a mortgage, share in joint property, are altogether outside its scope.

(19) [1913] 18 C. L. J. 214=20 I. C. 576.

(22) [1894] 17 All. 112=22 I. A. 1 (4) (P. C.).

In the second place I think it wrong to hold that the presentation of an appeal from the final decree is a circumstance which renders the final decree contingent upon the result of the appeal or creates in the final decree a character of dependence or subordination. In my judgment the final decree is, in its nature, dependent and subordinate because it is a decree which has been passed as a result of proceedings directed and controlled by the preliminary decree and based thereon. A final decree when passed is capable of immediate execution and the presentation of an appeal from the preliminary decree does not operate as a stay of execution. The Court which passes a final decree need not necessarily have before it the circumstance that an appeal from the preliminary decree has been presented. Whether such an appeal has been presented and whether or not the attention of the Court has been brought to the fact these matters in no way qualify the final decree when made.

Again, the doctrine that subordinate and dependent decrees come to nothing when the decree on which they are dependent is set aside must now be viewed in the light of the decision of the Judicial Committee in Naganna Naidu v. Venkatappayya (23). Shama Prasad's case (17), has for years been taken as extending this doctrine very widely but the decision of the majority of the Full Bench in Jogesh Chandra Dutt v. Kali Churn Dutt (24), has now been overruled. In a case such as the present, however, I see no reason for holding that the final decree is not a subordinate and dependent decree. It is as much subordinate and as much dependent as an order for the execution of a decree is subordinate and dependent on the decree which is being executed. The function of the final decree is merely to re-state and apply with precision what the preliminary decree has ordained. The decrees are in the same suit. The appellate Court, if it has power over the preliminary decree at all, power to reverse it or vary it, has power to affect the final decree. In a redemption suit, such as we are now concerned with, it has power to see whether there has been any mortgage and, if so, upon what basis the plaintiff should be permitted to redeem. There is no intermediate position between the view that the mere existence of a final decree takes away all power from the appellate Court over the preliminary decree and the view that the appellate Court being competent to hear the appeal from the preliminary decree has necessarily the right to set aside the final decree and any other proceedings based upon the decree under appeal. With the solitary exception of Khirodamoyi's case (12), opinion in this Court has been unanimous to the effect that the existence of a final decree does not deprive the appellate Court of its power to hear an appeal previously presented against the preliminary decree.

It appears to me that in this matter we should take our stand upon the express provisions of the Code and refuse to read into the Code qualifications and conditions of which it contains no sign. I respectfully adopt the language of Chamier, J., in Kanhaiya Lal's case (9) at p. 536:

"The Code gives a right of appeal against a preliminary decree and further provides that where any party aggrieved by a preliminary decree passed after the commencement of this Code does not appeal from such decree, he shall be precluded from disputing its correctness in any appeal which may be preferred from the final decree. It seems to me that we are not at liberty to read into the Code any provision to the effect that the passing of the final decree shall be a bar either to the institution or the hearing of any appeal against the preliminary decree."

I would add that when a preliminary decree is set aside the final decree is superseded whether the appeal was brought before or after the passing of the final decree and that in my judgment an appellate Court when setting aside or varying a preliminary decree can, and indeed should, give direction for the setting aside or varying of the final decree if the existence of the final decree is brought to its notice as in all cases it ought to be. In the present case the preliminary decree affirming the existence of a mortgage has been set aside and the plaintiff's suit has been dismissed. But, be the question clear or difficult, I am of opinion that a Court of execution is entitled to enquire whether the final decree originally passed is still subsisting or has ceased to have effect. It does so when a decree has been reversed. It must do so when a decree has been superseded. No doubt had Shama

Prasad's case (17) stood unexplained there would have been some difficulty here and it is true that the present class of case was not considered by the Full Bench in *Gorachand Haldar v. * (a) Hindu Law — Partition — Mother's right to share arises only on partition being actually effected by sons and then with regard to property available to sons for partition—She is not even a necessary party to partition suit—She can only watch proceedings to guard her interest.

Mother's right to claim share arises only on partition, no matter whether the partition is made amicably or as result of a decree by a suit. The bringing of a suit for partition by one of the sons does not confer any right on the mother to have a share. If the suit for partition is withdrawn, the mother cannot claim any share, nor can she insist that the suit must be carried on to a decree. If the partition suit is dismissed by the Court for some reason or other, then the mother could not get any share in the property. It is only when the property is actually partitioned that the mother would get a share equal to that of the sons. She is not even a necessary party to suit having no interest in the property when the suit is brought. She can only come in to watch the proceedings and guard her interest when the partition is effected. Then too she will not be entitled to any share in property in which the sons had no interest and which could not be the subject of partition : 27 Cal. 77, Foll. [P 699 C 2]

* (b) Transfer of Property Act, S. 62—Joint family property mortgaged — Purchase of property by mortgagee under final decree—Partition suit pending to which mortgagee is party—Purchase is not affected by lis pendens.

Where a joint family property is mortgaged and the mortgaged property is purchased by the mortgagor under a final decree on the mortgage, while the suit for partition in which that property is included is pending and the mortgagee is impleaded as a party to partition suit by reason of the mortgage, the purchase of that property cannot be annulled by invoking the principle of lis pendens : 27 Cal. 77, Dist. [P 699 C 2]

(c) Hindu Law — Partition — Mortgaged property is partible till final decree for sale.

Where joint family property is mortgaged even though a preliminary decree may have been obtained by the mortgagee with regard to the mortgaged property, interest of the mortgagors is not extinguished and the property can be made available for partition and included in the partition suit. For the interest is subsisting till final decree is made. [P 699 C 1]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by defendants 4 and 5 which arises out of a suit for partition. A preliminary decree has been made by the learned Subordinate Judge and the appeal is directed against that preliminary decree. The property which is the subject-matter of this appeal originally belonged to two brothers, Hari Narain and Hari Bansha. Hari Bansha died in the year 1900 leaving him surviving his widow and three sons. Hari Narain got his share partitioned in the year 1905. The three sons of Hari Bansha purchased the share of Hari Narain, which had been partitioned previously by a conveyance dated 31st May 1922. On that very day the three brothers mortgaged the entire interest in the house to a third person, with which we are not concerned in this litigation. On 12th October 1923 these three brothers again mortgaged the property to defendant 5. On 1st September 1924 these three brothers again executed a second mortgage of this very property in favour of their mother. Defendant 5 brought a suit on his mortgage on 10th November 1924 and a preliminary decree was made on 22nd January 1925. In the meantime defendant 4 was appointed as Receiver by an order of the Court in accordance with the terms contained in the indenture of mortgage dated 12th October 1923. The Receiver remained in possession of the property on behalf of the mortgagors and the mortgagee. The present suit for partition was brought by one of the sons of Hari Bansha on 17th April 1925 and two items of properties were included in his suit. There is no dispute with regard to item 1 with which the present appellants have no concern and the whole dispute centres round item 2 which had been mortgaged to defendant 5. During the pendency of this suit for partition a final decree in the mortgage suit of defendant 5 was made on 19th March 1926 and the property was sold on 7th August 1926 and purchased by defendant 5, as the lower Court finds and as is contended for on behalf of the respondent. But it is stated that there were other purchasers who were trustees with regard to some charitable trust : but that is a matter with which we are not concerned and this was not discussed in the Court below. The Receiver was discharged by order of the Court and defendant 5 took possession of the disputed property as purchaser. In the partition suit the two brothers of the plaintiff were defendants 1 and 2 and his mother was defendant 3; defendant 4 was Receiver and defendant 5 was the mortgagee and subsequently became the purchaser.

The question which is in debate in this Court and which was the subject-matter of dispute in the Court below is whether the mother is entitled to a fourth share of the property including property No. 2, according to the provisions of the Hindu Law, on a partition being made among the sons. There is one small matter which has not been much debated that a half share of the property is not the ancestral property of the brothers and therefore if the widow of Hari Bansha is entitled to a share on a partition between her sons she would get a fourth share of item 2. But the real controversy is whether she would get any share under the circumstances of this case. The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the plaintiff and defendants 1 and 2 have got no subsisting right to property No. 2, which has been described as the Strand Road premises, and their suit for partition with regard to that plot must fail. He has, however, made a decree to this effect that defendant 3, the mother, would get a fourth share of both the properties Nos. 1 and 2 and the plaintiff and defendants 1 to 3 would each get a fourth share of the property No. 1. As I have already stated that assuming that the learned Judge is right, the lady would be entitled to get an eighth share of the property No. 2. But it is contended on behalf of the appellants that under the circumstances of this case the lady would be entitled to get no share in property No. 2. Their case is that the principle of Hindu Law upon which the learned Subordinate Judge has relied is not applicable in this case and that his decision is, therefore, liable to be reversed. On behalf of the respondents reliance is placed upon the well known case of Jogendra Chunder Ghose v. Fulkumari Dassi (1). In that case Banerji, J., laid down the principle on which according to the Hindu Law the mother is entitled to get a share on a partition made among the sons born of her womb of the property inherited from the father. The learned Judge after quoting the text from Dayabhaga observes :

"With reference to the above passage from the Dayabhaga, it has been held, and it must now be taken as settled law, that the mother's right to claim a share arises only when her sons come to a partition, in other words that she cannot enforce her claim to a share so long her sons remain joint and do not ask for partition. But there is nothing said in this passage or in any other authoritative text of Hindu Law as to a mother's right to a share on partition being so absolutely non-existent before partition, that it may be defeated by any of her sons alienating his share before coming to a partition.

He then proceeds in this way :

"In my opinion the correct view to take of this right would be to hold that it is an inchoate right as long as no partition is come to amongst the sons and it becomes actually enforceable only when the sons come to a partition ; or in other words that the right, when it becomes enforceable by reason of a partition being come to among the sons, is enforceable not only as against the sons, and as regards so much only of the joint property as at the date of partition is in the hands of the sons, but also as against any person deriving title from any of the sons and as regards the property to which they may have so derived title, subject to certain qualifications and limitations."

In that case during the pendency of the suit for partition by one of the sons another son sold his share in the joint property. It was held by the Court that by reason of the sale the interest obtained by the purchaser is subject to the rule of lis pendens and that he cannot stand on a higher footing than that of his vendor and when the partition is made, if his vendor was a party to the suit, the mother would get a share: that right cannot be defeated during the pendency of the suit by one of the sons transferring his interest in favour of a third party. This principle has been elaborated in a subsequent case Amrita Lal Mitter v. Manicklal Mullick (2) where Ameer Ali, J., sitting alone held that this principle is applicable where a stranger to the family purchases the interest of one of the sons and then seeks for partition of the joint family property. The question has again been discussed in the case of Jogobondhu Pal v. Rajendra Nath Chatterjee (3), by Mukerjee, J. But the principle has not been carried further than what was laid down by Banerji, J. In this case the appellants contend that he is entitled to the property by virtue of his purchase in the same state in which it was at the time of the mortgage or, in other words, that any subsequent alienation made by the mortgagor would not affect his interest. That proposition is uncontroverted. But if the mother could get any right in the present suit by reason of the partition, that would not be by the right created by the mortgagor but it would arise under the Hindu Law and I doubt whether the principle enunciated by the appellant would apply to such a case. In this case, in my opinion, the plaintiff had a right to bring the suit for partition at the time when he brought the suit. Although there had been a preliminary decree for partition the title of the plaintiff to his share of the property was not extinguished by that preliminary decree on mortgage but he had still a subsisting interest in the share of the property by reason of succession to his father. The plaintiff's right to bring the suit was not affected. The mother's right to claim a share, however, arises, as Banerji, J. laid down, only on a partition no matter whether the partition is made amicably or as the result of a decree by a suit. The mere bringing of a suit for partition by one of the sons does not confer any right on the mother to have a share, according to the view expressed by Banerji, J. If the suit for partition is withdrawn the mother cannot claim any share, nor can she insist that the suit must be carried on to a decree. If the partition suit is dismissed by the Court for some reason or other, then the mother would not get any share in the property. It is only when the property is actually partitioned, the mother would get a share equal to that of her sons. She is not even a necessary party to the suit having no interest in the property when the suit is brought. She can only come in to watch the proceedings to safeguard her interest when the partition is effected.

Now, it is contended on behalf of the respondent that defendant 5 is bound by the rule of lis pendens as was applied in the case of Jogendra Chunder Ghose v. Fulkumari Dassi (1) cited above. The difficulty in this case is that that principle cannot be applied to this case. Here defendant 5 has acquired the interest of the plaintiff as well as the defendants who had interest in the property. It is a fundamental principle that a man cannot sue himself and the defendant standing in the shoes of the plaintiff with regard to this property cannot continue the suit for partition with regard to this very property. The plea therefore, must fall to the ground by reason of the purchase of defendant 5 and, as the learned Subordinate Judge says, the plaintiff and defendants 1 and 2 cannot ask for partition of property 2. That being so, the mother would not be entitled to any share of property No. 2 by reason of the fact that her sons had no interest in the property and this property could not be the subject of partition. Whether she would have a charge for her maintenance against the property in the hands of the purchaser is another matter. That question cannot arise in a suit for partition and if she has any

The result, therefore, is that the judgment and preliminary decree of the Subordinate Judge should be modified to this extent that the suit for partition with regard to property No. 2, i.e., the Strand Road premises, should stand dismissed and, therefore, any claim of defendant 3 will also stand dismissed, and the appeal is allowed to this extent. The appellant is entitled to his costs from the respondent who has appeared, hearing fee being assessed at three gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 641 of 1927, Decided on 26th February 1929, from appellate decree of 1st Addl. Dist. Judge, 24 Parganas, D/- 28th September 1926.

Railways Act (9 of 1890), S. 72—Risk-Note form H—Company is liable for "loss" of complete consignment or one or more complete packages and not for destruction or deterioration.

The words "except for the loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages forming part of consignment" point to this that destruction or deterioration of or damage to goods is a thing which a Railway Company are not to be responsible even in case of wilful neglect. Only thing for which in certain events they are to be responsible is loss, that is to say, loss of all or any of consignments, and they are to be responsible for that only when there is a loss of complete consignment or one or more of complete packages. All arguments based upon the notion of loss as meaning monetary or pecuniary loss to the consignor have nothing to do with this word as used in the Risk-Note Form H: A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 725, Foll: 43 Mad. 617, Dist. [P 701 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of the learned First Additional District Judge of the 24 Parganas and the case has reference to a consignment of oranges in a wagon from Nagpur to Howrah upon the terms of a certain Risk-Note in Form H. The goods were consigned on 4th April 1923 and they were to go by passenger train and the wagon commenced its journey on 5th April. Apparently the wagon was not in a fit condition for travel because after some forty miles it was found that its axle was too hot. Thereupon it became necessary to transfer the goods to another wagon and much complaint is made that this was not done with sufficient celerity. It is said that this operation was not completed until the 8th. The wagon into which the goods were put again became unfit for travel and at Bilaspur the goods had to be once more transhipped. These goods which had been put on rail on 4th April did not arrive at Howrah until 12th April. It would appear that they were fresh oranges but that upon their arrival at Howrah they were so decomposed or deteriorated that they were unfit for any purpose. They were in a rotten condition and when the plaintiff came to take delivery it was found that the goods were not worth taking delivery of. A certificate from the Sanitary Inspector was obtained and the best course was adopted in the interest of all the parties, namely, that the wagon load of rotten oranges was taken to a proper place and the oranges were destroyed. In these circumstances the plaintiff claimed damages and the learned Judge has found in favour of the plaintiff that the failure to tranship these oranges at Bhandara with reasonable quickness was not only negligence on the part of the Railway Company's servants but was wilful negligence. The language of the learned Judge is not too accurate but he says that:

"the conduct of the station staff at Bhandara appears to me to have been not only negligent but also reckless and careless."

However the learned Judge does mean to find that there was a case made out within the meaning of the Risk-Note and that the case made out was one of wilful neglect of the Railway Company's servants.

We have not heard the respondent in this appeal and I say nothing about the question whether this neglect is really wilful neglect or not. It appears to me that something might be said on either side. Assuming, however, that it is wilful neglect, the question arises whether the neglect, such as it may be, of the Railway Company's servants, is a neglect for which the Railway Company is responsible. By this Risk-Note the consignor undertakes to hold the Railway Company:

"harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss, destruction or deterioration of or damages to all or any of such consignments from any cause whatever except for the loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages forming part of a consignment due either to the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants, transport agents or carriers employed by them before, during and after transit over the said Railway."

The first question which arises is what is the plaintiff's cause of action? He says that these oranges arrived at Howrah in a rotten condition and prima facie it seems to me that it is quite clear that he has the general terms of this clause against him. His claim is a claim which involves making the Railway Company responsible either for loss, destruction or deterioration of or damage to these oranges, and there is no way of putting the plaintiff's claim that does not bring it within the ambit of the general words of the clause. In these circumstances quite logically and reasonably the debate in this case has proceeded upon the question whether the plaintiff can say that his case comes within the exception which is in the following words:

That is the question to which the learned Judge has addressed himself and he has held that there has been no "loss" in the sense in which that word is used in this Risk-Note. I agree with the learned Judge on that point. It seems to me that the language of this particular clause points plainly to this that destruction or deterioration of or damage to the goods is a thing which the Railway Company are not to be responsible for at all. The only thing for which in certain events they are to be responsible is "loss" that is to say, loss of all or any of such consignments and they are to be responsible for that only when there is a loss of a complete consignment or one or more complete packages. All arguments based upon the notion of loss as meaning monetary to pecuniary loss to the consignee have to be put on one side, and I agree with Page, J. in his view of the meaning of this word as stated in his judgment in E. I. Ry. Co. v. Jogpat Singh (1). I disagree with the view taken by the Madras High Court in the case M. & S. M. Ry. Co. Ltd. v. Subba Rao (2). Marine Insurance notions about what is total loss either actual total loss or constructive total loss have nothing to do with this word as used in this Risk-Note and we are not concerned with the many wide meanings that such a word is capable of having in common parlance. We are concerned with the definite meaning which appears upon this particular exception. We have to say whether this particular consignment has been lost within the sense of this Risk-Note remembering that it is perfectly clear that destruction or deterioration of or damage to these goods is a risk which the Railway Company does not take even in a case of wilful neglect.

In my judgment, the position here is that these goods deteriorated. They deteriorated because they were in transit for a longer time than they ought to have been required. They took a longer time than should have been required owing to the negligence of the Railway Company. Of that I have no doubt. For the moment I will assume that the length of time taken in the transfer, as the learned Judge notes, was owing to the wilful neglect of the Railway Company's servants. In these circumstances it seems to me that this is not a case of loss at all. These goods were never lost. What happened was that they deteriorated and became worth nothing. There was a pecuniary loss no doubt but the goods themselves were not lost. In that view it appears to me that it is necessary to consider carefully the evidence as to what happened at Howrah. I am not saying that if the goods were detained so long in the transit that they became rotten and could not be delivered if, for example, at some intermediate station they had to be taken out and thrown away, or even if they had to be thrown away after they arrived at Howrah and so could never have been delivered I am not saying whether in either or both of these cases the plaintiff might not have said that there had been a loss of the goods. It is not necessary to pronounce upon that, because I am satisfied that in this case that is not what happened. In this case what happened was that the goods being useless and being of of such a character that the sensible thing to do was to destroy them, they were destroyed. I am not satisfied that it was impossible for the Railway Company to give delivery of the goods to the plaintiff. I am not satisfied that the plaintiff had no option, or that it was illegal for him to take delivery of these goods. What happened merely was that the goods being rotten they were in fact by consent destroyed which was the sensible thing to do. The Railway Sanitary Inspector gave a certificate first to afford the plaintiff proof of the condition of the goods and secondly because the railway staff would want some authority to destroy the goods.

When one looks at this Risk-Note one finds that it is a Risk-Note in a form that is applicable to the carriage of goods and animals. It is not a Risk-Note which has any special reference to perishable goods such as oranges, and the contention that is really raised upon this Risk-Note is this that if perishable goods are sent under Risk-Note H so that in consequence of delay in transit they become useless, then the protection which the railway company have stipulated for entirely vanishes. It is said that because they become entirely useless, it is no longer a question of deterioration or destruction, but a question of loss. In my judgment, so to construe this Risk-Note would be to give it a meaning which it was never intended to bear. It would give it a meaning with reference to perishable goods which would defeat the plain intention of the contract. "Loss" in this case is not used with reference to perishable goods in particular. The contract is dealing with ordinary goods and when it says "the loss of a complete consignment," it is not to be construed as though it were a part of the special intention of that phrase that it is to be applied to highly perishable goods.

Learned counsel Sir Benode Mitter has put before this Court various arguments and contentions and has cited opinions from certain other Courts to the effect that the Calcutta decisions as to the meaning of this word "loss" place too narrow a construction on this Risk-Note. I can only say for myself that I am entirely of the opposite opinion: I think the Calcutta decisions place a meaning upon the words in this Risk-Note which it can be seen to bear by a careful study of the Risk-Note itself.

If a person entrusts goods to a railway for carriage to X and for delivery to himself or to his consignee and if the railway fails to give delivery his prima facie right is to sue the railway for his goods and for damages for their detention. Nothing in these Risk-Notes is intended to enable the railway to keep other peoples' goods nor are Railway Companies as a rule so unreasonable as to seek so to do. These Risk-Notes come into operation in the much more common case where the railway company cannot deliver the goods because it has not got them. Then a question arises of its "responsibility for any loss of all or any of such consignments," to use the words of the risk-note before us. The words "loss, destruction or deterioration" are followed by the words "loss of a complete consignment" and the word "loss" means the same thing in both cases. The word "destruction" is not repeated and this of itself points firmly against any extension of the meaning to be given to the word "loss." The loss of goods, in the sense in which this Risk-Note is concerned with it, is a question of presence or absence and not of condition. However little it may matter to a trader whether his goods are destroyed, whether they are delivered to him in a useless condition, or whether he never gets delivery at all to a railway company carrying all sorts of goods and animals these eventualities represent very different risks. Moreover from this point of view "the loss of a complete package" is a different thing from the loss of some of the contents of a package. A consignee who proposed to insure his goods for the transit would soon find out these differences and a consignee who proposes to be his own insurer would be well advised to learn them.

The next point which arises has been dealt with by the learned Judge in a manner which is I think correct in its result. It was argued before the learned Judge that there was no alternative for the despatch of fresh oranges from Nagpur to Howrah and that the plaintiff could only despatch them on owner's risk terms. When we come to consider the logic of that argument and what it has to do with the question of this contract I can only say that while I paid attention to the argument of Sir Benode Mitter, I have failed to find that there is any ground for supposing that the existence of another method of consignment or of the non-existence of another method of consignment has any effect upon the validity of the particular contract before us. I do not understand why in the absence of proof that fresh fruits would have been accepted at railway risk, this consignment note is supposed to be without consideration, nor do I follow the argument which apparently impressed the learned Judge that the existence of an alternative rate was a condition precedent to the operation of that portion of the risk-note by which the company contracted themselves out of their general responsibility.

However, the learned Judge has found upon a construction of the documents laid before him that it is not shown that there was no alternative rate, and he has held that there was an alternative rate. The documents have been put before us. There is a document, first of all, of 1919 which purports to say that perishable articles are to be carried at the owner's risk. Then in 1920 came a series of arrangements, and I am satisfied, as the learned Judge was satisfied, that the notice of 1919 came to an end as regards the consignment of oranges from Nagpur to Howrah. There was a further document of 1921 and yet a further document of 1922 which have been laid before us. The 1921 document continued the 1919 arrangement only as regards certain named articles, sections or stations and as regards rates and fares "which are in force at present." For the present purpose, as we know, the arrangement of 1919 came to an end in 1920. Again in 1922 it appears that if a man must consign oranges from Nagpur to Howrah both in wagon-loads and by passenger train then the rate charged was a certain fixed rate. There is nothing whatever to show that there was no alternative course open. In my opinion, the learned Judge is right in his finding as to that and no cause of action arises to the plaintiff in this respect.

In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Rankin, C. J.—This case arises out of an order made by my learned brother Pearson, J., refusing to interfere with an order made by the Registrar in Insolvency refusing to review an order made by him for the attendance of certain persons to be examined under S. 36, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, 3 of 1909. The merits of the case and the necessity for holding the enquiry proposed seem plain enough; but the point which is relied upon on behalf of the appellant is a technical point. S. 36 begins in this way:

"The Court may, on the application of the Official Assignee or of any creditor who has proved his debt, at any time after an order of adjudication has been made, summon before it in such manner as may be prescribed the insolvent or any person known or suspected to have in his possession any property belonging to the insolvent, or supposed to be indebted to the insolvent or any person whom the Court may deem capable of giving information respecting the insolvent, his dealings or property; and the Court may require any such person to produce any documents in his custody or power relating to the insolvent, his dealings or property."

On that it appears that this insolvency is a very old one the order of adjudication having been made on 9th August 1921. The creditor on whose application the order was made, in the form prescribed for affidavit and proof of debt had proved his debt about seven years ago. Various things happened. He was treated as a creditor while certain negotiations for composition were going on, he was a member of the committee of inspection and so on. It does not appear that R. 25, Sch. 2, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, has been complied with by the Official Assignee and it further appears that so far as the insolvency rules of the Court go no time is limited within which the Official Assignee is obliged to comply with the provisions of that rule. The Official Assignee does not question the proof of debt, but the proof of debt itself is not formally and in writing admitted. In these circumstances it is said that the phrase "creditor who has proved his debt" in S. 36 does not include this creditor because it is said that until the claim is formally admitted the creditor is not a creditor who has proved his debt. That proposition is laid down in the decision of Greaves, J., reported in Abdul Samad, In re (1) and the learned Judge definitely holds that the phrase that :

"a creditor who has proved his debt means not merely a creditor who has lodged proof of his debt but a creditor whose proof has been admitted by the Official Assignee under the provisions contained in S. 25, Sch. 2, Insolvency Act."

I am of opinion that the decision of Greaves, J., is erroneous and ought not to be adhered to. The ordinary meaning in bankruptcy of "a creditor who has proved his debt" is a creditor who has done all that the Act requires the creditor to do and in Sch. 2, English Act, this is made perfectly clear because the R. 2, Sch. 2 says that :

"a debt may be proved by delivering or sending through the post in a prepaid letter to the Official Receiver or if a trustee has been appointed, to the trustee, on affidavit verifying the debt."

When the creditor has done that, he is said to be a creditor who has proved his debt. Whether the proof is admitted or not is a question entirely different from the question whether the creditor who has done his part can be said to have proved. It is true that the language in the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act has been altered and apparently it is a possible view that the draftsman was not content to copy the language which is found in the English Statute from which the Indian Statute is an abridged transcript, because it says that :

"a proof may be lodged by delivering an affidavit verifying the debt."

At the same time it has to be remembered that the phrase "creditor who has proved his debt" is to be regarded in the light of the context. We find for example S. 48 of the Act, says :

"with respect to the admission and rejection of proofs and other matters referred to in Sch. 2, the rules in that schedule shall be observed."

It is clear that proof is one thing and admission or rejection is another and I am not prepared to hold that it is a reasonable construction of the language to deny to the phrase "a creditor who has proved his debt" its ordinary English meaning. If the debt has been proved then in that case the question may arise at a meeting of creditors whether, by reason of the provisions of Sch. 1, the creditors' proof has been admitted or has not been admitted for the purpose of voting. But here we are asked to hold that a creditor has not proved his debt at all unless and until the Official Assignee under the rules has admitted the proof for the purpose of dividend. There is no question about this creditor's right. The creditor has complied with the formalities set forth and has given the required proof of debt. The point taken is not made out and in my opinion this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

A contract of sale provided that any dispute dispute and it was referred to a person daily engaged in buying and selling the commodi-

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff firm brought a suit on 5th April 1921 to have it declared that seven different awards were not binding upon the plaintiff firm. It appears that by seven contracts all dated 10th November 1920 the defendant firm sold to the plaintiff firm a quantity of 187½ tons of white Java sugar at Rs. 26 per maund to be shipped by S. S. “Rajput” on certain terms particularized in the contracts.
The contracts contain an arbitration clause being Cl. 15 upon the terms of which, if any difference should arise regarding the contract or any matter connected therewith, it was to be optional to the sellers to require buyers to submit the matter in difference to arbitration in one or other of the two ways.

The way which matters for the purposes of the present case is:

“the arbitration of two European merchants in Calcutta (one to be appointed by the sellers and one by the buyers).”

There is a provision that if the buyers should fail to appoint an arbitrator to join in such arbitration within three days after notice in writing by sellers so requiring them the arbitration shall at the option of the sellers proceed ex parte and the award by the arbitrator shall be binding upon the buyers.

Now the S. S. Rajput arrived with 1,000 tons of this Java sugar consigned to the sellers. The arrival notice was given on 16th December 1920. At that time the market had gone against the buyers and the price had fallen. From 16th December onwards the price continued to sag. The buyers did not take delivery. Accordingly the arrival notice of 16th December 1920 was followed by a letter of 28th December requiring the plaintiffs to arrange at once to pay for and to take delivery of the goods. Again on 3rd January a similar demand was made. On 5th January there was a solicitor’s letter which informed the plaintiffs that unless they paid the defendants’ bills for the price of the goods including interest in exchange for the delivery order, the defendants would re-sell the goods on the following day namely on 6th. On the following day the goods were sold by the defendants against the plaintiffs and as the plaintiffs professed by their letter of 7th January that they had been ready and willing to pay for and to take delivery of goods and disputed their liability to pay damages on the basis of resale as claimed by the defendants, Messrs. Pugh and Co.
acting on behalf of the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs a letter on 10th January 1921 which is as follows:

“Our clients wrote to you together with their bill for the above sum and demanded payment but you have so far failed and neglected to do so. Our clients now want to refer the matter to arbitration in terms of the contract. Our clients appoint Mr. A. Duggan of Messrs. Shaw Wallace and Co., to be their arbitrator. We have to call upon you to appoint your arbitrator within three days failing which our client will appoint the said Mr. Duggan as the sole arbitrator in terms of
of the contract.”

To that letter a reply was sent by the plaintiffs' solicitors on 12th. It restated the plaintiffs' refusal to pay the sum claimed as damages and went on to say:

"As regards your client's proposal for arbitration our clients contend that there is no valid agreement for submission to arbitration and your clients cannot submit their alleged claim to arbitration. However, without prejudice to our clients' contention they will nominate an arbitrator in the course of this week."

On 13th January Messrs. Pugh and Co. continued the controversy and claimed that "under Cl. 15 of the contract a valid and proper agreement between the parties has been made for reference of any dispute under the contract to arbitration. Should your clients fail to nominate their arbitrator duly our clients shall appoint their arbitrator as the sole arbitrator."

On 14th January Mr. Duggan who had been appointed by the defendants wrote to inform the plaintiffs' solicitors that he had been appointed arbitrator on behalf of the defendants and asked for the name of the plaintiff's arbitrator by Wednesday morning the 16th, failing which he intimated that he would proceed with the arbitration ex parte. On 17th January Mr. Duggan was written to by the plaintiffs' solicitors in the following terms:

"We have to point out to you that you are not eligible to become an arbitrator inasmuch as you are not a merchant. It is not therefore necessary on our clients' part to nominate an arbitrator at this stage. If in spite of this you proceed with the arbitration ex parte you will do so at your risk and our clients will not be bound by your acts. This letter is written of course without prejudice to our clients' contention that there has been no valid agreement for arbitration."

A similar contention was addressed on the same day to the defendants' solicitors. On 18th the defendants' solicitors intimated that the defendants had appointed Mr. Duggan as the sole arbitrator and requested him to proceed with the arbitration.

The question which I propose to deal with first is whether or not the plaintiffs' contention is correct that Mr. Duggan was not eligible under Cl. 15 of the contract to act as an arbitrator. The phrase to be construed is an extremely short one, namely, "the arbitration of two European merchants of Calcutta." It is clear to me that if Mr. Duggan is not in the ordinary meaning of the term, a European merchant of Calcutta, the awards must be set aside. The objection was taken at the earliest moment and the plaintiffs took no part in the arbitration proceedings. They brought first of all an application under the Arbitration Act to set those proceedings aside, and on it being ruled that it was necessary to proceed by a suit, they brought this present suit taking their stand on this ground amongst certain others which I shall mention hereafter. There can be no doubt that Mr. Duggan is a European and there is no doubt that he is living in Calcutta and is in business in Calcutta. The question is whether he is a merchant within the meaning of that expression in these contracts. As regards that question we have the evidence of Mr. Duggan himself. He was called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiffs and the answers upon this point commenced with the question No. 20. These answers are given in examination-in-chief. I do not find that in cross-examination the witness is asked any question upon this particular matter or that in re-examination any addition is made to the evidence which he had given. The evidence with which we are concerned therefore is this:

Q. You said that you are connected with Shaw Wallace & Co. How are you employed there?

A. I am an assistant in the firm.

Q. What are you exactly?

A. I am in charge of the sugar department.

Court.—Are you the head of the department?

A. Of the sugar department only.

Court.—Do you buy and sell on behalf of your firm?

A. Yes.

Court.—Do you make contracts on behalf of the firm for sale of sugar?

A. I give out offers to the brokers and also send out the offers to Java or wherever we are buying from. I give out the offers personally to the brokers.

Court.—What happens when you buy sugar?

A. I instruct the brokers to buy.

Court.—When you sell?

A. Also to sell I instruct the brokers.

Court.—You give the price?

A. Yes.

Court.—They sell and you fix the price?

A. Yes.

Q. Are you a partner of that firm?

A. No.

Court.—When you buy and sell sugar is that subject to the general supervision of the partners

A. No, not an ordinary offer. Not on offers received or which I send out. If I wanted to buy anything on our own account I consult one of the partners. If I want to buy or sell sugar in the market, if we are short of sugar and I wanted to buy I would consult one of the partners. We have a limit, should I exceed the limit in any way I would consult the partners but firm offers which I receive I can sell any quantity I like without consulting anyone.

These are the facts upon which the question is to be decided whether or not Mr. Duggan is a merchant of Calcutta. The learned Judge has dealt with the matter in this way. After pointing out that Mr. Duggan is a gentleman of great experience in commercial matters and has in addition long experience of arbitration in cases of this kind, that he holds a responsible position and that he is in the habit of buying and selling goods acting on his own authority, the learned Judge observes as follows :

"In my opinion in a case of this kind and indeed in any commercial case the Court ought not to be too strict in the interpretation of words of mercantile usage, that is to say, I think the Court should not seek to go out of its way to do anything to upset the arrangements and the dispositions of the commercial community. Now in the present instance these buyers and sellers were commercial people. They provided in their contract that their disputes should be referred to a European merchant and I think that all that they meant was that the person to act as an arbitrator should be an European who had experience of business transactions of the kind with which these contracts were concerned. It is quite manifest that Mr. Duggan was and is a person of that kind, and although he is not actually in business on his own account, I think he can properly be described as a merchant without any undue straining of the English language, and I think it would be too pedantic to say that merely because he is not trading on his own account he does not come within the description of an European merchant as mentioned in this contract."

Now in my judgment it is very necessary to keep this question entirely clear from any consideration as to whether or not the decision of this question will be upsetting arrangements and disposition of the commercial community. I am quite satisfied that Mr. Duggan has very frequently acted as an arbitrator. How often if it all, he has acted as an arbitrator under a clause framed precisely as the present clause, is a question upon which I have no information. I have no doubt that he is duly qualified to act as an arbitrator under many sale contracts and I have no doubt that he would be an admirable person for the parties to appoint when they have a free choice of their own as to the arbitrators. It is news to me that there are any arrangements or dispositions of the commercial community which involve the proposition that an assistant in a Calcutta business house is a merchant. But there is no question here of those words having any special meaning.

The question is as to the natural and ordinary meaning of an English word. In the case of Gill v. Manchester Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Co. (1) cited to us, it is called "ordinary popular meaning." That is the first thing. In the second place it is not a question whether there is any undue strain on the English language. I do not feel called upon to put any strain in either direction. The question is whether or not, drawing the line fairly as best one can, according to the popular usage of English words, Mr. Duggan comes on the one side of the line or on the other side. Approaching the question in that way I notice that Mr. Duggan when he is asked "how are you employed there," says "I am an assistant in the firm." He is of course, not an ordinary assistant because he appears to be the head of the sugar department. How many assistants are engaged in the sugar department I do not know but I should presume that there are several. He is an assistant of some seniority with more responsible duties than many other assistants. It is quite clear that the mere fact that he is an assistant to a firm of merchants would not make him a merchant in Calcutta. It is quite clear also that the mere fact that he is the head of a department would not make him a merchant in Calcutta.

It is contended, however, that upon the evidence that he is daily engaged in buying and selling sugar on behalf of his firm by giving out orders to brokers, this consideration makes him a merchant within the true meaning of that term. It is said that he is none the less a merchant, that he is merely acting on behalf of other people all the time. It is said that he is none the less a merchant because his authority is limited and he has in certain exceptional matters to take authority from the partners. Stress being laid upon the circumstance that he is daily engaged in the matter of buying and selling Mr. Sircar presses upon us that we ought to hold that he is a merchant. It is also said that as a merchant's business may be conducted by a company, by means of managing agents, one ought not to regard it as an essential part of the connotation of the term "merchant" that the man in question should be in business for himself trading for his own profit as distinct from assisting other people to trade for their profit. "Merchant" is a term which has been defined in several dictionaries to which we have been referred. One definition has been cited to us from Webster's Dictionary. "Merchant" — Any one making a business of "buying and selling commodities." Another from the New Oxford Dictionary :

"Merchant—One whose occupation is the purchase and sale of marketable commodities for profit."

I agree with Mr. Sircar in the view which he cited to us from the observations of Lord Blackburn in Gill's case (1) that when one is enquiring after the ordinary popular meaning of a term the Court is as good a judge of that meaning as any learned authority. I am far from saying that the Court is not put in a better position for judging by a consideration of the definitions which are to be got from dictionaries. But it is essential in this case to remember that the duty of the Court is to take a particular case and decide whether or not that case comes within the term that is in question, and that it is not any necessary part of the duties of the Court to affirm a definition as one which can safely be relied upon to govern all other cases.

I examine this matter with a view to ask myself whether in the ordinary popular acceptation of the word, Mr. Duggan would be recognized as accurately describing himself if he said "I am a Calcutta merchant." I cannot doubt that without straining the word Mr. Duggan does not come within the ordinary popular acceptation of the term. The learned Judge on this short question of the English language was in as good a position to form an opinion as I am and I find some consolation in the fact that there are expressions in his judgment which seem to show that in the interest of business arrangements he found room for Mr. Duggan within the definition of "merchant" by putting some little strain upon the ordinary popular acceptation of the term. Mr. Sircar on behalf of the defendant has very properly pointed out to us that the question is in this case, not whether Mr. Duggan is carrying on business as a merchant in Calcutta but whether, he can be described as a merchant—that term being given to express the general nature of his calling. A man certainly can be a merchant although for the moment he is out of business. A man who has a business of a merchant and turns it into a limited liability company of which he becomes the managing director could not be refused the designation "merchant" merely because for a few months he had ceased to be trading on his own account.

Again it is quite clear that in the case of a profession which has a definite qualification such as solicitor, a man might be described as a solicitor although he is not in practice for himself. I quite appreciate these points but still the question is whether Mr. Duggan is a merchant. In my judgment taking it as a concrete case, he comes under a different and well known category viz., that of "assistant" in a firm of merchants but he is not within the meaning of merchant in the contract with which we are concerned. In the arbitration clause it is not provided that the arbitrator must be a person with special knowledge of sugar. There is nothing to show that he has to be a sugar merchant. He is to be a European and he is to be of Calcutta. He has certainly according to any definition of "merchant" to be accustomed to buy and sell by himself or by others. But if the ordinary popular meaning of the word "merchant" connotes a certain status, there is nothing in this clause to show that the Court is entitled to disregard that part of the meaning of the expression. If all that is required is a certain acquaintance with or experience in buying or selling or even in the buying or selling of sugar then persons would be qualified under Cl. 15 who might be persons occupying a very modest position in life and in the business world. If that were so it might go down to such persons as Head Clerks or people of even less position who might be entrusted by their masters or employers with buying or selling on their behalf. When the defendants insisted upon appointing Mr. Duggan and carrying the arbitration ex parte, they took a risk. Giving the best consideration I can to this matter I am of opinion that the true exposition of Cl. 15 is one under which Mr. Duggan is not such a person that the defendants could insist upon his arbitration in spite of the opposition of the plaintiffs. If Mr. Duggan is not qualified then these awards are not binding upon the plaintiffs. That appears, in my judgment, to be abundantly clear from the decision of Pickford, J., in the case of Mughe in, Hopkins & Co. v. Foukelmann (2) and also upon principle.

Now, there remain two points in this case and on both of them I am in entire agreement with the learned Judge. The first is the question whether there was something informal in the way in which Mr. Duggan was made the sole arbitrator by the defendants. That question depends upon a contention to the effect that the concluding words of Cl. 15 do not form a Code of their own, but that we have to read into them the requirements of the Arbitration Act. I mean the requirement of due notice and so on. In my judgment the clause must be construed as it stands and it is not shown that the defendants acted in any way in disconformity with their rights under the contract.

The third and last question is one which has occupied the greatest amount of the time and attention of the Court below and indeed of this Court. The contention was that Mr. Duggan's award had been improperly procured in the sense that the defendants had no goods to offer to the plaintiffs in December 1920, that they fraudulently professed to have them and that they effected a bogus re-sale of goods which they did not possess on 6th January 1921 and fraudulently put their case before Mr. Duggan concealing from him all these material facts. This case was allowed to be raised by an amendment of the plaint in April 1925, some four years after the institution of the suit. It was allowed on the representation that the plaintiffs had been put upon enquiry by a letter of September 1924 whereby the defendants' solicitors wanted to withdraw from examination certain documents mentioned in their affidavit of documents. The leave to amend was granted in April 1925 and Mr. Sircar on behalf of the defendants maintains before us that in this appeal he is entitled to question that interlocutory order and that such leave ought not to have been granted. Speaking for myself, I should not interfere with an order of that character. The matter has been open to the plaintiffs and the whole case has been thrashed out upon the evidence. But the question upon which it is right that we should express an opinion is the question whether these awards can be set aside as being fraudulently procured by the plaintiffs. As I have said, on that question I am in entire agreement with the judgment of the learned Judge. It is only necessary to make one or two observations so as to show that this part of the case has been duly considered by this Court.

The plaintiffs' case is that 1000 tons of white Java sugar arrived for the defendants in due course. They are unable to show that from 16th December right down to 4th January the defendants had not ample supplies with which they could make delivery to the plaintiffs. It is quite clear that in the second half of December the defendants were pressing the plaintiffs to take delivery but the plaintiffs did not take the goods as the market had gone against the plaintiffs heavily. It is said, however, that if you go to 5th January (by which time it was abundantly clear that the plaintiffs had no intention of taking these goods) it can be seen that the defendants had parted with so much of the 1000 tons that they had no longer any desire or ability to make delivery. In my opinion that case breaks down altogether. It depends upon the process of taking delivery orders according to their dates and dealing with delivery orders after the manner of Claytons case in the basis that the moment a delivery order had been issued the goods entirely ceased to be in the defendants' control. Even on that basis I do not say that the plaintiffs have made out their case. But I think it is a wrong basis. It is quite clear to me that if on 5th or 6th plaintiffs had paid for and taken delivery orders they could and would have got their sugar from the docks. It is not the case on the evidence that the moment a delivery order is signed any particular goods cease to be under the control of the defendants, nor is it any concern of the plaintiffs in what way any outstanding delivery orders given to other people would have been dealt with had the plaintiffs chosen to take delivery of the goods. On that point I entirely agree with the learned Judge. I think, therefore, that there was enough of this sugar to answer not only the plaintiffs contract but also the contract of Kala Chand whose goods were included in the same re-sale. That is the first question. In my judgment the defendants had the goods. Then it is said that when the re-sale was made on 6th January that was a bogus re-sale. In my opinion the evidence called by the plaintiffs themselves disproves that contention. There was re-sale in the ordinary manner. There were several bidders there and the price obtained was a reasonable rate.

The third thing that is said is that after all the goods were sold to Sattar and we find that Sattar parted with the goods back again on the same day at the same price; and that is a circumstance which shows that it was a bogus re-sale and the awards are liable to be upset because this circumstance was not fairly and fully laid before Mr. Duggan in this ex parte arbitration. The learned Judge has dealt with that contention in a manner which seems to me to be adequate and correct. I will take it that Sattar may be regarded as a mere nominee of the defendants for this purpose. Still every other person was given an opportunity to bid. A reasonable rate was obtained, and in the end Mr. Duggan awarded the rate of damages claimed because he was satisfied that it was based upon a reasonable market rate in accordance with his experience. In these circumstances, the plaintiffs' case on that part of the matter has been rightly dismissed by the learned Judge on the original side.

However this appeal must be allowed and there must be a declaration that the awards are not valid or binding upon the plaintiffs.

On the question of costs it is manifest that the defendants have in the end succeeded upon the chief matters which required the taking of evidence; and while the plaintiffs have succeeded ultimately in the suit we are of opinion that there should be no order as to costs either in this Court or in the Court below.

There will be an order for repayment of the sum of Rs. 26,220-7-3 with interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum from the date of the withdrawal of the money by the defendant firm till the date of payment.

(b) Transfer of Property Act, S. 44—Monthly tenancy—Partition—Partition can be effected or refused on ground of convenience only.

There is no fixed rule of law that a property held in temporary right cannot be partitioned; the only ground on which partition may be allowed or refused is convenience. [P 712 C 2]

The subject matter of a suit was a plot of land adjoining a homestead and there was no substantial structure on it. The holding was monthly one but, was old and in occupation of tenants for over 50 years. The tenants suing for partition had occupied it since their purchase for over 21 years without apparently any effort on the part of landlord to eject them. The landlords were numerous and scattered and there was no practical likelihood of their writing to eject the tenants. The tenancy rights were possessed solely by the parties to the suit, and they themselves were cosharers-landlords. Parties had been in joint possession and partition between them would not bind the landlord.

Ghose, J.—Plaintiffs sue for partition of a plot of land described as "Bairagi Bari" alleging that they have purchased four-fifths share of the tenancy right and defendants have purchased the remaining one-fifth share. Plaintiffs and defendants have small shares in the landlord's interest, the entire 16 annas of that interest being held by a large number of persons. The defence is that plaintiffs have no title except by virtue of the superior interest and that the property falls within the joint estate only up to a certain extent, the rest being in another estate. Plaintiffs won in the first Court, but they lost in the Court of appeal below. They now come in second appeal.

In this appeal the first point is whether plaintiffs have proved their tenancy right to the land in suit. Plaintiffs base their right upon three conveyances, namely: (1) Ex. 1 which is an unregistered deed bearing date 4th Sravan 1308 in respect of a one-fifth share of the tenancy right for a sum below Rs. 100. (2) Ex. 1 (c) an unregistered deed of conveyance dated 2nd Aswin 1308 in respect of a two-fifths share for a sum above Rs. 100, the documents being executed by two females on behalf of their minor sons. The latter confirmed the transaction in 1328 by two registered instruments, Ex. 1 (a) and Ex. 1 (b). (3) Ex. 1 (d) an unregistered deed of conveyance dated 7th Aughrayan, 1310, in respect of a one-fifth share of the tenancy for a sum above Rs. 100. Defendants get their title from a registered kabala Ex. 1 (e) dated 8th Baisak, 1310, in respect of a one-fifth share of the tenancy right. It is admitted that the original tenants were five brothers from whom plaintiffs and defendants derived their title by purchase as above. The difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs is that all these three deeds of sale were unregistered. The learned District Judge took the view that, as regards the first acquisition in Sravan 1308, the transaction being for a consideration of less than Rs. 100, it did not require to be proved by registered instruments and that there had been proof of delivery of possession as required by S. 54, T. P. Act. He, therefore, accepted the plaintiffs' case that they came into the possession of a part of the disputed land in Sravan 1308. The learned District Judge further thought that the kabala Ex. 1 was relevant for the strictly collateral purpose of the proving in what capacity the entry of possession was made by the plaintiffs and he found that as regards this one-fifth share acquired in Sravan 1308 the plaintiffs had shown that they were tenants. But, as regards the other two kabalas, the learned District Judge thought that they could not be used at all in favour of the plaintiffs, and so he thought that they were in possession in their capacity as cosharers landlords.

In this view he came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to partition without joining the other cosharers landlords. The learned advocate for the appellants has contended that the learned District Judge was wrong in not considering that the kabalas Ex. 1 (c) and Ex. 1 (d) could also be admitted for the collateral purpose of proving the character of the possession of the plaintiffs as tenants. I think this contention is correct and it is supported by the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Varada Pillai v. Jeevarathnammal (1). That was a case of a gift and the fact that in that case there was no deed of gift at all makes to my mind no essential difference. The point is that in that case although the gift was held to be invalid, because it was not made by a registered deed as required by S. 123, T. P. Act, and the recitals in a partition could not be used as evidence of gift, it was held that those recitals might be referred to as explaining the nature and character of the possession of the donee. A similar view was taken in the case of Jagannath Mararwari v. Sm. Chandui

Bibi (2). In that case also the fact that a deed of gift was not necessary according to law makes no difference, the point being that an unregistered deed of gift was held to be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving the character of the possession of the donee. Now it has been found by the trial Court that the kabalas were genuine documents for consideration and that they were followed by delivery of possession to the plaintiffs. The learned District Judge has not reversed these findings, on the contrary he writes that :

"it is admitted that both the parties are in possession of the disputed land,"

As regards the first kabala, it has been found that it led to the possession of a one-fifth share by the plaintiffs as tenants. As regards the second kabala, although the title was not possibly perfected by the two deeds of release, Ex. 1 (a) and Ex. 1 (b) still those deeds were operative by way of admission of adverse possession on the part of the tenants vendors. Plaintiffs and defendants themselves are no doubt small cosharer landlords, and I do not overlook the fact that in the Courts below plaintiffs tried to make a case that they were actually paying rents to the other landlords but that the learned District Judge found that some of the rent receipts were forged. Still we have the fact that plaintiffs have been in possession of these properties ever since the execution of the kabalas from 1308 onwards, and in order to explain the character of the possession we have to look to those documents. They show that the possession was that of a tenant. The only point that has troubled me is this, that although plaintiff's title has been perfected by possession for more than 12 years as against the vendors, whether that could conclude the present defendants, they being also cosharer landlords. Hence apparently the learned District Judge was led to think that plaintiffs' possession as regards the three-fifths share must be held to be that of cosharer landlords. But I think this position is inconsistent with the view that as regards the one-fifth share plaintiffs were in the position of tenants. From the judgment of the trial Court I find that in that Court it was admitted that the original tenants were 5 Saha brothers and it appears that the father of defendants 1 and 2 purchased from Monmohan Saha, son of one of the Saha brothers. The defence of defendant 1—that he or defendant 2 has got no tenancy right—seems to me to be inconsistent with the origin of their possession by virtue of the aforesaid purchase. I, therefore, think that the learned trial Court took the correct view when it stated that :

(2) A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 647.

"in the present case the plaintiffs and their predecessors first entered into possession as tenants."

This possession continued for more than twelve years and I find that plaintiffs have got their title in respect of the four-fifths share of the tenancy right in the land in suit.

The next point upon which the learned District Judge decided the suit against the plaintiffs is that the tenancy is a monthly tenancy under S. 106, T. P. Act, and that, therefore, it is not a fit subject for partition. The question is whether this view is correct. No doubt plaintiffs would be entitled to partition of their property under S. 44, T. P. Act, unless it could be shown that the holding was liable to some disability against partition. To my mind when once the rights are established the sole ground on which partition may be allowed or refused is the ground of convenience. This principle was laid down in the Full Bench case Hemadri Nath Khan v. Ramani Kanta Roy (3) and following this principle the case of Bepin Behari Mitter v. Bhagwat Sahai (4) held that partition should not be allowed when the interest in question was of a temporary and qualified character. On appeal their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Bhagwat Sahai v. Bepin Behari Mitter (5) reversed the finding that the interest in question in that case was of a temporary and qualified character, but they expressly refrained from adopting as a rule of law that a temporary interest could not be partitioned. In the case of Lalit Kishore Mitra v. Girdhari Singh (6) the subject of partition, which was allowed, was terminable, albeit it was a mining lease for a term of 999 years.

(3) [1897] 24 Cal. 575=1 C. W. N. 406 (F.B.).

(6) [1916] 20 C. W. N. 1306=1 Pat. L. J. 441=35 I. C. 861=2 Pat. L. W. 383.

In the case of Rajendra Narayan Saha v. Satish Chandra Pal (7) the subject-matter of partition, which was also allowed, was an ordinary occupancy holding. Thus I do not find that it has been laid down anywhere as a fixed rule of law that a property held in temporary right can not be partitioned and the only rule that I can find is the rule of convenience. In the present case stress has been laid on the finding that the subject-matter of the suit is a monthly tenancy under S. 106, T. P. Act, terminable on 15 days' notice. The learned advocate for the appellant in this Court has complained that this matter was agitated for the first time in the Court of appeal below. In reply to this I have been referred to issue 4 of the trial Court which runs as follows :

"Are the plaintiffs entitled to a partition of the tenancy right without bringing into hotchpot the superior proprietary right which they and defendants have to the land?"

This issue, however, did not raise the question quite in the same way, and judging from the fact that the learned Subordinate Judge disposed of it in a few lines, it is apparent that the parties did not attach particular importance to this question at the time of the trial. However, no doubt we have the finding that the subject matter of the suit is a monthly tenancy terminable on 15 days' notice. But looking at the actual circumstances, it seems to me that this is only technically so. The subject matter of the suit is a plot of land adjoining a homestead and it does not appear to have any substantial structure on it. The holding is very old and the finding is that it has been in occupation for over half a century. Plaintiffs certainly have been occupying it since their purchase more than 21 years ago without apparently any effort on the part of the landlords to eject them. The landlords are numerous and scattered and there is no practical likelihood of their writing to eject the tenants. The tenancy right is possessed solely by the present plaintiffs and the defendants, and they themselves are cosharers landlords. In these circumstances I cannot see how the prayer for partition can be refused on the ground of convenience. Plaintiffs and defendants have been in joint possession for a long time, and of course partition as between them would not bind the landlord. In the circumstances of this case I consider that the mere fact that technically the holding is a monthly tenancy should not debar the plaintiffs from their lawful right to partition. I think, therefore, that partition should be allowed.

The learned District Judge disposed of the appeal against the plaintiffs on these two points. In this Court the learned advocate for the defendant respondent has argued that on the findings arrived at by the learned District Judge, it cannot be said that the tenancy was transferable. It is pointed out that the learned District Judge has found that the tenancy has been in existence for about half a century. He says :

"Its occupation by the Bairagi goes back about half a century and its previous history is unknown."

It has been argued from this that the learned District Judge appears to have found that the property was in existence from before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act in 1882. I do not think, however, that this is the proper construction of what the learned District Judge has found. Apparently that was not in his mind and it would be a straining of the language used to hold that he must be taken to have found that the tenancy was in existence from before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act which was about 40 years before the suit. On the other hand it was never the defence that the tenancy had been in existence from before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, but the defence was that the tenancy was governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act. My attention has been drawn to ground 14 of the grounds of appeal in this Court which runs as follows :

"For that the Court of appeal below is wrong in holding that the present tenancy is a tenancy from month to month whereas it should have held under the circumstances of the case that there is a presumption of permanency and that the tenancy was created before the Transfer of Property Act."

The learned advocate for the appellant, on his attention being drawn to this ground, stated that he gave it up and I do not consider that his clients are to be bound by what is after all an inconsistent ground in appeal. There is therefore no substance in the point taken by the respondents, and it must fail.

The result is that in this suit there will be a preliminary decree for partition subject, however, to the decision of the following issue, namely, issue 6, of the trial Court, which was to this effect :

"What are the correct boundaries and extent of the land liable to be partitioned? Are the settlement plots indications of the land correctly depicted and is the record incorrect?"

Upon this the learned Subordinate Judge came to this finding :

"It is accordingly held in this issue that the land in suit is the Cadastral Survey Settlement Dags Nos. 205 and 272 and that portion of 1054 which lies between them being bounded on the west and east by the lines joining the nearest corner points of the Dags Nos. 205 and 272."

The question was raised again before the learned District Judge and he remarked as follows :

"There was another point in the appeal about the limits of the alleged tenancy regarding which however in view of my decision on the main question I did not hear argument."

It is necessary that this point should now be heard and decided.

The appeal is accordingly allowed. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and the case is remitted to that Court, in the first place, for a decision of the above point. When that point has been decided, there will be a preliminary decree for partition. Appellants will get their costs in all Courts. Future costs will abide the result.

Bengal National Bank, Ltd.—Plaintiff.

Jatindra Nath Mazumdar and others—Defendants.

Suit No. 126 of 1925, Decided on 10th December 1928.

(a) Limitation Act, S. 19—Acknowledgment of liability to pay debt by a letter forwarding bills between creditors and bankers "as arranged" is valid acknowledgment.

Where defendants who carried on business in partnership opened an overdraft account with the plaintiff bank and it was arranged that each partner was eligible to sign cheques in the firm's name and the bank agreed to advance money to enable the defendants to purchase materials and on receipt of bills given on payment for goods supplied to customers would collect the same on commission and deduct the same balance from the overdraft, a letter forwarding such bills with request to credit amount to sender's account is sufficient acknowledgment of the debt or payment of the principal. [P 715 C 2]

(b) Limitation Act, S. 21 (2)—Acknowledgment by one of the several partners in the absence of notice of dissolution by resigning partner is binding on resigning partner—Contract Act, Ss. 251 and 267.

Where a firm of partners opens an overdraft account and the bank agrees to collect bills and credit balance after deducting commission to the firm account, any acknowledgment by means of a letter forwarding bills as arranged sent by one of the partners, other having severed his connexion with the partnership, is sufficient acknowledgment in the absence of a notice of dissolution to the bank, and is binding on the other partner: Tucker v. Tucker 3 Ch. D. 429; Watson v. Woodman 20 Eq. 721, Dist. 26 Bom. 42, Ref. [P 715 C 1]

(c) Limitation Act, S. 21 (2)—To make other partners liable acknowledging partner must have authority to do so.

Section 21 (2) simply means that mere acknowledgment or payment by one or more partners is not of itself sufficient to make the other or others chargeable apart from the question of authority. [P 716 C 1]

(d) Limitation Act, S. 19—Current account between banker and customer—Each increase of overdraft is not separate loan: (Obiter.)

In the case of a current account between a banker and his customer it is not within the correct interpretation of the Act to regard each increase of the overdraft as a separate loan from the date of which the period of limitation must be computed: 33 Cal. 407, (P. C.), Doubtful. [P 716 C 2]

F. S. R. Surita and O. R. Surita—for Plaintiff.

S. M. Bose and S. Roy—for Defendants.

Judgment.—In this suit, the plaintiffs' claim against the defendants is for the balance of a current account. The defendants Amar Nath Banerjee and Hiralal Mukherjee do not contest the suit. It is admitted that the defendants carried on business in partnership under the firm name of Banerjee Mukherjee & Co., and opened an overdraft account with the plaintiff bank, which is now in liquidation and it was arranged that each partner should be eligible to sign cheques in the firm name, adding thereto his own initials, and that the bank would advance money to enable the defendants to purchase materials and on receipt of the bills given in payment for goods supplied by defendants to customers would collect these on commission and deduct the balance from the overdraft. The defendant Jatindra Nath, however, says that this partnership was dissolved in 1921, and that the plaintiffs had notice thereof. That thereupon he ceased to have any interest in the business, which was carried on by the other two defendants alone, and that he commenced a separate business on his own account. He says also, and this seems to be true, that whatever sum was due to the bank at the time of dissolution has been repaid. He has produced a deed of dissolution dated 24th June 1921, and I have no reason to think that it is other than genuine. He has also produced a carbon copy of a letter dated 27th June 1921, giving notice of the dissolution, which he says that he handed personally to Bhupendra Nath Banerji, who was the managing director of the plaintiff bank, after giving him verbal notice at or about the date of dissolution.

He admits, however, that he did not obtain a receipt for this notice, nor did he receive any acknowledgment from the bank nor did he give any notice to firm's dealing with Banerjee Mukherjee & Co., nor did he advertise the fact of dissolution in the Exchange Gazette, nor in any of the Vernacular Gazettes nor in any English newspaper.

On the contrary Bhupendra has been called and has stated emphatically that he never had any notice of the dissolution either verbally or in writing until after the institution of the suit and he has produced the bank's Letter Receipt Book which confirms his statement.

As between the evidence of Jatindra and Bhupendra I accept that of the latter, and I find in fact that notice of the dissolution was not given to the plaintiffs—who are not therefore affected by it: S. 264, Contract Act. It is unnecessary for me to decide whether this omission to give notice was due to forgetfulness on the part of the defendants, or because they or Jatindra failed to realize what his legal position would be with regard to the firm's creditors, or because they or Amar Nath and Hiralal feared that knowledge of Jatindra's retirement might affect the firm's credit with the bank. The defendant Jatindra has raised the further points that the arrangement for overdraft was limited to Rs. 4,000, and that moneys were to be advanced only against approved securities. This Bhupendra has denied and I accept his evidence. In any case this limit was very soon exceeded, and large sums advanced without any security, to the knowledge of Jatindra. However, the substantial point raised on his behalf is one of law, namely whether the claim is statute barred, and (assuming that the period of limitation otherwise would have expired) that depends upon whether having regard to S. 21 (2), Lim. Act, there had been any acknowledgment of liability in writing under S. 19 or any part payment of the principal of the debt by the debtor or his agent duly authorized in that behalf, and the fact of which payment appears in the handwriting of the person making it as required by S. 20. Now the facts upon which the plaintiffs rely are: (1) a letter dated 11th January 1922 from defendants to plaintiffs which reads as follows:

"Enclosed please find the undermentioned bill with complete voucher which is to be collected from Messrs. Andrew Yule & Co., Ltd. account the Port Engineering Works Ltd., and credited to our account on realization as arranged."

Bill No. 1578. The Port Engineering Works, Ltd. Rs. 2832-1-6. This Bill less commission was credited to defendants' account on 26th May 1922. (2) A letter dated 18th January 1922 in similar terms referring to Bills Nos. 1492, 1583, 1584, Bill No. 1583 being credited on 24th March 1922. This suit was instituted upon 14th January 1925.

I am of opinion that there has been a sufficient acknowledgment and/or payment by the defendants Amar Nath and Hira Lal to satisfy the provisions of the above sections, as against them. The part payments of the principal debt are evidenced by the handwriting of the person making them contained in the covering letters. The fact that the collection and receipt of the money and the letter containing the handwriting are not simultaneous in point of time is immaterial, as has been decided. Moreover the letters contain acknowledgments of liability, because they refer to the account and request that the bills may be credited "as arranged," that is to say deducted, from the amount of the overdraft according to the agreement between the parties and an acknowledgment of a current account implies an acknowledgment of a right to have accounts settled and implies a promise to pay should the balance turn out to be against the person making it. Maniram Seth v. Seth Rup- chand (1). The question remains whether what they did is binding upon the defendant Jatindra Nath and it is a question of implied authority.

Ordinarily whatever their authority had been, it would cease upon dissolution. But S. 264, Contract Act, provides in effect, that so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, there had been no dissolution and the partnership still subsisted at the time when this suit was instituted. The real question therefore is, what implied authority has one partner to bind another partner by his acts.

Section 251, Contract Act, provides that each partner who does any act necessary for, or usually done in, carrying on the business binds his copartners, as if he were their agent duly appointed for that purpose. Section 21 (2) simply means that the mere acknowledgment or payment by one or more partners is not of itself sufficient to make the other or others chargeable, apart from the question of authority. Therefore what I have to decide is, whether, an acknowledgment or payment such as was made in this case and which has the effect of removing the bar of limitation, was authorized impliedly, by the defendant Jatindra Nath or not. That depends upon whether it was an act necessary for or usually done in carrying on the business. In my opinion, clearly it was such an act. The acknowledgment was contained in a letter, dated 18th January 1922 similar to many dozens of others written by defendants to plaintiffs, asking that certain bills should be collected and credited to the firm's account. It was written in the usual course, and was essential to the business, which could not have been carried on without the overdraft arrangement made with the plaintiffs. It was followed by a payment made on 24th March in accordance therewith upon collection of the bill. There was another payment upon which plaintiffs rely made on 20th May. These stand upon quite a different footing from the acknowledgments or payments with which we are familiar and to which the cases refer, and which are made specifically in recognition of the debt. For this reason none of the cases to which I have been referred is really applicable to the facts of the present case. Moreover, in view of the clear provisions of Ss. 251 and 264, Contract Act, the law as declared in the English cases of Tucker v. Tucker (2) and Watson v. Woodman (3) seems of doubtful application to India. Of the Indian decisions, the law applicable to the facts of this case is correctly stated in Dalsukhram v. Kalidas (4) where the effect of S. 264 is recognized.

In my opinion which article of the Indian Limitation Act applies is immaterial in this case.

If Arts. 57 or 59 apply, then the date when the loan was made must in my opinion be taken to be the date when the last credit was entered, namely 26th May 1922 or the last debit which was in 1925, in which cases the periods of limitation had not expired when the suit was instituted. In the case of a current account between a banker and his customer, I do not think it would be practicable, or within a correct interpretation of the Act, to regard each increase of the overdraft as a separate loan, from the date of which the period of limitation must be computed, though this seems to have been the view expressed by Sir Alfred Wills in the case of Maniram Seth v. Seth Ruxchand (1) at p. 1057. However, if I am wrong on this point, there has been an acknowledgment and part-payments of those loans in the present case, which have extended each of the periods of limitation. In English law time runs from the date when the cause of action arises (Limitation Act 1623) and not from the date when the loan is made as in Arts. 57 and 59.

No cause of action arises as between banker and customer until demand has been made. Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corporation (5). Re British American Continental Bank: Credit General Liegeois' claim (6) per P. O. Lawrence, J. at p. 593; Grant on Banking 7th edn. at p. 182. These are recent decisions, and their effect has been to upset views previously held by many lawyers. It has been declared, that it is an implied term of the contract of loan made between a banker and his customer that demand shall be made before any cause of action can arise. The first decision was given in a case in which the customer sued the banker. In the second case the banker sued the customer on an overdraft, and though the actual decision turned on another point, P. O. Lawrence, J. applied the principles laid down in the former case. Moreover, in my opinion, the term ought to be mutually applied, if at all. The Indian legislature, however, seems to have given effect to the decision in the first case so far as it affects the question of limitation but not to that in the second. This has been done in a curious and rather clumsy way. There have been added to Art. 60, Lim. Act, which deals with money deposited payable on demand as distinguished from money lent, the words "including money of a customer in the hands of his banker so payable." The distinction between deposit and loan seems to be that the depositor stands in a fiduciary relationship to the depositor, thus by introducing this amendment in Art. 60 the legislature seems to have regarded the relationship between banker and customer as such, and not as that of borrower and lender, as is the position in English and has been hitherto in Indian law.

This may not have been intended and may lead to confusion and it would have been better to have dealt with the relationship of banker and customer in a separate article. However, it seems quite clear that it was not intended to extend the amendment to a banker suing his customer on an overdraft, and Art. 60, as drafted, has no application to the present case. The decisions given upon Art. 85 are difficult to apply to the facts of this case, and are not very easy to follow. Thus it has been held that there must be reciprocity of dealings, items on one side only are not enough though made up of debits and credits—an account under which one party has merely received and paid moneys on account of the other is not a mutual account properly so called. Ram Pershad v. Harbans (7). Similarly where the plaintiff a banker had made advances and received part-payments from time to time, the balance always being in plaintiff's favour. Ram

(7) [1907] 6 C. L. J. 168.

Ram v. Ralli Ram (8), Bank of Multan Ltd. v. Kamta Prasad (9).

But where plaintiff advanced money and defendant consigned goods to plaintiff for sale on commission, it was held that there were independent obligations on both sides, because there existed the relationship of creditor and debtor between plaintiff and defendant and that of principal and agent between defendant and plaintiff: Numbermal v. Kotayya (10), Ratan Chand Jwala Das v. Asa Singh Bhoga Singh (11).

The facts of the present case are somewhat similar as the plaintiffs charged commission on collection, and on the whole I think that Art. 85 applies and the close of the year 1922 is the appropriate date from which limitation begins to run. Apart from this question of commission, I do not think that Art. 85 would apply. If none of these articles apply, then the case must fall under Art. 120, which provides a period of six years from the time when the right to sue accrues.

The result of all these considerations is that in my opinion the suit is not barred against any of the defendants and there must be judgment against them and in favour of the plaintiffs for the sum claimed, with costs on scale 1 against Amar Nath Banerjee and Hira Lal Mukherjee, and on scale two against Jatindra Nath Mauzmdar.

non-prosecution on failure—S. 9 applies to appellate Courts and procedure laid down there cannot be departed from.

It is not in the power of the Court to call upon the appellant to produce evidence to substantiate the value which he has assessed upon the property in question. If the Court is of opinion that the value has been wrongly assessed, the Court can proceed under S. 9 but there is no provision whatever in the Court-fees Act under which the Court can call on a party to prove that the Court-fee is what the party alleges to be and on his failure to do so dismiss his appeal for non-prosecution. *(b) Court-fees Act (7 of 1890)—Issuing chart setting out valuation of land in district by District Judge, superseding provisions of Act is entirely unwarranted.

Issue of a chart by the District Judge setting valuation of different classes of lands in the district, and sent round to all subordinate Courts is a serious interference with Court's judicial discretion and entirely unwarranted by the provisions of the Act. The propriety of such chart is questionable inasmuch as the Act provides that the Court may if it questions the valuation, issue a commission for such local investigation as is necessary. Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this appeal has arisen are briefly these. The plaintiffs in the suit brought a suit in which they claimed that a certain jote was held under them by the defendants and not by them under the pro forma defendants. In the trial Court the suit was valued at Rs. 200 and this valuation was accepted both by the trial Court and the parties. The appeal to the lower appellate Court was valued at the same amount. The office made a note on the memorandum of appeal as follows:

"This is a suit for establishment of the plaintiffs' taluka right over the disputed land and for declaration of getting rent from the 2nd party defendant. Ad valorem fee has been paid on valuation of Rs. 200 in both the Courts."

The learned District Judge then made a note asking the lower Court to explain how the valuation was arrived at and under what section the court-fees were assessed. The learned Judge says that S. 7 (c) would seem to apply and he asked both parties to produce a copy of the rayati khattian in question by 17th August 1926. It is difficult to understand why the lower appellate Court should have asked the trial Court or its explanation. The valuation had been accepted by the lower Court and both the parties and presumably was correct. Be that as it may the trial Court replied as follows:

"The suit in question was instituted in the local Munsif's 6th Court on 13th August 1923 and was registered in that Court that, is, before the chart for the guidance of valuation of suit land was issued. This Court received the suit on transfer and as the defendant did not raise any objection as to the value of the suit no question on the point arose for my consideration."

The chart referred to in the explanation requires explanation. We are informed that the District Judge has sent round to the Subordinate Courts in the district a chart in which the valuation is set out of the various classes of land in the district. The propriety of the issue of a chart of this character is over questionable. S. 9, Court-fees Act, provides that the Court may if it questions valuation issue a commission for such local investigation as is necessary. But it makes no provision for a chart of this kind and for the District Court to issue a chart of this kind to the Subordinate Court seems to me to be a serious interference with those Courts' judicial discretion and entirely unwarranted by any provision of the Act. After the receipt of this explanation by the lower appellate Court the appellant prayed for ten days' time to produce the map and the khattian. There is a note by the lower appellate Court that there was no appearance on behalf of the plaintiff respondents. On 4th October the appellant prayed for further time to produce the map and the khattian. The learned Judge refused to grant further time stating that the appellant could have brought the map and khattian long ago and that he was not prosecuting the appeal properly and that the memo. of appeal was therefore rejected. Against this order the appellant has appealed to this Court.

The order passed by the learned Judge is clearly an illegal order and must be set aside. It has not been suggested to us by the parties that there is any section either in the Civil Procedure Code or in the Court-fees Act within which it can possibly fall. It certainly does not come under O. 41, R. 3 or O. 41, R. 17 or 18, Civil P. C. It has been suggested to us by the learned advocate for the respondents that it falls under S. 12, Court-fees Act.

It clearly does not. S. 12 only provides that whenever any such suit comes before a Court of appeal, reference or revision, if such Court considers that the question of valuation of a suit has been wrongly decided to the detriment of the revenue it shall require the party by whom such fee has been paid to pay so much additional fee as would have been payable had the question been rightly decided and the provisions of S. 10, para. (ii) shall apply. In this case the Court did not decide that the question relating to valuation for the purpose of assessing court-fees had been wrongly decided nor did it require the appellant to pay additional court-fees under the section. Clearly, therefore, the appeal was not dismissed on the ground that the appellant failed to pay additional court-fees when called on to do so by the appellate Court. It is difficult to see under what procedure or under what section of the Court-fees Act the appellant was called upon to produce evidence as to the value of his land. The only section which seems to deal with this point is S. 9, Court-fees Act. This section applies to the Court of first instance primarily but there is no reason to think why it should not apply also to a Court of appeal. S. 9 provides :

" If the Court sees reason to think that the annual nett profits or the market value of any such land house or garden as is mentioned in S. 7 paras. 5 and 6 have or has been wrongly estimated the Court may, for the purpose of computing the fee payable in any suit therein mentioned, issue a commission to any proper person, directing him to make such local or other investigation as may be necessary, and to report thereon to the Court. "

If therefore, the Court is of opinion that the value has been wrongly assessed the Court can proceed under that section and assess the value in the manner provided in that section. In these matters the Court must proceed strictly according to law and not in the arbitrary and illegal way this case reveals. It is not in the power of the Court to call upon the appellant to produce evidence to substantiate the value which he has assessed upon the property in question. But there is no provision whatever in the Court-fees Act under which the Court can call on a party to prove that the Court-fee is what he the party alleges it to be and on his failure to do so to dismiss this appeal for non-prosecution.

The order of the District Judge is clearly wrong and is set aside and he will take up the appeal from the stage at which he passed his order.

There will be no order as to costs in this appeal.

Graham, J.—I agree that the appeal must be allowed on the ground that the order appealed against is without jurisdiction and is not in accordance with any section either of the Code of Civil Procedure or in the Court-fees Act. The proper procedure for the learned Judge to adopt was under sub-S. (2), S. 12, Court-fees Act. But that procedure has not been followed. I concur in the order which my learned brother has made.

Appeals Nos. 174 and 175 of 1926, Decided on 10th December 1928, from original decrees of Sub-Judge, Khulna, D/- 13th November 1925.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 20, R. 12 — Right to mesne profits found in judgment—No direction in decree—Assessment of mesne profits in decree was allowed.

Where plaintiff's right to mesne profits is found in judgment but there is no direction in the decree and on plaintiff's application for the assessment of mesne profits the Court decreed the amount of mesne profits, the action of the Court in assessing the mesne profits, as if an order was distinctly made in the decree in terms of O. 20, R. 12, is right.

(b) Bengal Civil Courts Act (12 of 1887), S. 21 (2)—Value of land below Rs. 5,000—Value with decreed mesne profits exceeding Rs. 5,000—Appeal lies to High Court.

Appeal against decree for mesne profits in a suit for possession of land, where value of the land with mesne profits up to the date of the suit was below Rs. 5,000, but such value with mesne profits decreed exceeded Rs. 5,000, lies to the High Court : A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 1076, (F.B.), Dist. ; 34 Cal. 954 (F.B.), Ref.

(c) Transfer of Property Act, S. 6—Mere right to sue—Assignment of right to property, all interest and mesne profits claimed in suit is not mere right to sue.

Transfer of properties and all interests in suit including past and future mesne profits by original plaintiff in a suit for possession of land to the plaintiff subsequently substituted is not a mere right to sue and is not prohibited under S. 6. [P 721 C 1]

(d) Landlord and Tenant—Rent—On dis-possession rent suspended—If mesne profits are granted for period of dispossession landlord is entitled to deduct rent.

Where a landlord dispossesses the tenant, there is no doubt a suspension of rent; but when a tenant gets mesne profits from the landlord for such dispossession landlord is entitled to deduct the amount of rent payable to him on account of the lands in question. [P 722 C 2]

(e) Civil P. C., S. 35 — Commission for taking accounts—Plaintiff succeeding is entitled to costs of commission.

When commissions for taking accounts and so forth are directed if the plaintiff succeeds to any extent, he is entitled to the costs of the commission. [P 723 C 1]

B. B. Ghose, J.—These two appeals are by the defendants against the final decree made by the Subordinate Judge of Khulna assessing the amount of mesne profits in two suits brought by the vendor of the present respondents. The suits were instituted in 1908 by one Nag for recovery of possession of certain lands and for mesne profits from Assar 1314 till the date of the suits and also subsequent mesne profits till the date of recovery of possession. The suits were originally brought in the Munsiff's Court: then they were refiled in the Court of the Subordinate Judge as the Munsif found that the value of the subject-matter of the suits was beyond his jurisdiction. During the pendency of the suits the original plaintiff executed a conveyance in favour of the present respondents on 10th December 1911 and the contesting respondents were substituted for the original plaintiff. They carried on the suits and obtained decrees in the trial Court. There were appeals to the District Judge and then second appeals to this Court in both of which the respondents were successful. Subsequently, the respondents applied for assessment of mesne profits. In November 1925 the amount of mesne profits assessed by the Subordinate Judge in the two suits was about Rs. 8,000. The same arguments were addressed in both the appeals and it will be sufficient to give reasons with regard to one of them.

A preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the respondents as to the forum of the appeal. Their contention is that the appeals ought to have been preferred in the Court of the District Judge, the reason being that the original value of the lands in suit and the mesne profits claimed up to the date of the suit fall below Rs. 5,000 although the value of the lands added to the amount of mesne profits now decreed exceeds Rs. 5,000. Reliance is placed upon certain expressions in a judgment of myself in the Full Bench case of Bidyadhar Bachar v. Manindra Nath Das (1), and it is contended that the appeals should lie to the District Judge. The observations referred to were, however, made with reference to the jurisdiction of a Munsiff to make a decree in excess of his pecuniary jurisdiction for mesne profits pendente lite and no question was involved in that Full Bench case as to the forum of appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge under the present circumstances. The observations with regard to an appeal in that case referred to the provisions in the Bengal Civil Courts Act, S. 21 (2) about an appeal from the decision of a Munsif. The question as to the forum of appeal in a case such as this was decided in the previous Full Bench case of Ijjatulla Bhuian v. Chandra Mohan Banerjee (2). The appeal, therefore, to this Court is competent and the preliminary objection taken on behalf of the respondents must, accordingly, be overruled.

On the merits a large number of objections has been taken by the learned advocate for the appellants.

The first is that there is no direction in the decree made previously under O. 20, R. 12, Civil P. C., for the assessment of mesne profits and therefore no enquiry could be made by the Court at any subsequent stage of the hearing. What happened at the trial was that a distinct issue was raised in the trial Court as regards the right of the plaintiff to mesne profits. That issue was issue 14. In deciding that issue the Subordinate Judge made the following observations:

"The plaintiff is entitled to get mesne profits, the principal defendants being found to be in possession of the disputed properties without any title. The amount of mesne profits will be determined hereafter."

(1) A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 1076=53 Cal. 14 (F.B.).

These words, however, were not in the ordering portion of the judgment and in the decree no specific mention was made with regard to mesne profits. The ordering portion of the decree only states: "The suit is decreed on contest against the defendant who appeared" and then there was the provision for taking khas possession and so forth. This decree, as already stated, was affirmed by the District Judge on appeal and by the High Court in second appeal. It is clear that the decree was not drawn up in accordance with the judgment. At a subsequent stage of the proceedings the Subordinate Judge, who was a different official from the original Judge who made the decree, construed the decree as allowing mesne profits as claimed by the claimant in the plaint. To give effect to the contention of the appellants would only result in this, that the plaintiffs would have to apply to the Court to make the decree in accordance with the judgment. There is no limitation for such an application and, therefore, the objection raised on behalf of the appellants is not a substantial one. The Court below was right in assessing the mesne profits as if an order was distinctly made in the decree in terms of O. 20, R. 12, Civil P. C.

The second objection is based upon the fact of transfer of the interest of the original plaintiff to the present respondents. It is contended that by virtue of that transfer the substituted plaintiffs are not entitled to claim mesne profits for the period before the date of such transfer, that is to say, before 10th December 1911. The objection is based on the ground that the right to claim mesne profits was a mere right to sue and, therefore, the transfer of the right is within the mischief of S. 6 (e), T. P. Act, which forbids the transfer of a 'mere right to sue. The question, therefore, for decision with reference to this objection is whether the original plaintiffs transferred a mere right to sue in favour of the present respondents. Reliance has been placed by the learned advocate on behalf of the appellants to the case of Jewan Ram v. Ratan Chand Kissen Chand (3) in support of his contention. That case, however, seems to me to have no bearing on the present controversy.

(3) A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 795.

In that case it was held, upon a true construction of the terms of the assignment that there was not anything more than an assignment of a mere right to sue. Sir Lancelot Sanderson, C. J., stated that the assignment did not in terms purport even to assign the contract or the benefit thereof. Richardson, J., also held that what was assigned was not anything more than a mere right to sue, a right which is not incidental to property. In this case the question is whether what was assigned was a mere right to sue or property with an incidental remedy for its recovery and consequential benefit. An assignment of a mere right to sue does not convey any property, e. g., if any person out of possession of immovable property makes an assignment to the effect that the assignee would have a right to sue, without conveying any interest in the property, the assignee would not be entitled to maintain any suit for the recovery of the property. But it would be otherwise if the property itself is transferred. The first thing that strikes me with regard to this objection is that when the present plaintiffs were substituted in the place of the original plaintiff on the ground of the entire interest having been assigned, then no question was raised by the defendants that the assignees could not carry on the litigation with regard to any part of the claim, that is, the claim which had accrued due for past mesne profits. The entire suit was decreed in favour of the substituted plaintiffs in the trial Court as well as in the two Courts of Appeal.

But assuming such an objection could be raised now, I should say that the assignment by the original plaintiffs was not an assignment of a mere right to sue with regard to any part of the claim. Certain English cases have been cited before us but they cannot be used as direct authority on the question in this country, because the rule in England is more stringent than here, as certain transfers in England are not allowed as savouring of champerty or maintenance. Many conveyances which would not be allowed in England may be allowed in this country because there is no rule against champerty or maintenance in this country. But the decisions of English Courts may serve as a guide as regards the question as to whether an assignment is one merely of a right to sue or, as it is termed in England in many cases as, a bare right of action, or a right in the property with incidental rights. On this question the observations of the Court of Appeal in the case of Ellis v. Torrington (4) which was cited before us on behalf of the respondents, are of considerable help. Lord Justice Scrutton at p. 412 observes as follows :

"So in this case when the respondent who had bought the free-hold, took, also an assignment of the right to recover damages for dilapidations against the first lessee, he was not buying in order merely to get a cause of action; he was buying property and a cause of action as incidental thereto."

In that case the plaintiff purchased a leasehold interest with the right to recover damages which accrued previously to the date of purchase for non-repair by the lessees under a covenant. I find that Seshagiri Ayyar, J., made certain observations with regard to that case in Venkatarama Aiyar v. Ramasami Aiyar (5). I entirely agree with those observations. The transfer in this case was of the properties and all the interest which the original plaintiff had in the suits. I am of opinion that in this case there was no transfer of a mere right to sue which is prohibited under S. 6 (e), T. P. Act. This argument of the appellant also fails.

The third point raised was with regard to an alleged purchase by a person named Sashi Bhusan Maulik of the properties in question in execution of a decree against the plaintiffs. It is said that Sashi Bhusan purchased the properties on 17th November 1916. The agreement is that the present plaintiffs were not entitled to recover any mesne profits subsequent to that date. Whether the purchase by Sashi Bhusan was real or not we need not discuss. Assuming that it was a good purchase, it does not appear that he ever took possession. On the other hand, it has been proved that the plaintiffs themselves took possession in execution in Chaitra 1326 (1920). Sashi Bhusan did not get himself substituted in place of the plaintiffs and whatever he purchased it was made pendente lite and he would be bound by the decree that is made in the suit. This objection of the appellant also fails and cannot stand.

The fourth objection urged was that the rent payable on account of the properties in suit should have been deducted in calculating the mesne profits. The Subordinate Judge has not allowed that on the ground that the defendants themselves being the landlords had dispossessed the tenants and they were, therefore, not entitled to get rent. That seems to me to be an erroneous view to take. If the landlord dispossesses the tenant, there would no doubt be a suspension of rent; but when the tenant gets mesne profits from the landlord for such dispossession, the landlord is entitled to deduct the amount of rent payable to him on account of the lands in question. The respondent does not seriously object to this proposition. Therefore the amount of mesne profits should be deducted to the extent of the amount of rent payable each year.

The next objection taken on behalf of the respondent is with regard to collection charges. The commissioner allowed ten per cent and the Subordinate Judge reduced it to five per cent. Having regard to the circumstances of the case, we are not inclined to increase the collection charges allowed by the Subordinate Judge.

The sixth point taken was that a predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiff let out certain lands to the tenants on paddy rent by taking kabuliats from them and in those kabuliats it was stipulated that if the tenants did not pay paddy rent, a certain sum of money should be payable.

The objection taken by the appellant is that the plaintiffs are not entitled to claim the market price of the paddy. But the evidence in this case appears to be that the defendants actually collected paddy from some of the tenants and therefore they are bound to pay the market rate.

The seventh and the last objection that was pressed was that the commissioner found that three jamas were not in existence; but the defendants have been made liable for the profits of the three jamas. What the commissioner said was that the plaintiffs could not point out these jamas. The plaintiffs were strangers to the properties. Those jamas appear in the papers of the defendants and therefore the commissioner took into account the profits of the jamas. There is nothing wrong in it. It ap-appears that defendants produced collection papers for only one year, that is, 1314 B. S., and the mesne profits have been assessed with reference to the papers of the defendants themselves. If they have not produced papers of subsequent years and if they have been charged with more than what could be reasonably received from the property, it was their own fault and therefore they cannot complain. This disposes of the questions raised by the appellant.

The plaintiffs-respondents, however, complain that they have not been allowed costs of the commission and the appellants say that that has not been allowed rightly because the plaintiffs claimed altogether a very excessive amount to the extent of Rs. 17,000 as mesne profits. It does not appear that on account of the inflated claim of the plaintiffs, the commissioner had to undertake any lengthy enquiry. It is the general rule that when commissions for taking accounts and so forth are directed if the plaintiff succeeds to any extent he is entitled to the costs of the commission and there is no reason why this rule should be departed from here. The plaintiffs are entitled to costs of the commission. They will also get the value of court-fees paid in the lower Court from the defendants. This disposes of the cross objection preferred by the plaintiffs. We make no order as to costs of the cross objection.

The result is that the decree of the Subordinate Judge is varied to this extent that the mesne profits is reduced by the amount of rent payable on account of the lands in question every year. Costs of the commission and amount of court-fees paid by the plaintiffs in the lower Courts should be added to the decretal amount.

Having regard to the fact that the defendants have been made liable for a large amount of mesne profits, although to a great extent due to their own fault and that they have succeeded in part with regard to their appeal, we make no order as to the costs of this appeal.

Panchanan Roy and another—Petitioners.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 380 of 1929, Decided on 8th May 1929.

Stamp Act, S. 64 (a)—Scope.

Person in whose favour the document is executed is not hit by S. 64 (a). [P 724 C 1]

Mrityunjoy Chattopadhyaya and Manindra Nath Banerji—for Petitioners.

Judgment.—This rule has been issued to show cause why the convictions of and the sentences passed on the two petitioners Panchanan Roy and Kuran Chandra Das should not be set aside or why such other order should not be made as to this Court may seem fit and proper on grounds 1 to 6 of the petition. Panchanan has been convicted under S. 64 (a), Stamp Act, and Kuran under S. 64 (b) of the same Act. Panchanan has been sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 100, in default simple imprisonment for one month and Kuran to pay a fine of Rs. 50 in default to undergo simple imprisonment for 15 days. The facts shortly are that there was a kabala in respect of a sale in which one Serajuddin was the vendor, Panchanan the purchaser and Kuran the scribe. The kabala stated that the consideration for the sale was Rs. 100. It was presented for registration and Serajuddin apparently made a statement before the Sub-Registrar to the effect that the consideration was really Rs. 161. On these facts prosecution was started as against all the three persons against Serajuddin and Panchanan for having committed an offence under S. 64 (a) and Kuran under S. 64 (b), Stamp Act. At the trial Serajuddin made a statement of a confessional nature admitting that the consideration was really Rs. 161 and not Rs. 100 which was mentioned in the document. Thereafter the said Serajuddin as well as the two petitioners who obtained this rule were convicted in respect of the offences for which they were tried.

At the outset it will be seen that the conviction of Panchanan under S. 64 (a), Stamp Act, is not justified by the allegations that have been made against him, far less by any evidence that has been adduced. S. 64 (a) is in these words :

"Any person who with intent to defraud the Government executes any instrument in which all the facts and circumstances required by S. 27 to be set forth in such instrument are not fully and truly set forth etc."

It may be conceded that S. 27 requires the sale price to be fully and truly set forth in the document, but then Panchanan did not execute the document but the document was executed in his favour. He is not hit by S. 64 (a). I have considered the question as to whether he may be brought in under S. 64 (b), for if the circumstances of the case would justify his conviction under S. 64 (b), his conviction may properly be altered to one under that section. On reading the evidence, however, I find that there is not one word in it to the effect that he personally took any part whatever in the transaction, and though it was a document executed in his favour it cannot upon the materials that are on the record for a moment be suggested that he was employed or concerned in or about the preparation of the document, far less that he neglected or omitted to set forth the value fully and truly. The result is that the conviction of Panchanan must be set aside and I order accordingly.

As regards Kuran Das, as I have already said he has been convicted under S. 64 (b). His conviction must rest upon the knowledge if any that he had as regards the real price of the property. Of that again there is no evidence whatsoever. On the other hand the prosecution witnesses themselves say that it was given out at the time when the document was being prepared that the value of the property was Rs. 100. Under these circumstances to convict him upon the statement of Serajuddin, even if for argument's sake it may be taken that Serajuddin meant to say anything which would go to indicate that Kuran had knowledge as regards the real price of the property, will not be supportable from any point of view. His conviction also cannot stand.

The rule is made absolute. The convictions of the two petitioners being set aside it is ordered that the fines if paid by them be refunded.

PEARSON AND MALLIK, JJ.

Amanat Ali—Accused—Petitioner.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 38 of 1929, Decided on 28th May 1929.

(a) Penal Code, S. 211—False charge against public servant—Jurisdiction.

A false charge against a public servant must be made to an officer who has power to investigate and send it for trial: 6 Cal. 620, Foll. [P 725 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C., (as amended), S. 197—Sanction of Government for trial of Government servant is necessary only when offence alleged is done in pursuance of public office.

The expression "offence alleged to have been committed by him while acting or purporting to act in discharge of his official duties" implies something in nature of an official character attached to the act itself, that act being in fact done as an official act in pursuance of public office held by the public servant. Therefore, in order that S. 197 may be applicable to the complaint of the offence against a public servant it is essential that the criminal act constituting the offence should have been done as an official act or under the cloak of what purported to be an official act. It is not enough that his capacity of public servant put him in position to do the alleged act. [P 725 C 2]

(c) Criminal P. C., S. 476—Power to make complaint is not confined to Court taking cognizance but superior Court to whom it is transferred or who has withdrawn case to its file under S. 528 may make complaint.

The power to make a complaint under S. 476 is not limited to the Court taking cognizance of the original case. But it extends to superior officer to whom the case has been transferred or to the Magistrate who has withdrawn the case to his own file under S. 528. But generally the Court which has proceedings before him and which tries the case on merits is the proper Court to make complaint under S. 476: 6 C. W. N. 35 and 3 C. W. N. 39, Ref. [P 726 C 1, 2]

Mrityunjoy Chattopodhya and Rajkumar Chakravarty—for Petitioner.

Khundkar—for the Crown.

Order.—The facts which have given rise to the present rule were these. The petitioner Amanat Ali preferred a complaint under S. 406, I. P. C., before Mr. K. L. Banerji, a Magistrate, 1st Class, Noakhali, charging Moulvi Azizar Rahaman, Sub-Deputy Collector of Sandip, with having misappropriated a sum of Rs. 400 paid to him by the petitioner as selami for certain khas mahal lands. Mr. Banerji examined Amanat Ali and sent the matter to one Mr. Ahmed Ali for an enquiry and report. On the next day the District Magistrate withdrew the complaint to his own file and directed Mr. Khan, Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Sadar, to enquire into the complaint and report. Mr. Khan held an enquiry and submitted a report to the District Magistrate declaring the complaint of Amanat Ali to be maliciously false. Thereupon the District Magistrate on a consideration of that report dismissed the complaint under S. 203, Criminal P. C., and under the provisions of S. 476 of the Code made a complaint against Amanat Ali under S. 211, I. P. C. Against this order of the District Magistrate the petitioner moved the Sessions Judge but without any success. Thereupon the petitioner came up to this Court and obtained the present rule.

The rule was issued on two grounds: namely, (1) that no Court being entitled to take cognizance of Amanat Ali's complaint against the Sub-Deputy Collector without sanction of the Local Government the complaint under S. 211, I. P. C., in respect thereof was not sustainable; (2) that the District Magistrate not having taken part in any judicial proceeding connected with the petitioner's complaint was not competent to make the complaint against the petitioner under the provisions of S. 476, Criminal P. C.

As regards the first ground it was urged that the charge under S. 211, I. P. C., was not sustainable, the contention being that S. 211 requires that a false charge must be made to an officer who has power to investigate and send it up for trial and that in the present case Mr. Banerji or any other Magistrate had no power to send up the matter for trial, S. 197, Criminal P. C., operating as a bar to it, inasmuch as admittedly no sanction had been obtained from the Local Government. So far as the proposition that a false charge must be made to an officer who has power to investigate and send it up for trial goes it is perfectly sound finding support as it does from the decision in the case of the Empress v. Jamoona (1). But the contention that S. 197 operates as a bar to taking cognizance in the present case does not appear to be sustainable. Under S. 197 a previous sanction of the Local Government is made necessary in a case where a public servant is accused of an offence, alleged to have been committed by him "while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty." The present wording has been somewhat altered from that of the former Code, where the question was whether the person was "accused as such Judge or public servant of any offence." The trend of the cases was that the section extended only to acts which would have no special signification except as acts done in the capacity of public servant. Leaving aside authority, however, the proper method of approaching the matter is to take the language of section as it now stands, without reference to changes in the wording or comparison with corresponding sections in previous Statutes, and thus to see what the application of it would be in the present case, taking the language in its ordinary and natural meaning. The question is whether in the present case the offence is alleged to have been committed by the public servant, namely the Sub-Deputy Collector, while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty. That would seem to imply that something in the nature of an official character attached to the act itself, that act either being in fact done or purporting to be done as an official act in pursuance of the public office held by the public servant. In the case of a criminal breach of trust by a public servant, it would, therefore, be essential to shew, before S. 197 would be applicable that misappropriation had taken place as an official act or at least under the cloak of what purported to be an official act. In the present case Amanat Ali never alleged that the Sub-Deputy Collector had misappropriated the money while acting in the capacity of a public servant. All that he said on the point was that when he asked for settlement the Sub-Deputy Collector made no settlement of the land with him and when he asked for a refund of the money the Sub-Deputy Collector denied having received any.

It is true that to constitute an offence under S. 409, I. P. C., the accused should have been entrusted with the property in his capacity of a public servant and should have committed criminal breach of trust in respect of that property. He may, therefore, be guilty under that section although the criminal act itself was not done or did not purport to be done in the discharge of his official duty. But we do not think that any argument can be based on that as to what is intended by the language of S. 197 with which alone we are here concerned. The fact that the Sub-Deputy Collector is a public servant may have afforded him the opportunity for the commission of the offence and it may be a necessary part of the proof to show that the property was entrusted to him as a public servant. But the criminal act which constitutes the offence of criminal breach of trust must itself be something in the nature of an official act done or purporting to be done in the discharge of his official duty, before the provisions of S. 197 would become applicable. As was said by Coutts-Trotter, J., In re Abdul Khadir Saheb (2) (which was a case under the former Act):

"I think on the whole that even if it is a necessary averment to say that he was a public servant and not a mere matter of proof nevertheless the offence is of criminal breach of trust and that it is not an offence which is committed by him in his capacity of public servant as such, his capacity of public servant being only that which puts him, so to speak, in a position in which such an offence can be committed."

We are, therefore, of opinion that in the present case the facts do not attract the operation of S. 197 so as to make that section a bar to the proceedings which have taken place. If S. 197, Criminal P. C., is no bar and we have held that it is no bar to the proceeding there was nothing wrong in Mr. Banerji's taking cognizance of the offence.

In support of the second ground it was contended that the District Magistrate was not competent to make a complaint under S. 476 as he had not taken cognizance of the case. But there is nothing in law to show that a complaint under S. 476 can be made only by the officer taking cognizance and by no one else. On the other hand, the words "in relation to a proceeding in a Court" which are to be found in S. 476 as well as in S. 195, sub-Cl. (1)(b), Criminal P. C., would indicate that the power to make a complaint under S. 476 is not confined only to the officer who takes cognizance of the case. In the present case it was the District Magistrate who transferred the case to his own file and sent the case for an enquiry and report to another Magistrate and it was the District Magistrate who on a consideration of the report of that enquiry dismissed the complaint under S. 203, Criminal P. C. In these circumstances, the District Magistrate had certainly a proceeding before him and it cannot be gainsaid that the false charge as made in the petition of complaint was a false charge in relation to that proceeding. That the District Magistrate was really more competent than Mr. Banerji to make a complaint under S. 476 would appear from the decision of this Court in the case of Jeeban Brista Shaw v. Benoy Kristo Shaw (3) and in the case of Putiram Ruidas v. Mahomed Kasem (4) where it has been held that the Court which tries the case on its merits and not the Court before which proceedings are instituted and even process issued is the proper Court to grant sanction for prosecution.

Then there is another aspect of the matter from which the second ground taken before us would appear to be noticeable. The District Magistrate withdrew the case to his own file under S. 528, Criminal P. C., and by his order he put himself exactly in the same position in which Mr. Banerji was. Mr. Banerji when he ordered the preliminary enquiry could certainly offer a consideration of the report of that enquiry, if he thought fit to proceed under S. 476. If Mr. Banerji could proceed under S. 476 there was no reason why the District Magistrate who by his order of transfer under S. 528 put himself in the same position as Mr. Banerji should be held debarred from proceeding under the same section. Both the points taken before us fail and the rule is accordingly discharged.

* * Criminal Trial—Jury—It is for Judge to determine whether confession is voluntary and for jury to determine its truth—Direction to jury to consider the question of voluntary nature of confession is misdirection.

In a trial by Judge and jury it is for the Judge to determine whether the confession is voluntary and for the jury to determine whether it is true or false. It is not open to the Judge to ask the jury to determine whether it is voluntary or not even though that is a question of fact. [P 727 C 2]

In a trial for an offence under S. 395, Penal Code, only evidence against the accused was his own confession which was subsequently retracted. In his direction to the jury the Judge observed: "I have admitted the confession in evidence and have provisionally answered the question if it was voluntarily made. It is for you to determine whether the confession is true or not. You will have to consider circumstances in which it was made. You will also have to consider the suggestions and allegations made against the accused. You must remember that when an accused alleges that he made a confession under inducement and threat from persons in authority the onus is upon him to prove the allegations. It is not of course possible to prove such allegations even if they were true."

Held: that the conclusion from the direction was that they were called upon to determine whether the confession was voluntarily made or not and so the Judge was guilty of serious error of law. [P 728 C 1]

Held further: that the Judge had committed a serious error in directing the jury that the burden of proving threat or inducement was on him and it was impossible to prove such allegation. [P 728 C 1]

Held: that since the confession was the only evidence against the accused, the directions have been serious misdirections which were fatal for trial. [P 728 C 2]

Cuming, J.—This is an appeal by one Khiro against the order of the learned District Judge of Rajshahi convicting the appellant under S. 395, I. P. C., and sentencing him to three years' rigorous imprisonment. The appellant was tried jointly with another man Sabur Sheikh. Sabur Sheikh was acquitted. The dacoity with which we are concerned took place in the house of one Prosanna Chandra Mandal on 27th July 1927. The usual investigation followed but no clue was obtained.

Then later in connexion with the investigation of another dacoity the present accused Khiro made some statements to the police as the result of which he was taken before a Deputy Magistrate where he made a statement which forms the basis of the present case. Khiro and Sabur were committed to the Sessions with the result already noted. It will be seen and it is admitted that the only evidence against the present appellant is his own confession which was subsequently retracted.

The appellant has contended that for certain reasons the Judge should have held that the confession was not voluntary and so inadmissible in evidence and that being so the Judge should have told the jury that there being no evidence against the accused they should return a verdict of not guilty. Further that certain formalities not having been complied with the confession for that reason was inadmissible. The admissibility of evidence is a question for the Judge.

Section 24, Evidence Act, provides that a confession made by an accused person is irrelevant in a criminal proceeding if the making of the confession appears to the Court to have been caused by any inducement, threat or promise, etc., in other words whether the confession is a voluntary one.

It is for the Judge to determine whether the confession is voluntary and for the jury to determine whether it is true or false.

I do not think it is open to the Judge to ask the jury to determine whether it is voluntary or not even though that is a question of fact for the result would be that the jury would have had put before them evidence which was inadmissible in evidence and the difficulty of removing the effect of the inadmissible evidence from the jury's mind is obvious.

In dealing with this point the learned Judge charged the jury as follows: "So far as the accused Khiro is concerned the only evidence against him, is his retracted confession (the confession Ex. 4 read).

Khiro has alleged that the confession was not voluntarily made and he was tutored to make the statements. Confession which is not voluntary is not admissible in evidence. With regard to the confession two main points have to be considered:

- (1) Whether it was voluntarily made.
- (2) Whether it is true.

The Sub-Divisional Magistrate who recorded the confession has deposed to the effect that he gave warning to the confessing accused before recording the confession. He was satisfied that it was voluntarily made. I have therefore admitted the confession and provisionally answered the first question. It is for you to determine whether the confession is true or not. You will have to consider the circumstance in which it was made.

You will also have to consider the suggestion and allegation made by the accused. You must remember that when an accused alleges he made a confession under inducement and threat from persons in authority, the onus is on him to prove the allegation. It is not of course possible to prove such allegations even if they were true."

The first difficulty is to determine what is the meaning of the word "provisionally." As far as I can see the learned Judge has not himself determined whether the confession was voluntary or not. He says the Magistrate has found it so and so he admits it "provisionally."

Reading the whole of the paragraph beginning with :

"I have therefore admitted the confession in evidence and have provisionally answered the first question. It is for you to determine whether the confession is true or not. You will have to consider the circumstances in which it was made. You will also have to consider the suggestions and allegations made by the accused. You must remember that when an accused alleges that he made a confession under inducement and threat from persons in authority the onus is upon him to prove the allegations. It is not of course possible to prove such allegations even if they were true," the conclusion to which I have come is that the learned Judge left it to the jury to determine whether it was or was not voluntarily made and in other words was it admissible. This is the only way in which I can attach any meaning to the expression "provisionally." If that is so the Judge has been guilty of a serious error of law for it was for him and not for the jury to determine its admissibility. The Judge has committed a further error in directing the jury. He has told them that the accused must prove any threat or inducement but that it is impossible to prove such allegation even if true.

In other words, that the law places on the accused a burden which it is impossible for him to discharge. In other words that an accused person can never prove that a confession is not voluntary.

The proposition requires only to be stated to be rejected.

It is not necessary for me in dealing with this point to decide whether the onus of proving that a confession is voluntary is on the accused or the prosecution. The point is not free from controversy.

Supposing, however, for the sake of argument that the burden was on the accused it was a clear misdirection to tell the jury that the accused could not possibly discharge this onus. It might no doubt be difficult, in some case very difficult but it is not always impossible and to tell the jury so is a grave misdirection. It has been suggested that in this case the accused never attempted to substantiate the allegation by evidence. Perhaps he did not but it would be still open to him to show that the circumstance under which it was made would justify the inference that it was obtained by threat or inducement.

It is to be remembered that the expression used in S. 24, Evidence Act, is not 'proved' but "if it appears" which is not a strong expression as proved. Bearing in mind that this confession is the sole evidence against the accused I must hold that there has been such serious misdirection in dealing with it as would be fatal to the trial.

If the Judge had determined that it was not voluntary his duty was to tell the jury that there was no evidence against the accused and direct a verdict of not guilty.

We must therefore set aside the verdict of the jury and the order of the Judge. Whether the appellant should be retried we leave to the decision of the Local Authorities.

S. K. Ghose, J.—I agree.

Criminal P. C., Ss. 276, 279 — To make up for the deficiency in number of jurors to be empanelled, requisition of persons from outside Court is improper.

There is no provision for requisition of jurors from outside the Court. Selection of jurors will have to be made from jurors attending in obedience to summons and chosen in the manner provided by S. 276 or if there is no such other juror present then any other person present in the Court, whose name is on the list of the jurors or whom the Court considers a proper person may be selected.

D. N. Bhattacharjee—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case eight accused persons were convicted by the Additional Sessions Judge of Mymensingh and a jury of seven on charges under S. 302 read with S. 34, I. P. C. The jury were not unanimous, four of them being in favour of a conviction and three in favour of an acquittal.

On this appeal Mr. Suhrawardy takes the point that according to the order of the learned Judge himself the jury was empanelled in a manner which is contrary to law and which is entirely outside the scope of Ss. 276 and 279, Criminal P. C. The learned Judge has recorded :

"The names of all the 14 jurors who were summoned for the case were called by lot one after another. Nine of them were found present of whom three being challenged by the pleader for the defence, were discharged. Six being unchallenged were elected to sit at the trial. Another person whose name was on the juror's special list was therefore requisitioned from the local school to sit as a juror and being unchallenged was accepted as the 7th juror. They then elected their foreman and were duly sworn."

If the learned Judge would look again at Ss. 276 and 279 he will find that there is no provision for requisition of jurors from a local school or from anywhere else. He will find that selection will have to be made from jurors attending in obedience to summons and chosen in the manner provided by S. 276 or if there is no such other juror present then any other person present in the Court, whose name is on the list of jurors or whom the Court considers a proper person to serve on the jury may be selected. I think the learned Judge was wrong in acting in contravention of the provisions of the section and in inventing a procedure which is entirely unauthorized. It is quite true that the person whose services were obtained must at some stage have complied with the condition of being present and it is a point to consider whether or not the requirement of being present in Court finds its place in the section with any intention to limit the arbitrary power to choose a juror entrusted to the learned Judge or whether it merely recognizes the fact that in the ordinary way a person not present will be of no immediate assistance as a juror. This matter has been more than once considered. I understand from Mr. Bhattacharjee that there are four unreported cases of this Court on this point and two of them have been placed before us. They all hold this procedure to be bad.

In these circumstances, it appears to me that we have no option but to enforce the principle that the jurors are to be empanelled as required by the sections.

The appeal must be allowed. The convictions and sentences are set aside and a retrial is ordered.

We make no order as to bail.

N. K. Basu and Tarapada Banerjee for D. N. Bhattacharjee—for Petitioners.

Judgment.—The accused were convicted and sentenced on certain proceedings under S. 109, Criminal P. C., taken against them. The Sessions Judge sustained the conviction against the petitioners, and the present Rule has been issued on the ground that the provisions of S. 109 would have no application to the facts as found in this case; that there was no concealment as contemplated by the section, because they gave true information to the police as to their names and addresses when questioned; and that it could not be said they had failed to give a satisfactory account of themselves, merely because they did not give a satisfactory account of what they were doing at the time of their arrest.

The finding of the Sessions Judge is that the accused:

"failed to give a satisfactory account of themselves and were attempting to conceal their presence within the jurisdiction of the Magistrate and that they were taking such precautions with a view to commit an offence."

It appears from the facts found that P.W. No. 7, then an acting Inspector of Police, met the Sub-Inspector of Police of Kaliganj, and informed the latter that he had heard there was likelihood of further dacoities in his neighbourhood. This witness also said that one Kalimuddin (P.W. 8) gave him information that he had been approached by one of the accused to join in a dacoity but had refused. Kalimuddin corroborated that. Then it appears that after that, on 18th May, while enquiring into a dacoity case near by, the Sub-Inspector of Kaliganj found the present accused all proceeding together towards a place called Aditmeari along the railway line. The Sub-Inspector therefore questioned them, and the evidence is that the accused or some of them, gave an account of where they were going, and for what reason, which was in some particulars at any rate demonstrated to be false, whereupon the story was changed. They were then all asked their names and what village they came from, to which it appears they replied with correct information. Three others of the accused gave a confused and shifting explanation of where they were going, and others gave replies of an extremely improbable and suspicious nature. One of the accused had a bottle of kerosine oil, a piece of bamboo and some rags, and the explanation regarding these was said to be shifty, and in certain respects demonstrated to be false by the evidence.

On the face of the above it is difficult to maintain that the accused were attempting to conceal their presence within the meaning of S. 109. They were residents within the jurisdiction and gave not false but true information as to their names and addresses. Then, although the District Magistrate points out that there are certain other considerations as to the contradictions in their statements, the decisions of this Court follow the principle that S. 109 (a) refers to the case of a continuous act and not the case of an isolated effort at concealment: see Rashu Kabiraj v. Emperor (1); Piru v. Emperor (2). The question of the accused's liability on this ground must be decided in their favour. As to the other ground, their having failed to give a satisfactory account of themselves, the facts found are undoubtedly more against the accused, but it is difficult to say that the facts are stronger than in the above case of Rashu v. Emperor (1), where a man who was a Kabiraj and a dealer was found in association with two others at midnight and with house-breaking implements in their possession: on being discovered he fled and when arrested remained silent and the explanation he subsequently gave to the Magistrate was false. It was held that he was not within S. 109. On these grounds therefore the Rule is made absolute.

(a) Railways Act, Ss. 113 and 122—Mere bonafide belief that a person is trespasser or that he is travelling without ticket is not sufficient to justify arrest—More than that must be proved.

To justify an arrest without a warrant much more than trespass or travelling without ticket would be necessary. In the case of trespass it must be shown that there was reason to believe that the person to be arrested would abscond or that his name and address were unknown and he refused to give his name and address or that there was reason to believe that the name or address given to him was incorrect. In the case of travelling without ticket it must further be shown that there was refusal to pay the sum charged.

B. C. Chatterjee and Suresh Ch. Taluqdar—for Petitioner.

N. K. Bose, Asitaranjan Ghose and Hemendra Nath Bose—for Opposite Party.

Order.—The petitioner is the District Traffic Superintendent on the Eastern Bengal Railway at Dacca. He has been convicted under S. 342, I. P. C. and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs 15.

The finding of fact on which his conviction is based is that the complainant Sudhir Mohan Ghose and a companion of his, two school boys, were caught by the petitioner near the overbridge on the platform of the My-mensingh Railway Station and then taken to the exit gate and made over to ticket collector there. What followed after this is of no use so far as the questions before me are concerned. What preceded the event is relevant from the point of view of both the parties and the finding on that question, therefore, has also to be examined. The defence case was that the petitioner noticed the complainant amongst 5 or 6 persons proceeding towards the exit gate, and when he challenged the complainant he understood the latter to say in reply that he had no ticket, and as a train had just been in he asked the ticket collector to treat the complainant as one who had travelled without a ticket; that he noticed another boy with a bicycle and told the ticket collector to check his ticket also. The complainant's case was that the petitioner met him and his companion near the overbridge, having come up from behind, that the petitioner asked them for their tickets, and notwithstanding that the complainant replied that they would be travelling by the train which had just come in and were going to purchase their tickets the petitioner seized their hands and dragged them to the ticket collector and asked him to realize the fare from the starting terminus Naraingunj up to My-mensingh.

Of these rival versions it is the complainant's story substantially which the learned Magistrate was prepared to accept. He accepted the evidence to the effect that the complainant and his companion entered the platform from the western extremity and entry into the platform from that side was prohibited. He, however, dealt with the case on either footing and held that even on the assumption that they came by the train and the petitioner arrested them after questioning the complainant whether they had tickets or not and after hearing what the complainant told him, the legal consequence was the same.

Against the conviction several grounds have been urged and it would be convenient to deal with them one by one.

The first ground is to the effect that the petitioner may have been mistaken in fact. In my opinion it is possible that he did make such a mistake and that he bona fide believed that the complainant and his companion were either trespassers or that they had alighted from the train and were attempting to evade the checking. This is the most favourable view that may be taken of the petitioner's acts and it will be reasonable and fair to deal with the case on that footing.

It is next said that S. 79, I. P. C. protects the petitioner. But mistake on his part will not protect the petitioner unless he is able to establish that the facts that he assumed would justify him in catching the hands of the complainant and his companion and thus taking them from near the overbridge to the exit gate. S. 122, Railways Act, would make the entry punishable if it was unlawful (Cl. 1) and a refusal to leave the premises on being requested to do so after an unlawful entry would aggravate the trespass (Cl. 2). S. 113 would justify the charging of the requisite fare in the case of travelling without a pass or ticket or with insufficient pass or ticket or beyond the authorized distance. To justify an arrest, however, without a warrant, much more than trespass or travelling without ticket would be necessary. In the case of trespass, it will have to be shown that there was reason to believe that the person to be arrested would abscond or that his name and address were unknown and he refused to give his name and address or that there was reason to believe that the name or address given by him was incorrect. In the case of travelling without ticket it will further have to be shown that there was refusal to pay the sum charged. None of these elements has been established in the present case.

Then it is said that it has been found that there was no protest by the complainant and that no force had to be used. This only means that there was submission to the arrest and that does not detract from the petitioner's act or diminishes its legal effect. The complainant and his companion were made to go in a particular direction up to a certain point namely up to the exit gate. That the compelling of a person to go in a particular direction by force of an exterior will overpowering or suppressing in any way his own voluntary action is an imprisonment on the part of him who exercises that exterior will is a proposition that cannot be disputed: Parankusan v. Stuart (1).

The other two arguments that have been advanced are that the offence, if any, was too trivial and that good faith protects the petitioner. I regret I am unable to take such a view of the petitioner's act as would justify the application of S. 95, I. P. C.; and as for good faith, mens rea does not enter into this offence at all.

The rule is discharged.

A. K. Roy and N. C. Chatterji—for Appellant.

S. M. Bose and B. K. Ghosh—for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case it appears that one Elie Goldberg was the defendant with two others in a suit brought by the mortgagee upon a covenant in an English mortgage for Rs. 15,000 plus interest. It appears that a certain colliery property was the mortgaged subject and the claimant sued for a personal judgment for Rs. 29,508.8.0. The suit was filed a few days ago, namely, on 13th August 1928. On 14th August, the plaintiff applied for the arrest of the defendant, Elie Goldberg, under O. 38, R. 1, on the ground that he was about to leave the jurisdiction, with intent to delay the plaintiff or to avoid the process of the Court and to obstruct and defeat the execution of any decree that might be passed against him.

"to demand and receive from Elie Goldberg a sum of Rs. 10,000 as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim in this suit and, unless the said sum of Rs. 10,000 is forthwith delivered to him by or on behalf of the said defendant Elie Goldberg, to take the said defendant, Elie Goldberg, into custody and to bring him before this Court, in order that he may show cause why he should not furnish security to the extent of Rs. 10,000 for his personal appearance before this Court whenever called upon to do so until the said suit shall be fully and finally disposed of and until satisfaction of any decree that may be passed against him in this suit."

Now it will be observed that the first portion of that warrant is merely to say that if, when the Sheriff arrests the man, the man hands over Rs. 10,000 that is to be deemed to be payment of the claim and the Sheriff is not to arrest the defendant Elie Goldberg, and that is what is intended by R. 1, O. 38. In this case, when the Sheriff arrested the man, he did not pay Rs. 10,000 and the Sheriff did not get Rs. 10,000. Consequently the Sheriff arrested him. The second part of this warrant, which is a notice to Elie Goldberg, says in effect that the Sheriff is to take him in custody and bring him before the Court in order that he may show cause why he should not furnish security to the extent of Rs. 10,000 for his personal appearance. I leave aside the other words, which merely indicate that the appearance is to be appearance at any stage of the suit up to the full satisfaction of the claim in execution.

In these circumstances, the matter came before the learned Judge on the original side and he has made an order in terms, it is quite true, of O. 38, to the effect that he is to deposit with the Registrar money or property sufficient to answer the claim (which is not for Rs. 10,000 but for Rs. 29,508-8-0) or to give security for his appearance at any time in accordance with O. 38, R. 2. O. 38, R. 2 says that the defendant is to furnish security for his appearance and that :

"every surety for the appearance of a defendant shall bind himself, in default of such appearance, to pay any sum of money which the defendant may be ordered to pay in the suit."

The result is that the effect of the order of the learned Judge is that the man must either deposit Rs. 29,508-8-0 or he is to get a surety who will be responsible that if the man makes default in appearance he will pay the whole amount of the claim. Now that is, it is quite true, what O. 38 authorizes the learned Judge to do. But it is not what by this warrant the defendant was given notice of as the relief that was to be sought against him. I am of opinion that, in these circumstances, it is more correct to hold the plaintiff to the terms of the notice in the warrant which has been issued by the Court. While in no way expressing surprise at the terms of the order of the learned Judge which followed the statute, I am of opinion that in this case the form of the warrant taken out by the plaintiff makes it more proper that the sum should be limited to Rs. 10,000. When one looks at O. 38, R. 2 and form 2, Appx. F, one does not find it contemplated that the defendant, on failing to make deposit, is to give security for appearance in a particular sum to be fixed by the Judge, but that, if this security takes the form of a bond by a surety, it is to be the whole amount of the decree. If the defendant can give security himself, he will give it for the claim by deposit of money or property. Otherwise he will get some one to go bail for his appearance. That is I think the scheme of O. 38. The only thing which is required by form 2 is that the surety engages with the Court that the man shall appear and, if, the man does not appear, the surety promises to be answerable for any judgment that may be made in the suit. I do not think the form given by the statute is at all the same thing as the order which in this case sought against the defendants according to the warrant.

I would, therefore direct that Elie Goldberg shall be at liberty to give security to the satisfaction of the Registrar on the original side in terms of form No. 2, Appx. F, but limited to the amount of Rs. 10,000, and that until he gives that security he must remain in jail. There will be no order as to costs.

B B. Ghose, J. — Appeal No. 3 of 1929 is directed against an order made by the learned District Judge asking for security from the petitioner for probate to the extent of Rs. 10,000. An objection is taken to the competency of the appeal on the ground that it is not a final order. I think that the preliminary objection is substantial and that no appeal lies against that order. It is, accordingly, dismissed.

Appeal No. 42 is against the final order made by the Judge striking off the application for probate. This amounts to a dismissal of the application. The case was struck off on two grounds that the probate duty was not paid and that the security was not furnished within one month as allowed by the learned Judge. The probate duty, we are told, could not be paid, because the Collector had not finished his work with regard to the valuation of the estate. So long as the Collector did not send his report as regards the valuation of the property, the executor was not in a position to ascertain the exact amount that he had to pay, and, therefore, he had not paid the probate duty. With regard to the question of security, it is urged on behalf of the appellant that the learned Judge was wrong in ordering security from an executor named under the will, especially as under para. 9 of the will the testator said that the executors would be able to obtain probate of the will without security. Ordinarily I should have thought that it is not the function of the Judge to distrust an executor and ask for security from a person whom the testator trusted to the extent as the testator in this case has done. No doubt under S. 291 (ii) (b) the District Judge has a discretion to ask for security from an executor. The learned advocate for the respondent relies on the case of Juggodishari Debi, In re (1) and Mahamaya Debi v. Gangamoyi Debi (2) in support of his contention that the District Judge in his discretion could ask for such security. In neither of those cases it appears that there was any provision in the will that the executor could obtain probate without any security. But it would appear from the cases that where the executor is the sole legatee, if the District Judge thinks it necessary to take any bond, the security fixed must be a nominal sum. In the present case, the learned Judge has asked for security on the ground that there are certain trusts created by the will. The trust is (1) in favour of some idols and (2) for some charities. With regard to the idols, the appellant executrix is now the shebait and as such, she need not furnish any security for the debuttar property. With regard to the charities, it may be that the Court may in its discretion ask for security assuming that in spite of the desire of the testator the Court may ask for such security. The trust for charities is to the extent of Rs. 3,000 and we think that it would be quite sufficient if the executrix executes an administration-bond with a surety for Rs. 1,000.

The order of the learned Judge striking off the application is set aside and we direct that probate be issued to the appellant executrix on her paying the requisite duty after the report of the valuation is made by the Collector after which a reasonable time should be granted to her and on her executing an administration-bond with a surety for Rs. 1,000.

There will be no order as to costs in either of the appeals.

No order is necessary on the application filed on 20th December 1928.

Appln. in Appeal of 1928, Decided on 5th September 1928, from the decree, D/- 16th May 1928, in Original Civil Suit No. 1869 of 1926.

Limitation Act, Art. 151—Decree of High Court on original side—Period required for drawing up decree, on plaintiff's application made within four days, cannot be charged to defendant-appellant.

The right to file a requisition for drawing up a decree in the High Court on the original side is primarily plaintiff's and where he has filed the requisition within four days, the period required by the plaintiff for drawing up the decree should be excluded in favour of the defendant in computing the period of limitation for his appeal against the decree, when he has been otherwise diligent: A. I. R. 1929 P. C. 103, Ref. [P 735 C 2]

N. N. Bose—for Appellant.

N. C. Chatterji for B. K. Ghosh—for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an application that a memorandum of appeal be accepted and registered, the memorandum having been rejected by the office as being out of time. It appears that the decree was pronounced on 16th May 1928 in favour of the plaintiff. Now, on the next day, the plaintiff filed a requisition for drawing up the decree, so that the appellant-defendant never became entitled or obliged to exercise the right of putting in another requisition for drawing up the decree. The right accrues to him only if the plaintiff for four days omits to file the requisition for drawing up the decree. The requisition for drawing up the decree having been filed on 17th May the drawing up of the decree proceeded in the ordinary course, with this exception that although the draft decree was issued on 22nd May 1928, the appellant did not return it approved until 5th June 1928. On 5th June, the defendant, for the first time, filed a requisition for obtaining an office copy of the decree. As to that, I may point out that the appellant's solicitor took a great risk, because, on the decisions of this Court, it would seem that time does not cease to count against him until he files a requisition for an office copy. The time prior to that was occupied in getting the decree drawn up. At the same time, it is perfectly true that until there is a decree there cannot be a copy of it and from 17th May until 5th June the time might very well be counted in the defendant's favour, had he only filed his requisition sooner. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that from 16th May till 5th June exhausts the whole 20 days, to which the defendant was entitled, it remains to consider whether there is any other time that must be charged against him. As a matter of fact, the memorandum of appeal was filed on the very day the office copy of the decree was ready for delivery. The only way, therefore, in which the defendant can be out of time would be in respect of the period between 19th June, when the decree was sent to be ledgered and 9th July, when the decree was filed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff certainly did take unnecessary time, but the question is whether that can be charged against the defendant, whether he is not entitled to say that, as the requisition for drawing up the decree was filed by the plaintiff, the defendant was not called upon to interfere in the process of the drawing up of the decree. It cannot be doubted that, if the defendant had insisted upon the decree being filed, it might have been filed sooner than it was. At the same time, I see no negligence on the part of the defendant. Indeed, I am satisfied that the defendant was keeping watch and making enquiry at the office diligently. I have some doubt whether by making any casual enquiry at the office he would be able to ascertain what the cause of the delay was. I am, therefore, of opinion that no part of the time occupied by the plaintiff in getting the decree drawn up can be charged to the defendant for the present purpose. The last occasion on which this matter came under review was the case of Jijibhoy N. Surty v. T. S. Chettyar (1) and Lord Phillimore, in giving the judgment of the Board, said:

"But for that time which is taken up by his opponent in drawing up the decree, or by the officials of the Court in preparing and issuing the two documents he"

that is the appellant "is not responsible."

I do not mean to doubt for one moment the settled practice and the principle of this Court that a person cannot by merely filing a requisition for an office copy and failing to take steps to get the decree drawn up, become entitled to exclude the time that has been wasted. But in this case, I am of opinion that the defendant is not out of time and, if he is out of time, it is not on account of his negligence, and the time should be extended if necessary.

In these circumstances I think that the memorandum of appeal should be accepted and registered.

Costs of this application will be costs in the appeal.

Order.—The petitioner in these two rules applied to set aside two sales of certain properties under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C. In one of the rules the property in question was sold in execution of a decree for arrears of rent, obtained by decree-holder opposite party for Rs. 73 and odd. The value of this property was found by the Munsif to be Rs. 1,600. The decree-holder was the auction purchaser. The property in question in the other rule was sold for Rs. 32 and odd and the value of the said property was found by the Munsif to be Rs. 386 and odd. The purchaser in this case also was the decree-holder in a suit for arrears of rent. The petitioner alleged non-service of sale proclamation and suppression of all processes in connexion with the same and fraud and material irregularity in conducting and publishing the sales. The petitioner applied within 30 days from the date on which he first came to know of the sales.
The Munsif held that there was no evidence worth the name on the side of the decree-holder to show that the writ of attachment and sale proclamation were served on the auction sold lands in these cases. He pointed out that Abdul Kader, Nobin Sing and Jabbar Ali who are said to have pointed out the lands sold at the time of the service of the writ of attachment and sale proclamation have not been examined. The Munsif further found that it has not been established in the case that the advertisement of the sales in question in the "Tripura Hitaishi" was seen by the petitioner. He found that the applications were presented within 30 days of the dates when the petitioner came to know of the sales and he held that the petitioner has suffered substantial injury as the result of the material irregularity and fraud in publishing and conducting the sales. The Munsif set aside the sales.

The decree-holder auction purchaser preferred two appeals against the order setting aside the sales to the Court of the Subordinate Judge and the learned Subordinate Judge held that the applications were barred by limitation and that there was no fraud and irregularity in publishing and conducting the sale as the processes were properly served. He held, however, that the prices fetched by the sale were certainly inadequate but as there were no fraud or irregularity the sale could not be set aside.
The Subordinate Judge accordingly confirmed the sales.

These two rules were obtained for the revision of the appellate order of the Subordinate Judge in both the applications for setting aside the sales. It is contended for the petitioner that the Subordinate Judge has exercised his jurisdiction with material irregularity in holding that the processes were properly served although the most important witnesses on whose identification Adhar, the identifier, was said to have served the sale proclamation and writ of attachment have not been examined. It is argued that the identifier's deposition shows that he did not know the property sold himself and that he had to take the help of a man of the locality for the identification of the properties in question. It seems singular that the Subordinate Judge would in the absence of the most material witnesses who identified the lands should hold that there had been a proper service. The Subordinate

Judge failed to realize that when properties were sold for a grossly inadequate price and an application is made to set aside the sales, it is the duty of the final Court of fact to scrutinize with great care the evidence of service and to require the best evidence of such service. The evidence of service of the sale and attachment processes on which the Subordinate Judge relied is the evidence of a person who did not know the land on which he was effecting the service and such evidence is indeed absolutely valueless, in the absence of the evidence of persons on whose identification the identifier acted. To base a judgment on such evidence is a material irregularity in the exercise of the Court's Appellate Jurisdiction and vitiates his judgment on the important question of fact as to whether the services were properly effected. It has been strenuously contended by Mr. Akhil Chandra Dutt that I have no jurisdiction under S. 115, Civil P. C., to interfere with findings of fact. That would indeed be so if the finding of fact had been properly arrived at i.e., arrived at on a scrutiny of all relevant evidence and after consideration of the presumption to be drawn against the decree-holder from the non-examination of persons who are the most immaterial witnesses to prove the identification of the lands on which the law requires the service of processes to be effected.

The learned Judge of the appellate Court misdirected himself on the question of fact in not drawing unfavourable inferences against the regularity of the sales from the decree-holder withholding from the witness-box the witnesses who alone could have identified the land. The lower appellate Court misdirected himself in not considering the circumstances that the inadequacy of price fetched by sales in these two cases was so great as to shock the conscience and such inadequacy was itself valuable evidence of fraud in publishing and conducting the sales. There is another misdirection in point of law on the question of the knowledge of the petitioner of the dates of the sales. The learned Subordinate Judge assumes that merely because the petitioner was subscriber of the "Tripura Hitaishi" he must have read the sale notification. The law requires, however, that in order that a notification in a newspaper may amount to actual notice to a subscriber of the said newspaper, it must be shown that his attention was drawn to the said notification. The finding on the question of limitation is vitiated by the Courts imputing notice to the petitioner by reason of his being the subscriber of the newspaper "Tripura Hitaishi." I think that justice required that before the sale could be confirmed the decree-holder auction purchaser should have produced all material witnesses of service of the sale and attachment processes and the Munsif was right in setting aside the sales in the absence of such evidence. The order of the lower appellate Court must in the circumstances be set aside and that of the Munsif restored. The result is that the sales are set aside.

The rules are made absolute with costs one gold mohur in each case which the decree-holder auction purchaser must pay to the petitioner.

Jury Ref. No. 32 of 1929, Decided on 8th August 1929, made by Sess. Judge, Bakarganj.

Criminal P. C., S. 307—Reference under S. 307 is not justified unless verdict of jury is manifestly wrong and definitely contrary to weight of evidence.

It is not contemplated that a Sessions Judge, who does not happen to agree with the verdict of a jury, should necessarily make a reference to the High Court, especially where pure questions of fact are involved, which are matters for the decision of the jury and the jury alone. It is no justification for a reference that the Sessions Judge came to a different conclusion, on the evidence tendered, from that of the jury unless there is something to show that the verdict of the jury was manifestly wrong and definitely contrary to the weight of the evidence. Whether a particular witness is to be believed or not is a question for the jury. [P 738 C 1]

Radhika Ranjan Guha and Sitangsu Bhusan Bose—for Accused.

Graham, J.—This is a reference by the learned Sessions Judge of Bakarganj under S. 307, Criminal P. C., against the verdict of the jury in a case in which four persons were charged with offences under Ss. 467 and 471, I. P. C. One of these persons Milanjan Bibi was acquitted by the Judge in agreement with the unanimous verdict of the jury. The verdict of the jury as regards the remaining three accused was by a majority of 3 : 2 that they were not guilty of the offences charged. The learned Sessions Judge finding himself unable to agree with the verdict has referred the case to this Court. In para. 3 of his letter of reference he says that he is of opinion that the verdict both as regards the fact of forgery and the verdict as regards Raham Ali are not, as he expresses it, in accordance with the evidence. I should like to point out at the outset that this appears to indicate some misconception of his duty on the part of the learned Sessions Judge. It is not contemplated that a Sessions Judge, who does not happen to agree with the verdict of a jury, should necessarily make a reference to this Court, especially where pure questions of fact are involved, which are matters for the decision of the jury and the jury alone. The ground upon which this reference really seems to rest is that the learned Sessions Judge came to a conclusion on the evidence which was different from that arrived at by the jury. But that as I have already said cannot furnish any justification for a reference under S. 307 unless there is something to show that the verdict of the jury was manifestly wrong and definitely contrary to the weight of the evidence.

The learned Sessions Judge in his letter while inviting us to discard the evidence of certain witnesses on the ground that they cannot be relied upon has expressed the opinion that the case has been satisfactorily proved by the evidence of three witnesses. In para. 5 of his letter he says that :

"In my opinion the evidence of these three witnesses is sufficient to prove satisfactorily that the deed in question in this case is a forgery."

Now the three witnesses in question are P. W. 8, who is a stamp vendor named Munshi Mobarak Ali, P. W. 2 Taher Ali Howladar and P. W. 1, a handwriting expert named Henry Bennett.

It is necessary to examine briefly the evidence of these witnesses in order to see how far they substantiate the view which has been taken by the learned Judge. The stamp vendor merely proved that he sold a piece of stamp paper to one Ismail Meah on behalf of the deceased Aminuddin Howladar on 10th Magh 1334 B. S. (24th January 1928). This in itself has little or no evidentiary value. Then as to witness 2 for the prosecution the statement of this witness is that he saw accused 2 at the Registration office writing a document and that he was asked to be an attesting witness which he refused. No doubt this witness claims to identify the document but it does not seem very probable that he would be able to do so on such a cursory view of it, or that he would be able to identify it with any certainty. The learned Sessions Judge moreover in his charge while dealing with this witness has himself criticized his evidence. He says that there are minor discrepancies as to date and time between the evidence of this witness and the evidence of P. W. 3. He also refers to the fact that the complaint does not contain any allegation that witness 2 for the prosecution saw the deed written. In any view of the matter the question whether this witness was to be believed or not was a question for the jury. The witness was before them and they had an opportunity to see his demeanour and no doubt formed their own opinion as to his truthfulness.

As regards witness 3, the handwriting expert, so far as he is concerned the value of his evidence is entirely dependent upon accepting it as proved that the sale-deed Ex. 1 is a genuine document. The evidence of this witness proceeds upon the footing that if the first document is genuine then the second document the deed of gift is undoubtedly false and a forgery. But it so happens that the proof of the first document, the sale-deed, is dependent upon the evidence of P. W. 3 Osimaddi, and Osimaddi is one of the batch of witnesses whom the learned Judge has himself considered to be unreliable. The proof of the sale-deed is dependent on the evidence of Osimaddi, and it is a suspicious circumstance in connexion with that document that the attesting witnesses have not been produced and that no attempt has been made to prove the payment of consideration.

Having regard to the nature therefore of this evidence and to all the facts and circumstances we find ourselves unable to accept this reference and we think that the jury were justified in finding by a majority that the guilt of the accused had not been established and in bringing in a verdict of not guilty.

We accordingly reject this reference and acquit the accused. The accused will be set at liberty, and if they are on bail they will be discharged from their bail bonds.

Suhrawardy, J.—This is an open rule for revising the order of the Sub-Divisional officer of Ghatal under S. 110 (a) read with S. 118, Criminal P. C. confirmed by the Additional Sessions Judge of Midnapore. Two points which have been stressed before us and require consideration are, first, that the proceeding drawn up under S. 112, Criminal P. C. is illegal and secondly that the learned Judge has misread the evidence of some of the prosecution witnesses when he says that they deposed to the fact of having direct knowledge of the petitioner committing theft.

As regards the first point it is urged that the notice under S. 112, Criminal P. C., was vague inasmuch as it did not set forth the substance of the information received against the petitioner. S. 112 says that the Magistrate shall make an order in writing setting forth the substance of the information. The proceeding drawn up by the Magistrate a copy of which was served on the petitioner was in these words:

"Whereas it appears from the report dated 28th February 1928, submitted by Sub Inspector of Police Station, Chandragona that Bhut-nath Ghose, son of etc., within the local limits of my jurisdiction is by habit a thief, a robber and house-breaker and is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community etc."

It may be incidentally noted that the petitioner was found not guilty of the charge of being a desperate and dangerous character; he has been bound down only under S. 110 (a) for being by habit a thief, robber and house-breaker. It is argued that the notice served upon the petitioner merely repeated the words of the section and did not give the substance of the information upon which the Magistrate acted as required by S. 112. It is contended on the authority of Ranga Reddi v. Emperor (1) and Emperor v. Nihal (2) that the notice was insufficient and vague as it merely quoted the words of the section and did not mention the particulars of the information received by the Magistrate. With great respect to the learned Judges who decided those cases I am unable to agree with the interpretation there put on the words "substance of the information" in S. 112. The learned Judges require that the notice should contain such details of information as to enable the accused to know in what cases he has been suspected and the names of the witnesses to prove the charges against him. This, to my mind is not "substance of the information" but details of information which may in some cases be not only very inconvenient but almost impracticable to put in the notice. A person may be suspected in a hundred cases and there may be five hundred witnesses to prove such suspicion and general repute. It is not reasonable to suppose that the law intended that all this information should be conveyed in the notice. If the notice states that the accused has been suspected in a hundred cases and there are five hundred witnesses to support the charge against him, it will not be of any practical help to him. There may be cases in which the substance of the information should be briefly conveyed to him if feasible as, probably, under S. 107 but ordinarily it cannot be insisted that any detailed information, however shortly it may be conveyed, should be supplied by the notice. In my opinion, the words "substance of the information" mean such or so much of the information as would enable the party to know under what clause of S. 110 he is charged or to what particular class of offenders he is said to belong. For instance, in this particular case he is said to be by habit a robber, house-breaker and thief but not a forger. Under Cl. (d), S. 110, he may be by habit an abettor of the commission of the offences of kidnapping, abduction, etc. The notice should specify as to which offence or offences mentioned in the clause he is said to be by habit an abettor. I concede that where possible the repetition of the words of the section should be avoided but, it may not be possible in every case. We have authorities of this Court in support of this view. In Chintaman Singh v. Emperor (3) the notice was in similar words as in the section. It was held that the notice was good though it did not contain more information than that the accused was of a dangerous and desperate character. Similar objection was taken in Rajendra Narain Singh v. Emperor (4). It is observed at p. 261 "the Magistrate is further not bound to reveal the source of his information"; it is sufficient if he states the substance thereof and the Crown is not bound at the initial stage even to name the witnesses. This section is intended to meet such a case as arose in Queen Empress v. Ishwar Chandra Sur (5) where the notice did not mention under what clause of which section the accused was called upon to defend himself under Chap. 8. Even if it be held that it was necessary to give more information in the notice the omission at the most is an irregularity under S. 537 and should not vitiate the entire proceedings without proof of prejudice to the accused. I do not agree with the learned Judges of the Madras High Court that it is an illegality.

Though I hold that the law is satisfied if the notice contains the gist of the information and not a reference to cases and witnesses, proceedings under Chap. 8 should not be carried on in such a way as to hamper the offender in his defence and place him in a worse position than if he were accused of a substantive offence. Before he defends himself himself by cross-examining the witnesses for the prosecution and examining his own he must know definitely the case that he has been called upon to meet. When the accused appears and prays for information about the evidence which the Crown proposes to adduce against him it should be supplied or so much of it as is practicable. This may be done in two ways. He may be given sufficient information of the evidence to be called or he may be allowed to reserve cross-examination till he has full information about the case against him. Now in this case, as the petitioner alleges in his petition, he asked from the prosecution information about the witnesses intended to be examined but it was refused. He then asked for permission to reserve cross-examination of witnesses as he had the right to do but that too was refused. As soon as a witness was placed in the box and examined he was asked to cross-examine him without knowing the whole case for the Crown and without having time to collect materials for the cross-examination of the witness and giving proper instruction to his lawyer. One need hardly refer to the inconvenience and practical inutility of instructing the cross-examining pleader from the dock. As the procedure to be followed in the case was to be that prescribed for trial of warrant cases, it was improper to call upon the petitioner to cross-examine the witnesses then and there who were immediately discharged. The trying Magistrate submits in his explanation that the petitioner could have applied for recalling the witnesses under S. 256, Criminal P. C., and not having done so he cannot now complain of prejudice.

I am not impressed by this argument for the petitioner's prayer for reserving cross-examination having been refused he had no hope that his prayer for recalling witnesses would have been granted. Besides, as has been held by the Additional Sessions Judge, it seems to be the opinion of the Courts below that S. 256 is not applicable to proceedings under S. 110 for reasons not discussed but apparently as no charge is to be framed. In view of the procedure adopted by the trial Magistrate I cannot say that the petitioner was not prejudiced in his defence. When a right is conferred by law on a party, it may be presumed that it is for his benefit; if such right is denied him it may also be presumed that he has been deprived of that benefit. It is not such a clear case in which I can honestly say that the evidence for the prosecution is so overwhelming that it will be futile to order a retrial. The defence examined 28 witnesses one of whom was the local zemindar, pleader and Chairman of the Midnapore District Board. Of all the witnesses examined for or against, he is the most respectable and his evidence supports the defence case. Though the learned Judge has attempted to explain away his evidence by observing that he does not ordinarily live in the village but the fact is that he is the local zemindar and often visits the village which is within a few miles of the town of Midnapore. It is hard to suppose that if the petitioner bears the character and the repute which he is said to do, the witness would have been ignorant of it. I do not mean to suggest that on the evidence as it stands on the record the petitioner is entitled to an acquittal but I hold that the petitioner has made out a case that he has been prejudiced by the procedure adopted and that it is a proper case for our interference. I would therefore make the Rule absolute, set aside the order complained against him and direct that the petitioner be retried according to law.

As to the second ground I do not think there is much substance in it. By saying that some of the witnesses have direct knowledge of the petitioner's committing theft the learned Judge means to distinguish those witnesses from others who have given evidence of general repute. Though the word knowledge is not happily used, the witnesses have spoken to facts which led them to believe that the petitioner is a thief.

Graham, J.—I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brother, the conclusion at which I have arrived being that the Rule should be discharged.

The main point urged before us is that the proceeding drawn up under S. 112, Criminal P. C., is defective and contrary to law inasmuch as it does not embody the necessary materials required by that section. The section enacts that when a Magistrate acting under S. 110, Criminal P. C., deems it necessary to require any person to show cause, he shall make an order in writing setting forth :

(1) the substance of the information received ; (2) the amount of the bond to be executed ; (3) the term for which it is to be enforced ; and (4) the number, character, and class of the surety required.

The order in question contains all these matters. It has been argued that it is not a compliance with the sections to merely set forth the substance of the police report in terms of the language of S. 110 that the accused is by habit a thief, robber, and house-breaker, and that something more is required viz., particulars of the charge giving details of the cases in connexion with which the accused was charged or suspected on the previous occasions. In my opinion this contention is not well founded. The question is what is meant by "substance of the information." As I understand the words it means substance as distinguished from details or particulars, and I do not think that it was ever contemplated that the proceeding should set out details in the manner of a charge drawn up at a trial. The distinction between an inquiry of this nature and a trial should be borne in mind. I do not remember in my experience to have seen a proceeding in which particulars were set forth in the manner demanded by the petitioners.

The learned advocate for the petitioners has referred to Rajbansi v. Emperor (6) and Ranga Reddi v. Emperor (1) in support of his contention, but with all respect for the learned Judges who were responsible for them I am not prepared to follow those decisions. The learned advocate was unable to show any authority of this Court in favour of his proposition; on the other hand I find that there is a case reported in Chintamon v. Emperor (3) which supports the view I have taken.

It was next urged that the learned Additional Sessions Judge misread the evidence of P. W's. 1, 5, 6, 7, 11, 13, 16, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 35, 44, 46, 48, 61, 63, 71, 74 and 75 inasmuch as they did not state that they had direct knowledge of the petitioner Bhut Nath committing theft as stated in his judgment. The evidence of these witnesses has been referred to, and it is clear that, so far as some of these witnesses are concerned, the remark made by the learned Judge is incorrect. But the order ought not on that account to be set aside, if it is clear that the materials on record are sufficient to justify the order for security. As to that it appears to me that there is ample evidence. Some of these witnesses have given direct evidence of theft against the petitioner, and there is apart from that a considerable body of evidence of repute. On the merits the main question was whether the petitioner was the bad character he was represented by the prosecution to be, or whether it was a case of a village conspiracy to drive away an innocent person, who had made himself unpopular and obnoxious to the people of the village. The question of fact was one for the Magistrate to decide, and in my judgment there is sufficient evidence to support his decision. I would therefore discharge the Rule.

C. C. Ghose, J.—I have had an opportunity of examining the entire record and of perusing the two judgments of the learned Judges who have differed in this matter. I am in agreement with Subhawardy, J., in the view expressed by him and for the reasons given by him, I am of opinion that the ends of justice require that the order complained of should be set aside and the case sent back for retrial on the lines indicated by Subhawardy, J.

Nagendra Nath—Accused—Appellant.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Appeal No. 46 of 1929, Decided on 16th July 1929, from decision of Addl. Sess. Judge, Khulna.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 423—Trial by jury—Appeal—Appellate Court must consider adequacy of charge.

It is imperative that in every case of trial by jury and specially in murder cases, the High Court in appeal should be satisfied that the Judge's charge to the jury was adequate.

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 297—To avoid misdirection or non-direction Judge must give substantial help and guidance to jury by properly shifting and weighing evidence and by marshalling facts under distinct and separate heads.

To avoid any misdirection or non-direction of jury it is absolutely essential in proper cases that every particle of evidence should be carefully scrutinized and compared and contrasted and substantial help and guidance should be given to the jury to avoid any miscarriage of justice. It is not sufficient merely to recount and repeat chronologically the evidence as it had been given in Court by the various witnesses. It is necessary to sift and weigh and value the evidence. The final weighing is of course for the jury but the Judge ought to see that all essential facts go into the scales of justice and on the proper side of the balance. Further facts must be marshalled by the Judge under separate heads and in distinct compartments as they affect each separate incident in the story. Otherwise the evidence is to the jury simply a confused mass of discrepant, disconnected and contradictory details. [P 745 C 2; P 746 C 1]

(c) Criminal P. C., S. 297—So long as Judge makes it clear that jury are at liberty to regard or disregard his opinion it is not necessary that Judge should studiously avoid his opinion if any.

A charge to the jury which succeeds in avoiding any expression of opinion must generally amount to a most colourless and unhelpful direction and a Judge ought to tell the jury his opinion if any so long as he makes it clear they are at liberty to regard or disregard it as they please. [P 746 C 2]

Probodh Chandra Chatterjee and Surendra Nath Basu—for Appellant.

Bir Bhusan Dutt—for the Crown.

Lort-Williams, J.—The appellant was tried at Khulna by Mr. Simpson, the Additional Sessions Judge and a jury of seven convicted by their unanimous verdict of murdering Sita Nath Das on 15th June 1928, and on their plea for mercy sentenced to transportation for life.

There is no doubt that Sita Nath Das was murdered; the question is whether the appellant murdered him.

Sita Nath and one Manindra Nath were neighbouring shop-keepers at Kapilmuni. The appellant was Manindra's servant.

On the night of 15th June at about 9 p.m., Sitanath went to the shop of Kalibor Pramanik and there drank intoxicating liquor in the company of Manindra, Bansiram Pramanik, Mono Karmokar and Bhagoban Nath.

Sita Nath was going to Calcutta the next morning and had left his son-in-law Mono Mohan Das and his nephew Surendra Nath Das aged about 14 in his shop counting money which he needed to take with him.

He was not anxious to stay drinking, but Bansiram over-persuaded him and they all went on to the house of a prostitute named Susila where further drinking took place. At length Sita Nath escaped and set out for his shop. While on his way, some one coming out from underneath the thatch of a shop attacked him with a dagger, and after a short struggle in which Sita's left elbow and right wrist were injured, stabbed him in the abdomen, so severely that his entrails were exposed.

He shouted for help. In his dying declaration he says that he called for Upendra, Mojahar Gazi and others, held his hands to his wounded abdomen, and went to his shop. This was only a short distance away. Moni Mohun Das says that he heard Sita Nath shouting out that Nagen was killing him. Surendra Nath Das says that he heard Sita shout out "Moni, Suren come at once, Nagen is killing me." They understood him to mean the appellant. They ran out, Surendra with a hurricane lantern was first and says that he saw Nagendra running, and called after him and saw him enter Manindra's shop. It was a dark night and there was no moon. Surendra in cross-examination said that he told these facts to Mojahar, the Union Board Clerk, but he admits that he told the doctor only that his uncle had been stabbed without mentioning any name. Surendra also says that immediately prior to hearing Sita Nath's shouts he had heard Nagendra reading aloud his part in a theatrical performance, he being a member of theatrical troupe. Mani and Surendra say that they found Sitanath standing and holding his abdomen. He did not speak and they brought him to his shop, and having laid him on a taktaposh gave the alarm. Mojaharali Gazi, the clerk of the Kapilmuni Union Board came with others. He asked Sitanath what had happened and he said that it was the doing of Manindra. He could not say any more. Surendra and Mani confirm this. The doctor was sent for and when he came, he asked Sita Nath how he had got into that condition. Sita Nath then said that he had been drinking with Manindra, Bhagaban, Bashiram and Mona Kumar and on his return had been stabbed at Manindra's shop. The doctor then asked him who had stabbed him, and he indicated that he was in too great pain to say any more. After attending to him and giving him a stimulating draught the doctor and Mojahar left, the others including a number of neighbours remained.

Then it is said that Sitanath for the first time named Nagendra as his assailant. Mojahar says this was 10 or 15 minutes after the doctor left before he, Mojahar, returned. Moni says that this was after the doctor had gone, but seems to suggest that it was in the presence of Mojahar. Surendra does not make it clear when first the appellant's name was mentioned, but in cross-examination he said that the doctor was not present, and he suggests that Mojahar was. Mojahar says that on his return Sitanath said that Nagendra had struck him with a dagger; whether this was the first time the name had been mentioned is not clear, but it is evident from Mojahar's and the doctor's evidence that the doctor was not present and Mojahar in his cross-examination says that he was recalled by Moni who told him that the wounded man named his assailant. He also says that the compounder told him that Sita had said to him (the compounder) that Naga had stabbed him, and immediately afterwards Sita himself mentioned Naga's name in the hearing of Mojahar. But Moni and Surendra in cross-examination said that Sitanath was unable to speak and therefore Mojahar asked him to write in the Union Board book. Mojahar says that he wrote the four names Manindra Bhagaban, Bashiram and Moni Kamar, and the words "Naga had stabbed me with a dagger" and signed it in the presence of a number of witnesses who also signed their names. But Moni in cross-examination said that all that Sita Nath could write at first was the four names and that it was 45 minutes later, after being stimulated with medicine and upon further pressure by Mojahar to name his assailants that he first mentioned Naga and wrote about him in the book and signed it. Surendra in cross-examination also agreed with this story. The doctor's evidence is that having returned to his quarter Bonomali came and said that Sitanath was naming the person who stabbed him. He went, and Sita Nath told him that Naga stabbed him and Mojahar showed him the entries which had been made by Sita in the Union Board book. Mojahar's evidence is that Sita Nath said that Naga who lived with Manindra had stabbed him.

During all this commotion no one saw the appellant. But according to Mojahar, Manindra came to Sita's shop and stayed some time. The same night the Choukidar, the President and Dafadar were called and the Dafadar remained on guard over the house of Manindra, the south door of which was locked. But after he had called Nagendra twice the latter opened the door and sat at the door with the Dafadar. The next morning at dawn Mani went to lodge the first information report at the thana which was 8 miles away.

In this report Mani said that Manindra Nath and his servant had been quarrelling with Sita Nath, that Nagendra in collusion with Manindra had tried to kill him and that Sita Nath stated that Nagendra gave him hurt. No one else has suggested that any enmity existed between Nagendra and Sita Nath. Later in the morning the Dafadar arrested Nagendra, and found a dagger behind Manindra's shop just below an opening in the split bamboo wall. No human blood was found upon it. At about 10 O'clock Sita Nath was on the point of death and very weak, and his dying declaration was recorded by Mojahar, in the presence of others. Sita Nath was able to speak in whispers. The doctor asked questions and Mojahar wrote down what Sita Nath said; then it was read over to him and he signed it. The Naib and the doctor both asked him how he recognized the person who stabbed him when the night was dark. This declaration contains a full and detailed story of the events leading up to Sita Nath's death. He states quite definitely that Nagendra stabbed him and that he had no difficulty in recognising him as the place was open. He also suggests that the motive was enmity between Manindra and himself over his foster daughter Noni, whom Manindra was keeping as his mistress. The story told by Nanibala and confirmed to some extent by Mani is very confused. She said that Sita Nath had been very kind to her and had brought her up as his foster daughter in his mistress Mono's house. He had her married to one Suklal Das. The latter was sent to jail and Mani returned to Sita Nath. Manindra enticed her away and concealed her. She lived with Manindra for some five months. Sita protested and this led to proceedings in Court. Then she went to live in one of Sita Nath's houses in the prostitute's quarter but she was not in the keeping of Sita Nath. Later Manindra, Bashiram and Satya again enticed her away and concealed her. A month or so before Sita Nath's death, Manindra entered her house. She refused to accede to his importunities and a scuffle ensued. Sita Nath took her to Khulna to file a complaint but Manindra met them on the way and the matter was compromised. A few days later Manindra went to her house again and said that if she did not obey him he would kill both her and Sita Nath.

Aswini Kumar Dey says that the night before his death Sita Nath was drinking at his shop with Manindra Bejoy, Mona Kamar, Kali Dasi, Nanibala and another prostitute. Moni says that Sita Nath was in the habit of borrowing money from Manindra and that he did so only a few days before his death. Sushila is another prostitute. She says that Sita Nath and Manindra were on good terms and often drank together at her house and wandered about in company. That Nanibala was in Manindra's keeping at the time of Sita Nath's murder but with his permission she also says that Satya Charan Das enticed Nani away from Manindra and kept her in Sushila's house. That in consequence Suklal prosecuted Satya and herself and Nani was taken away and returned to Manindra. The President speaks of another prosecution in which Suklal was complainant and Manindra, Rames Sikdar and Sitanath were defendants. This was just before Sita Nath's death. Kalibar mentions a quarrel between Sita Nath and Suklal over Nanibala. He says that he saw Suklal in the village 7 or 8 days before Sita Nath's death. Champa another prostitute who has become a Sadhu was brought from Calcutta by Sita Nath and lived as his mistress for a time. She came to her shop on the night of his death at 7 O'clock and again at 11 O'clock; according to her evidence Sita Nath said that as a result of Manindra, Bashiram, Mona Kamar and Bhoja had been the cause of his wound and that Nagendra actually struck him. He did not say definitely that the other four had any hand in the stabbing. Sita Nath had no ill-feeling with any one except with Manindra in connexion with Nanibala. He mentioned 20 or 25 times that Nagendra had stabbed him. No one suggested Nagendra's name to him. Krishnadhane Seal the compounder said in cross-examination that at first Sita Nath said that he was not able to say who had stabbed him, that it was in answer to his question that Sita Nath said that Nagendra was of the shop of Manindra and that he mentioned Nagendra's name some 20 minutes before he mentioned the names of the four others. Banshiram says that both he and Sita Nath were in an abnormal condition that night as a result of drink and could not walk steadily.

Abinash, Sub-Inspector of Police, says that Mojahar told him that Sita Nath cried out "I am being murdered Moja-har come" and later said that he was not in a position to say who had stabbed him. Also that the doctor told him that when he questioned Sita Nath as to who had stabbed him he said that he could not fix him well. That is the evidence. Manindra and Nagendra were brought before the Magistrate. Manindra was discharged and Nagendra was committed to the Sessions on a charge of murder—his defence was a simple denial and he refused to explain anything.

Seventeen grounds of appeal were filed on his behalf, of which the majority have been abandoned during the discussion. The truth being that the learned advocate who has argued them has been at a loss to indicate any specific instance of misdirection. Having carefully read the evidence and the charge of the learned Judge I am not surprised.

According to the strict letter of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the decisions grafted upon it, the charge is eminently correct. The learned Judge has done all those things which he ought to have done and left undone all those things which he ought not to have done.

Nevertheless I have no doubt that the result amounts to both misdirection and non-direction. The mere recital of the evidence when properly marshalled, is sufficient to show that this was a case in which it was absolutely essential that every particle of the evidence should have been carefully scrutinised and compared or contrasted and that substantial help and guidance should have been given to the jury to avoid any possibility of a miscarriage of justice. Something more is required than the strict letter of the law. The perfect Code is but a dull and lifeless treatise without the enlivening and enlightening spirit with which it must be quickened by those imperfect human agents whose duty it is to practise and expound it. It is not sufficient as the learned Judge has done, merely to recount and repeat chronologically the evidence as it has been given in Court by the various witnesses. It is necessary to sift, and weigh and value the evidence. The final weighing is of course for the jury, but the Judge ought to see that all essential facts go into the scales of justice, and on the proper side of the balance. Further, facts must be marshalled by the Judge under separate heads and in distinct compartments, as they affect each separate incident in the story. Otherwise the evidence is to the jury simply a confused mass of discrepant, disconnected and contradictory details.

There must be some light and shade in every charge. Such matters for example as the darkness of the night, the drunken condition of Sita Nath, the uncertainty about the naming of his assailant, the inadequacy of any sufficient motive, the curious behaviour of Nagendra if guilty of murder, should have been brought into especial prominence and the jury's attention drawn and directed to the crucial points in the case, and not obfuscated, to use the learned Judge's own expression by a cloud of unnecessary detail, an exalted verbiage.

It is worse than a waste of time to spread fine language and lofty homilies before a jury, because not only do they fail to understand, but it confuses them. Nor will long and abstruse dissertations upon law enlighten them. This should be stated in the shortest and simplest terms and without reference to the numbers of acts and sections of which they have never heard.

The effect of a medical man's evidence about a simple fracture on the mind of a layman is comparable to a learned discussion of the law on the mind of a jury.

That the crime amounted to murder was obvious and unquestioned and the law might have been disposed of in a very few words. The important issue in the case to and upon which the whole attention of the jury should have been directed and concentrated was the identity of the murderer. Yet page after page has been devoted to explaining the law about murder and culpable homicide and the distinctions and difficulties which surround those sections of the Indian Penal Code and about the exact meaning of the word "intention" which is described in the words :

"we linger in the shadowy light and feed on the silent images which no eye but our own can gaze upon . . . . These are the objective effects of the subjective processes, certain circumstances and certain lines of conduct."

Such language is out of place and useless for its purpose. Nor was it necessary to implore the jury to concentrate their attention and address their minds to the solution of the puzzling enigma whether Sita Nath was dead or not and what he died of. It was obvious that nothing could have been more dead than this unfortunate man. Quite a large assembly of witnesses had seen him die, others had taken his dying declaration and medical witnesses had spoken both as to his mode of death, and his condition post-mortem.

To advise a jury about the necessity of spending their virgin efforts in a critical analysis of the obvious was to bring the law into ridicule and disrepute and to divert their attention from matters which are essential.

The learned Judge's abjuration to disregard and his anxious care to avoid suggesting even the faintest suspicion of his own opinion about the facts to the jury was entirely misconceived. A Judge (if he has got an opinion at all) ought to tell a jury what it is, so long as he makes it clear that they are at liberty to regard or disregard it as they please. A charge which succeeds in avoiding any expression of opinion must generally amount to a most colourless and unhelpful direction.

Under the curious system which prevails in this country the responsible and somewhat horrible power of life and death is given to Judges in the Mofussil who are often comparatively young and generally without any practical experience of the profession of the law.

The responsibility, therefore, which devolves upon this Court is far greater than that upon other Courts of criminal appeal.

It is imperative that we should be satisfied in every case and especially in murder cases that the Judge's charge was adequate. We are of opinion in this case that it was inadequate. Therefore the conviction must be set aside and the case remitted for retrial.

Cuming, J.—I agree that the appeal should be allowed and the case should be retried.

Per Graham, J.—The only circumstance in which it would be open to an accused to go behind the plea and reopen the matter of his conviction would be where he could show that there was some mistake in recording the plea, and that he did not in fact plead “guilty.” In view of S. 412 it cannot be held that an accused who has pleaded guilty is entitled under sub-S. (6), S. 439 to “show cause against his conviction.” Those words are applicable only where the accused has been convicted on the evidence, and in that case and that case only he is entitled to show that the conviction is wrong either upon the facts or through some error of law.

of Rs. 50 or in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for three months.
They were convicted and sentenced as aforesaid by an Additional Sessions Judge of the 24-Parganas on 5th June 1928.
The Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs then moved this Court for enhancement of the sentences passed upon the said two accused persons and originally the rule was issued as against both of them to show cause why their sentences should not be enhanced. Subsequently it was mentioned to the Court that accused 2 could not be found and upon that the rule as against accused 1 only was allowed to be proceeded with. It has now been heard by us in so far as it concerns that accused person.I do not consider it necessary to set out the facts alleged on behalf of the prosecution upon which the charges on which the accused persons were committed to the Court of Sessions were framed.
It is sufficient to say that the sentences passed on the accused persons are on the face of them far too lenient. At the same time I find it impossible to enhance the sentences upon the materials such as they are on the record. To explain what I mean I shall have to set out a few facts.The order-sheet of the Court of the Judge shows that on the charges against the two accused being read out and explained to them they pleaded “guilty” and they were convicted on their own plea. As reason for the sentence that he passed the Judge has recorded :

"In consideration of the inability of the prosecution to produce the girl who according to the Public Prosecutor is the only important witness in the case and the circumstances of the case, I deal with them leniently."

One thing is clear beyond doubt and that is his that without the girl's evidence the case could not go on, but beyond that I am not at all clear as to what actually took place. It may be that though the girl was not available, the prosecution were ready to go on with the trial by adducing the deposition of the girl taken before the Committing Magistrate as evidence at the trial after proving the facts necessary to be established in order to bring the case under S. 33, Evidence Act, or it may be that the prosecution were not in a position to proceed with the trial at all, because the girl was absent. On this point there is no affidavit on either side, and I am not at all sure that it is not one of those cases in which the accused pleads guilty to the charge in the hope of being leniently dealt with, the Public Prosecutor not pressing for severe sentences. All this, however, is only of minor importance.

Now, as far as I could understand the arguments adduced on behalf of the Crown, they are to the effect that the plea of "guilty" should be taken to conclude the accused altogether so that taking the facts alleged against the accused by the prosecution we should consider what is the proper sentence to be passed. This, in my opinion, is a wholly mistaken view of the situation. The plea of "guilty" is a plea to the charge and does not necessarily amount to a confession of all the facts alleged. The Court is not bound to, but it may, convict the accused on his plea: vide S. 271 (2), Criminal P. C. The plea operates as a bar, in certain cases, to the preferring of an appeal except as to the extent and legality of the sentence: vide S. 412, Criminal P. C. By analogy with and also as a necessary consequence of the bar as regards appeals, a plea of guilty will perhaps also stand in the accused's way in the matter of a revision which he may seek for. But when called upon to show cause why his sentence should not be enhanced, the accused has the right to show cause against his conviction: S 439 (6), Criminal P. C. This subsection does not make any exception as regards the case of a person who has been convicted on his own plea. I do not find anything in the words of this subsection which would warrant an interpretation that the accused while showing cause against his conviction is to be held down to his plea of "guilty." The same result would follow if we consider the true nature of a proceeding for enhancement of sentence. In such a proceeding the Crown takes up the position that the sentence originally passed is to be vacated and a new and proper sentence is to be passed: it can not be that a second sentence in addition to the original one is to be passed; because for one offence the law can punish the accused but once. When the Court in such a proceeding is considering what is the proper sentence to be passed the accused is in the position of a person who has pleaded guilty and convicted, but not yet sentenced. Under the English law at such a stage the accused is entitled to withdraw his plea of "guilty" and enter a plea of "not guilty" though he cannot do so after sentence: R. v. Selbe (1), R. v. Clouter (2); R. v. Plummer (3). The technicalities of plea under the English procedure may not apply in all their details to the system here, but this is a broad principle which, so long as there is nothing in our Code militating against it, is in my judgment applicable to this country as well. Accused 1 in the present case in showing cause through his advocate says that his conviction is not right which means that his client is not guilty.

Nextly, as has been repeatedly said in numerous decisions in Indian Courts, enhancement of sentence is a very serious thing and so in considering the question whether a sentence should be enhanced or not the Court must know all the facts and circumstances of the case. Uncross-examined testimony of the prosecution witnesses given in the Court of the Committing Magistrate can hardly be taken to suffice for the purpose. Such evidence was not the evidence at the trial, and indeed the learned advocate for acoused 1 has asked us to treat the depositions as evidence.

For all these reasons I am of opinion that the proper order to pass is to make the rule absolute in the following way, namely, to set aside the conviction of accused 1 and to direct that notwithstanding his plea he should be regularly tried, and if convicted properly sentenced.

Graham, J.—In this case a rule was issued upon the accused (now opposite party) to show cause why the sentence passed upon him should not be enhanced.

The facts are shortly these: The opposite party Jnan Ghose, and a Nepali woman named Padam Kumari were tried before the Additional Sessions Judge of the 24-Parganas and a jury on charges against the former under S. 493, I. P. C., and against the latter under Ss. 493/109, I. P. C. Padam Kumari is, it is said, in Nepal and notice could not be served on her.

The case for the prosecution was that the accused Padam Kumari had brought from Nepal a girl named Chitra Kumari aged about 14 years on the representation that she would obtain for her a wealthy and suitable husband; that after keeping the girl with her for some time in Calcutta she introduced the accused Jnan Ghose as a wealthy suitor, and that thereafter these two persons took the girl to a house at Salkea where a sham marriage ceremony was gone through, that in fact there was no real ceremony of marriage, and that certain things were done, e. g., taking a photograph, exchange of garlands, and signing by the parties, so as to deceive the girl into the belief that marriage had been performed. Thereafter sexual intercourse is alleged to have taken place between Jnan Ghose and the girl Chitra.

At the Sessions trial both the accused pleaded guilty to the charges and the Additional Sessions Judge accordingly convicted them thereon and sentenced the accused Jnan Ghose to be detained till the rising of the Court and to pay a fine of Rs. 500 or in default to six months' rigorous imprisonment, while the accused Padam Kumari was sentenced to be detained till the rising of the Court and to pay a fine of Rs. 50 or in default to rigorous imprisonment for three months. Thereafter the petitioner the Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, applied for and obtained this rule.

The question is whether any case has been made out for interference. There can be no doubt in my opinion that the sentences inflicted (we are concerned, however, now with the case of Jnan Ghose only) are wholly inadequate for an offence of this description. There are one or two matters, however, which require consideration. The first of these is as to the effect of sub-S. 6, S. 439, I. P. C., where there is a plea of guilty. That subsection reads as follows:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this section, any convicted person to whom an opportunity has been given under sub-S. (2) of showing cause why his sentence should not be enhanced, shall in showing cause, be entitled to show cause against his conviction."

In my opinion this proviso, for it is in the nature of a proviso, can have no application where there is a plea of guilty, since that, as it seems to me, concludes the matter, and it is not possible to go behind such a plea. The only circumstance in which it would, I think, be open to an accused to go behind the plea and reopen the matter of his conviction would be where he would show that there was some mistake in recording the plea, and that he did not in fact plead guilty. No allegation of the kind is made here. That being so we must, I think, proceed on the basis that it was properly recorded, and means what it says, viz., that the accused acknowledged his guilt.

In this connexion reference may be made to S. 412 of the Code which lays down that where an accused person has pleaded guilty and has been convicted by a Court of Sessions, or any Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of 1st Class on such plea, there shall be no appeal except as to the extent or legality of the sentence. In view of this section it cannot I think be held that an accused who has pleaded guilty is entitled under sub-S. 6, S. 439 to "show cause against his conviction." Those words are, as it seems to me, applicable only where the accused has been convicted on the evidence, and in that case and that case only he is entitled to 'show that the conviction is wrong either upon the facts, or through some error of law.

In the circumstances of the present case the petitioner having pleaded guilty the only question which in my judgment arises is whether the sentence is adequate or not. Speaking for myself I should not be disposed to interfere if the sentence inflicted could be considered to be in any way appropriate. It appears to me, however, to be altogether inadequate. In my opinion therefore the rule should be made absolute and I would set aside the sentence and direct that in lieu thereof the accused Jhan Ghose should suffer rigorous imprisonment for three years while maintaining the sentence of fine. (On difference between Mukerji and Graham, JJ., the case was put up before Buckland, J., who delivered the following judgment.)

Buckland, J.—This is a rule calling upon the two accused to show cause why the sentences passed upon them should not be enhanced. Janendra Nath Ghose has been convicted by the Additional Sessions Judge of the 24 Parganas upon his plea of guilty and sentenced under S. 493, I. P. C. to be detained till the rising of the Court and to pay a fine of Rs. 500 or in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months. The rule has not been proceeded with against the other accused as she could not be found. Owing to a difference of opinion between my learned brothers Mukerji and Graham, JJ., the case has been laid before me under S. 439, Criminal P. C.

The case for the prosecution was that a girl of about 14 years of age named Chitra Kumari was brought from Nepal by the accused Padam Kumari on the representation that she would obtain a suitable husband for her. After keeping the girl for sometime Padam Kumari introduced Janendra Nath Ghose. By a ceremony of mock marriage which was gone through at Salkea the girl was led to believe that she was married to Janendra Nath Ghose and sexual intercourse is said to have followed.

Section 439 (6), Criminal P. C. provides that any convicted person to whom an opportunity has been given of showing cause why his sentence should not be enhanced shall, in showing cause be entitled also to show cause against his conviction. The accused has appeared through his advocate both before my learned brothers and at the hearing before myself for the purpose of so showing cause, and it is claimed that by virtue of the right which the section gives him he may withdraw his plea of guilty notwithstanding that on an appeal by himself he would, by reason of S. 412, only be permitted to question the extent or legality of the sentence.

It does not suffice, in my opinion, in order to ascertain what are the rights under S. 439 (6) of a convicted person who has pleaded guilty, to refer to S. 412 and to contend that by virtue of the section he has rights which are denied him by the earlier section. A more correct way to arrive at a solution of the question is to determine the meaning of the word "conviction" in its application to the circumstances of the case.

It has been said that at common law in strictness a conviction consists of verdict, judgment, and sentence: Archbold's Criminal Pleadings 27, Edn. 237) The word is undoubtedly verbum aequivocum. It is sometimes used as meaning the verdict of a jury and at other times in its more strictly legal sense for the sentence of the Court: Burgess v. Boetfeur (4). Thus, though a prisoner may be said to have been convicted by the jury, a more correct legal phraseology requires this to be expressed by saying that he has been convicted by the Court upon the verdict of the jury. Also he may be convicted by the Court upon his own plea of guilty.

The Criminal Procedure Code uses the word in both senses. For instance in S. 307 (3) it refers to an "offence of which the jury could have convicted him upon the charge framed and placed before it," while S. 271 (2) provides that if the accused pleads guilty the plea shall be recorded and he may be convicted thereon. It is unnecessary to multiply instances of which many can be found in the statute.

In order to know the sense in which the word is used in S. 439 (6) in its application to any particular case it is necessary to enquire what has happened. In this case the accused was convicted under S. 271 (2) on his own plea of guilty and that being so the conviction against which he may show cause is the conviction by the Court, that is to say, the judgment of the Court which sentenced him. Against that conviction he may show cause, I apprehend by, for instance, contending that there was some defect in the proceedings or that the acts to which he confessed by his plea of guilty do not amount to an offence or the offence of which he has been convicted: Reg v. Brown (5). That, however, is not the case here and I make no attempt to say what might be allowed in other circumstances. I am however clear that he cannot go behind his plea of guilty as a confession of the facts charged. Nor is he entitled to withdraw his plea. As I have endeavoured to show, the meaning of the word "conviction" in the section in its relation to this case limits the accused to impugning the judgment of the Court. Indeed, the withdrawal of a plea of guilty is a totally different matter. Actually there is no provision in the Criminal Procedure Code which allows that to be done though I have no doubt that the Court would permit it in a proper case. The English authorities moreover agree that the leave of the Court is required and that such leave cannot be given after sentence, that is judgment has been pronounced. Reg v. Clouter and Health (6), Reg v. Seth (7) and Reg v. Phunoner (8).

In this case the accused has been sentenced and the sole question to be considered is the propriety of the judgment of the Court which sentenced him. From the accused's standpoint that may involve consideration of the question whether the Court was entitled in law to pass such sentence upon him, but no such point has been taken on his behalf. From the standpoint of the Crown the question is whether the sentence is sufficient.

My learned brothers, though they have had the misfortune to differ, are at one in their view of the sentence passed, which they describe as far too lenient and as altogether inadequate. This view I share. The learned Sessions Judge has said that in consideration of, in addition to the circumstances of the case, the inability of the prosecution to produce the girl, who, according to the Public Prosecutor, was the only important witness in the case, he dealt leniently with the accused. I am unable to understand that this can affect the quantum of sentence though a plea of guilty will generally influence the Court.

The rule will be made absolute: the sentence will be set aside and I order that Jnanendra Nath Ghose alias Jnan Ghose, do undergo 18 months' rigorous imprisonment and pay a fine of Rs 500 and in default of payment that he shall undergo rigorous imprisonment for a further term of six months.

Criminal Revn. No. 1204 of 1928, Decided on 15th March 1929, against order of District Mag., Jessore, D/- 10th November 1928.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 144 (4)—District Magistrate cannot order a Sub-Divisional Magistrate to draw proceedings under S. 145 though he can set aside order made under S. 144—Proper course is to make a reference under Criminal P. C. S. 438

The Sub-Divisional Magistrate on a police report draw up proceedings under S. 144. The District Magistrate set them aside holding they were wrongly drawn up and directed the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to draw up proceedings under S. 145.

Suhrawardy, J.—This Rule is directed against an order of the District Magistrate of Jessore dated 10th November 1928 setting aside an order passed by the Sub-Divisional Officer under S. 144, Criminal P. C. and directing him to draw up proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. This Rule was issued upon the ground that the learned District Magistrate was wholly in error in directing the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate to draw up proceedings under S. 145. In my opinion, the ground upon which this Rule was issued, so far as it goes, is correct. Under S. 144 (4), Criminal P. C. the District Magistrate is entitled to set aside the order made by a subordinate Magistrate. But there is no provision in the law that he can order a subordinate Magistrate to draw up proceedings under any other section. The revisional powers exercised by the Courts below are much restricted and do not extend to the wide powers given to this Court under S. 439 which have been made co-extensive with the powers of an appellate Court under S. 423, Criminal P. C. The proper course for the District Magistrate when he was of opinion that proceedings under S. 144 had been wrongly drawn up and that the right course would be to take action under S. 145 was to make a reference to this Court under S. 438.

In support of the ground on which this Rule has been issued reliance has been placed on the case of Kailash Chandra Pal v. Kunja Behary Poddar (1). That case supports the view that I have ventured to take that a District Magistrate has no authority to remand a case to a subordinate Magistrate to take action under S. 145, Criminal P. C. But there is a distinguishing feature in this case which puts the petitioners out of Court. In that case the Sub-Divisional Officer drew up proceedings under S. 144 against a certain party on the result of previous cases between the parties which came up to the High Court and in which it was held that one of the parties was in possession. The District Magistrate was moved and he held that proceedings under S. 144, Criminal P. C. were not rightly drawn up and directed the Sub-Divisional Officer to institute proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C.

Thereupon the Sub-Divisional Officer drew up proceedings under S. 145. Against that order of the Subordinate Magistrate a Rule was obtained from this Court. The learned Judges held that the District Magistrate had no authority to direct the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to institute proceedings under S. 145; and as the proceeding drawn up by the Subordinate Magistrate was not based upon police report or other information showing likelihood of a breach of the peace but was based on the order of the District Magistrate, they set aside the order of the District Magistrate as also the proceeding before the Sub-Divisional Officer.

In the present case there was a police report upon which the Magistrate instituted proceedings under S. 144. That order was set aside by the District Magistrate. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate thereupon drew up proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. in which he said that he was satisfied from the police report that there was a likelihood of a breach of the peace. So in the case before us the Sub-Divisional Magistrate considered the materials before him under S. 145 and it cannot be said that they were instituted without jurisdiction. The learned advocate for the petitioner argues that as the order passed by the District Magistrate directing the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to institute proceedings under S. 145 was wrong, the entire proceedings including the proceedings under S. 145 instituted by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate should be set aside. This I am not prepared to do, for the present Rule is obtained not against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate drawing up proceedings under S. 145 but against the order of the District Magistrate remanding the case to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, though I do not admit that we have no jurisdiction to set aside that proceeding as a consequential order to the order of the District Magistrate. Secondly, when the Sub-Divisional Magistrate drew up proceedings under S. 145, he had sufficient material before him on which he relied. Though no doubt he was led to this course because of the directions given by the District Magistrate, but he did not act without jurisdiction or illegally in instituting proceedings under

S. 145 when it was pointed out to him by his superior Court that his view relating to the possession of one of the parties was wrong. Thirdly, considering the state of the feeling between the parties it would not be right to drop the proceedings and leave the parties to fight. I would accordingly discharge this Rule.

Graham, J.—I agree. There was no doubt an irregularity in not giving notice to the opposite party (the present petitioner) before the order of 10th November 1928 was passed; but with all the materials before us it seems to be clear that the Magistrate based his order under S. 145 upon the police report and that he had jurisdiction to make that order. The case of Kailash Chandra Pal v. Kunjo Behary Poddar (1) to which reference has been made is distinguishable from the facts of the present case because there was apparently no police report and the order drawing up the proceedings was based entirely upon the direction of the District Magistrate.

Reference under S. 66 (2), Income Tax Act, Decided on 25th June 1929.

Income Tax Act (11 of 1922), S. 66 (2) and (4)—Findings essential for decision of case not appearing in statement of case—Case was remitted for further findings.

Where a case referred to High Court under S. 66 (2) had ultimately to be decided on the findings which did not appear in the statement of the case as made by the Commissioner, High Court sent back the case for further findings as required. [P 754 C 2]

Radhabinode Pal—for Commissioner, Income-Tax.

Rankin, C. J.—In order to dispose of the questions referred to us, it is necessary that we should refer the case back to the Commissioner to make certain additions thereto or alterations therein as provided by Cl. (4), S. 66, Income Tax Act of 1922. The observations which I propose to make now are entirely directed to making clear, so far as I can, the points upon which further findings are required at the hands of the Commissioner.

It appears that there is a firm called Messrs. Martin and Company which is governed by certain articles of partnership in writing. There seem to be three such documents. These documents have not been made part of the case stated. They ought to be made part of the case stated. It is not exactly clear to me whether as a result of these three documents that firm is shown to have had 7 partners or only 5. The documents will make that matter clear. In 1927, certain persons bought a business which was being carried on under the name and style of Burn and Company. From the documents which have been made part of the case, it would rather appear that the persons who bought that business were five in number, and it would further appear that these five persons became partners for a day at least with the original proprietors of the firm of Burn and Company. The terms upon which, the original proprietors having gone, the new proprietors were carrying on the business are defined in the documents dated 1st February 1929 by a reference to the documents which govern the firm of Messrs. Martin and Company. The words "so far as applicable to this present partnership" appear in the document of 1st February 1927. That is a matter which has not been discussed by the Commissioner in the case stated at all. That matter ought to be dealt with. He ought to give any facts in his judgment bearing upon the question as to the weight to be given to that reference in Cl. (3) of the agreement of 1st February 1927.

Again, in the document of 28th September 1927, which is an agreement to which the five purchasers to whom I have referred are parties, I find that in Cl. (4) two other people are suddenly described as partners. It seems to be necessary that it should be ascertained how that comes about. At the end of that clause, there is a statement to the effect that these two gentlemen being the senior assistants are entitled in pursuance of the partnership deed of Messrs. Martin and Company to participate in the net profit of Burn and Company. The Commissioner ought to consider that, upon the question whether or not in substance and in truth the assets which had belonged to Burn and Company were being bought by the firm of Martin and Company or whether in substance and in truth there was an entirely different firm (it may be composed of the same partners and it may be that the partners were interested in the same shares but as a matter of intention of the parties, an entirely different partnership). The Commissioner has not found whether there is or is not truth in the statement which appears to have been the case of the assessee, that the firm of Burn and Company was bought not with any funds belonging to the firm of Martin and Company at all but with other funds being the private property of the individual persons who were partners of Messrs. Martin and Company. A finding as to that is very necessary.

In remitting the case to the Commissioner, I would point out not by way of deciding this case but entirely for the guidance of the Commissioner that this case may ultimately have to be decided upon findings which do not at present appear in the case stated. The proposition that the same persons in the same shares cannot for income-tax purposes be partners of two entirely separate firms is a highly abstract proposition. It may or may not be correct but I am not prepared as at present advised to proceed upon so very general a principle without a careful enquiry into the concrete case and into the matters above mentioned. It may turn out that the case depends on the question of fact whether the two firms were entirely separate—a question of fact including the question of intention. It is necessary that we should know whether in substance and in truth the partners as part of the business of Martin and Company bought up certain assets (in which case the fact that these assets went by a different name would have no importance whatever) or whether, on the other hand, it was an entirely separate venture not intended to be any part of the business of Martin and Company or to have any connexion with Martin and Company. If the fact is that certain persons—be they 5 or 7 put their hands in their pockets to buy the assets of Burn and Company with the intention of running a firm which would have nothing to do with Messrs. Martin and Company, then the Commissioner should in justice to the assessee give a finding to that effect. Looking upon it in that way, it seems to me desirable that this case should be sent back to the Commissioner to make such additions thereto or alterations therein as are required to meet the points which in this judgment I have mentioned.

Criminal Revn. No. 1246 of 1928, Decided on 29th January 1929, against order of Deputy Magistrate, Madaripur, D/- 31st July 1928.

Criminal P. C., S. 196-A—Magistrate trying and convicting accused under charges which require no sanction along with such as require sanction under S. 196-A—No sanction having been accorded—Whole trial held vitiated.

A Magistrate held trial of the accused on charges which did not require sanction along with such as were not cognizable without sanction under S. 196-A, and convicted him although the necessary sanction had not been accorded. In his explanation the Magistrate suggested that the convictions against the accused under those sections only for which no sanction was required might be maintained and that the sentences passed on them may be treated as having been passed under those sections only.

Held: that, as the two charges could not thus be separated, the trial was vitiated.

Suresh Chandra Taluqdar, Ramendra Chandra Roy and Mahendra Kumar Ghose—for Petitioners.

Order.—The petitioners have been convicted under S. 120-B, I. P. C. Petitioner 1 has also been convicted under S. 384, I. P. C. and No. 2 under S. 384/114, I. P. C. The ground upon which this rule has been issued is that the trial was vitiated as the sanction contemplated by S. 196-A, Criminal P. C. had not been accorded by the Local Government to the prosecution of the petitioners under S. 120-B, I. P. C. Now the object of the conspiracy having been to commit an offence under S. 384, I. P. C. which is a non-cognizable offence the Court could not take cognizance of the said offence without the sanction of the Local Government or of the District Magistrate empowered in that behalf. In the explanation which the learned Magistrate has submitted in answer to the rule he has suggested that the convictions under Ss. 384 and 384/114, I. P. C. as against petitioners 1 and 2 respectively may be maintained and that the sentence passed on them may be treated as having been passed under the said sections. Apart from anything else, this course, in my opinion, is likely to result in prejudice to the petitioners. They had been put on their trial in respect of offences under Ss. 384 and 384/114 along with a charge under S. 120-B. It is just possible and indeed it is not unlikely that a good deal of evidence that was adduced on behalf of the prosecution in this case in order to establish the charge of conspiracy would not be relevant as against the petitioners on the substantive charges under Ss. 384 and 384/114, I. P. C. The trial held on charges which do not require sanction along with such as are not cognizable without sanction under S. 196-A, Criminal P. C., cannot be separated in this way.

I am accordingly of opinion that this rule should be made absolute and the convictions and sentences passed on the petitioners should be set aside and the fines if paid by them should be refunded. It will be open to the prosecution to proceed afresh against the petitioners in respect of the charges under Ss. 384 and 384/114, I. P. C. or even as regards the charge under S. 120-B, I. P. C. provided that the requisite sanction under S. 196-A, Criminal P. C. has been duly obtained. Such retrial, if it is to take place, will be held before some Magistrate other than the learned Magistrate who has already dealt with this case.

Criminal Revn. No. 358 of 1929, Decided on 5th July 1929, from order of Dist. Magistrate, Goalpara, D/- 12th February 1929.

Criminal P. C. S. 437—Further inquiry—

Superior Court not to order further enquiry unless there is palpable error in decision of lower Court.

Though the revising Court has jurisdiction to order further enquiry on the same materials, a superior Court should hesitate before exercising its power under S. 437 to order further enquiry, unless there are palpable errors in the decision of the lower Court: 15 Cal. 608 (F.B.) and A. Debendra Narain Bhattacharjee—for the Crown.

Judgment.—This Rule is directed against an order of the District Magistrate of Goalpara, dated 12th February 1929, ordering further enquiry into the case in which the petitioner was charged under S. 380, I. P. C. The only ground that the Magistrate found for further enquiry is stated by him in these words:

"With regard to the evidence, the contention that the learned Magistrate has taken an entirely wrong view of the evidence with the result that there has been a miscarriage of justice appears to be not without foundation. I consider it desirable in the interest of justice that the case should be further enquired into."

We have gone through the judgment of the trial Magistrate and find that the trial Magistrate has carefully scanned the evidence and come to the conclusion that the case against the accused is at least very doubtful. It is not necessary for us to discuss the evidence and the learned District Magistrate has not done so; but we are of opinion that the view taken by the trial Magistrate cannot be held to be unjustifiable. Though it may be conceded in view of the Full Bench decision in Haridas Sanyal v. Saritulla (1), that a revising Court has jurisdiction to order a further enquiry on the same materials, a superior Court, as has been pointed out in Abdul Rashid v. Montaz Sheikh (2) should hesitate before exercising its powers under S. 437, Criminal P. C., to order further enquiry unless there are palpable errors in the decision of the lower Court. The District Magistrate has not given any indication in his judgment that there have been such palpable errors in the judgment of the trial Magistrate as to justify him in holding it to be wrong. We think that this is a case in which further enquiry is not necessary. We accordingly make Full Bench Ref. No. 1 of 1929, Decided on 2nd September 1929, made by Lord Williams, J., on 9th September 1928.

* (a) Criminal P. C., S. 432—Reference by Presidency Magistrate under S. 432 is confined to question of law necessary to dispose of case before him.

The power of reference conferred upon the Presidency Magistrate by S. 432 is confined to questions of law which the Magistrate requires to decide in order to perform his duty in disposing of the case before him, and the Magistrate ought not to refer to High Court questions of law unless they are matters upon which he has duty to make up his mind.

(b) Criminal P. C. — Application of Code to internal arrangements of the High Court.

The internal arrangements of the High Court are dealt with by its rules and the Code does not decide what functions can be exercised by a single Judge or must be exercised by a Division Bench. Code deals with the High Court as one and the definitions of the High Court are not intended to do more than to point to the Court itself so as to distinguish it from other Courts.

* * (c) Criminal P. C., S. 215—S. 215 is negative or restrictive and confines High Court's powers to quash commitment only in case where commitment is bad in law—However it does not take away any power to quash commitment prima facie incident to any superior Court receiving commitments from lower Courts as basis of its own jurisdiction.

Section 215 is a negative or restrictive section. It is intended to negative the existence in Sessions Courts to quash commitments and it is intended to restrict a High Court to cases in which it can be said that the commitment is bad in law. This last restriction is a restriction upon all powers which the High Court might otherwise possess, and it attaches to revisional powers as well. However, it does not take away by implication any other power to quash commitment which is prima facie incident to any superior Court receiving commitments from lower Courts as the basis of its own jurisdiction.

* * (d) Criminal P. C., S. 532—Offence not triable by Sessions or High Court—Accused committed—S. 532 does not apply.

Section 532 has no reference to a case in which a Magistrate who has general powers to commit an accused person to the High Court commits an accused over whom he has no jurisdiction or commits him for an offence which upon true construction of the Code is not triable by a Court of Sessions or High Court.

[P 760 C 1, 2]

(e) Criminal P. C., S. 532—Section to be interpreted in interests of accused.

Section 532 is a curing or remedial section and it must be strictly interpreted in the interests of the accused person.

* * (f) Criminal P. C., S. 273—Section has no reference to illegal commitments.

Section 273 is a special power given to High Court. It has no reference to illegal commitment. The reference to portions of a charge and to the charge or portion thereof being "clearly unsustainable" is sufficient to show that the section is intended to provide a short and an effective way by which charges which have no merits may be disposed of.

(g) Criminal P. C., S. 215—Effect of quashing commitment is to supersede action taken by Magistrate under S. 210 and proceedings subsequent thereto.

Primary effect of the order quashing the commitment is to supersede any action taken by the Magistrate under S. 210 and his proceedings subsequent thereto, and in such a case it is necessary for the Magistrate to go back to the point at which he took cognizance of the complaint. The order does not amount to discharge and no fresh complaint is necessary.

D. N. Bhattachargee and Nirmal Chandra Chakravarti—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—On 19th September 1928, Lord Williams, J., exercising the jurisdiction of the High Court under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (3 of 1909 as amended by Act 9 of 1926) and being of opinion that there were grounds for thinking that certain insolvents had committed offences under S. 103 of the said Act, made a complaint under S. 104, thereof to the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta. The Magistrate issued process on the accused and from the earliest stage of the proceedings determined to conduct them under Chap. 18, Criminal P. C., being of opinion that the case was one which ought to be tried at the High Court Sessions. On 17th December 1928, he formally committed the three accused Girish Chandra Kundu, Sudhir Chandra Kundu and Pramatha Nath Kundu accordingly. On 8th March 1929 the case came before Buckland, J., in the ordinary original criminal jurisdiction of the Court. The learned Judge took the view that as on conviction for an offence under S. 103 of the Act of 1909, the maximum punishment to which the accused is liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years and as there is no provision for imposition of a fine in addition to imprisonment, it was not possible to say of the offence charged that it could not be adequately punished by the Magistrate who has power to impose two years' imprisonment. In this view, being of opinion that the commitment was illegal, Buckland, J., directed that the commitment be quashed and that the record, with a copy of his judgment, be returned to the Chief Presidency Magistrate in order that he might deal with the complaint according to law. The accused persons had an opportunity before Buckland, J., of being heard upon the question whether the commitment should be quashed, but nothing was urged upon this point on their behalf. When the matter went back to the Magistrate, they filed a petition contending that the order of Buckland, J., read as a whole amounted to a discharge of the petitioners. The Magistrate thereupon has acted under S. 432, Criminal P. C., with a view to obtaining a decision upon certain question of law which he has indicated.

Section 432 provides that a Presidency Magistrate may, if he thinks fit, refer for the opinion of the High Court any question of law which arises in the hearing of any case pending before him; and S. 433 provides that when a question has been so referred the High Court shall pass such order thereon as it thinks fit and shall cause a copy of such order to be sent to the Magistrate by whom the reference was made, who shall dispose of the case conformably to the said order. It will be observed that while the power of the Magistrate is to refer any question of law, the power of the High Court is to pass such order thereon as it thinks fit. In the present case the Magistrate has formally stated seven questions:

"(i) What is the correct interpretation of S. 215, Criminal P. C.?

(ii) Does it give power to the Judge presiding at the Sessions to quash a commitment made to him by a competent Magistrate?

(iii) Does it refer to a power of the High Court in its revisional jurisdiction?

(iv) Does it, refer to both of these powers?

(v) If it gives the power referred to in (ii), what is the effect when the Judge so presiding quashes a commitment? Has it, as suggested by the accused in their petition, the effect of a discharge, so that the Committing Magistrate has no further jurisdiction in the matter, in the absence of a fresh complaint; or can the Magistrate proceed with the case as it stood prior to his passing the order of commitment.

(vi) Subsidiary to the question raised in (v) is the question whether the Judge presiding at the Sessions has power to direct what shall be the effect of his order quashing the commitment.

(vii) The learned Judge in the present case has quashed the commitment on a point of law, viz., that the charge in the case under S. 103, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, is punishable with a maximum imprisonment of two years, that this being not more than the maximum punishment the Magistrate could award, his order of commitment was illegal. . . . Is the Magistrate bound by that order, so that in due course when the matter comes on again, he must not commit the case, though with all respect, he differs from the view of the law thereby expressed, and is of opinion that he has power to commit the case?

Upon the reference coming before a Division Bench, the learned Judges have intimated their opinion and have referred two questions to this Full Bench for determination. Their opinion in substance is that Buckland, J., had no power to quash the commitment; that the ground upon which he decided to quash it was erroneous and that if he acted under S. 215, Criminal P. C., the accused should stand discharged. The two questions which they have referred to us are as follows:

(1) Has a Judge presiding over the Sessions of the High Court power under S. 215, Criminal P. C., to quash a commitment made to him by a competent Magistrate?

(2) Where in a case triable by a Magistrate and not exclusively triable by a Court of Sessions, the Magistrate commits to the Court of Session, being of opinion that it should be tried by that Court, without saying that he could not award adequate punishment or the case is such where maximum punishment is within the competency of the Magistrate, is the commitment without jurisdiction?

Now, it appears to me that the power of reference conferred upon the Presidency Magistrate by S. 432 of the Code is confined to questions of law which the Magistrate requires to decide in order to perform his duty in disposing of the case before him; and that the Magistrate ought not to refer to this Court questions of law unless they are matters upon which he has a duty to make up his mind. In substance the Chief Presidency Magistrate has in this case asked this Court to express its opinion upon three questions :

(1) whether the learned Judge at Sessions had power to quash the commitment ;

(2) whether he was right in law in quashing the commitment for the reasons given by him ; and

(3) whether it is competent for the Magistrate to proceed in the absence of a fresh complaint or whether he can proceed with the case as it stood prior to his passing the order of commitment.

I have some difficulty in seeing that either of the first two questions is a question which arises in the hearing of the case pending before the Magistrate. I should have thought that for the purpose of this case the Magistrate had amply discharged his duty if he had taken the order of the High Court as an effective order quashing the commitment and had proceeded to deal with this case upon the footing that it was for him to deal with it himself as a warrant case under the provisions of Chap. 21, Criminal P. C.

Assuming, however, that the first question which has embarrassed the Magistrate is the question whether it is open to him to ignore the order of the learned Judge and to treat it as null and void, I am of opinion that the answer to this question is in the negative.

Prior to Act 13 of 1865 which abolished Grand Juries in the Presidency towns, original criminal jurisdiction of the High Court over an individual accused was based upon the presentment of the Grand Jury. Act 18 of 1862 contained elaborate provisions for the amendment of indictments and provided that every verdict and judgment should be of the same force and effect in all respects as if the indictment had originally been in the amended form. It contained also various provisions according to which an offence might be dealt with, tried and punished by the Supreme Court according as the offence had been either commenced or completed, or as the consequence had ensued, within the local jurisdiction of the Court. It gave jurisdiction in the case of offences committed on a journey or on a voyage in British India. It provided that every objection to an indictment for uncertainty or for any formal defect apparent on the face thereof should be taken by demurrer or motion to quash such indictment before the jury had been sworn and not afterwards. It defined the word "indictment" to include information, inquisition or presentment as well as indictment ; and also plea, application or other pleading.

Act 13 of 1865 provided that any Magistrate who shall commit to custody or hold to bail any person for trial before the High Court for an offence committed, or which according to law may be dealt with as having been committed, within the local limits of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction, should deliver to the clerk of the Crown a written instrument of charge signed by him stating for what offence such person is so committed or held to bail. It empowered the clerk of the Crown to alter, amend or add to the charge and directed that the charge, with such amendments, alterations or additions, if any, should be recorded in the High Court. S. 6 enacted that upon the charge being recorded as aforesaid, the persons committed to custody or held to bail shall be deemed to have been brought before the High Court in due course of law and should be arraigned at suit of the Crown and the verdict recorded thereupon. Under this Act it is evident that the foundation of the jurisdiction of the High Court was the written instrument of charge signed by the Magistrate and delivered by him to the clerk of the Crown. It was only after charges so made had been recorded that the accused were to be deemed to have been brought before the High Court in due course of law.

Between 1865 and the enactment of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872 the effect of these provisions of the Act of 1865 was considered in Queen v. Thompson (1). The accused was tried for an offence committed on Board a British ship on the high seas. The written instrument of charge in that case had in fact been made by a Magistrate but the fact did not appear from the instrument itself. Peacock, C. J. made it clear that if in fact it had not been preferred by a Justice of the Peace, it could not have been supported. But with reference to the provisions which

I have already cited from Act 18 of 1862, he held that :

"although we do not see on the face of the record that the charge has been preferred by a Justice of the Peace, we know that it was so preferred and that the Judge presiding at the trial would not have quashed the charge for the defect now relied upon but would have caused the charge to be amended."

He refers to S. 41, Act 18 of 1862 and to S. 7, Act 13 of 1865 which provided that in the former Act the word 'indictment' should be understood to include the word 'charge' and that all the provisions of the said Act should apply to charges recorded as aforesaid and the trial of such charges. It is clear, therefore both on authority and on the terms of the statutes themselves, as well as upon principle that after 1865 the power of the Court to quash an indictment had become a power to quash the charge comprised in the written instrument of charge delivered by a Justice of the Peace to the clerk of the Crown.

The written instrument of charge, or as it is now called the order of commitment, has from 1865 onwards a double aspect: it is in the first place an order of the Magistrate: it is in the second place the foundation of the jurisdiction of the superior Court. It may be regarded in either of these ways and it may have to be dealt with under either aspect.

This was the position when the legislature passed the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872 which purported to be:

"An Act for regulating the procedure of the Courts of Criminal Judicature, other than the High Courts in Presidency towns in the exercise of their original criminal jurisdiction."

Chapter 15 of that Code dealt with the procedure to be adopted in enquiries before Magistrates in cases triable by Courts of Sessions or High Courts. Section 196 provided that when evidence has been given before a Magistrate which appears to justify him in sending the accused person to take his trial for an offence which is triable exclusively by the Court of Sessions or High Court, or which in the opinion of the Magistrate is one which ought to be tried by such Court, the accused person shall be sent for trial by such Magistrate before the Court of Sessions or High Court as the case may be. Section 197 was as follows:

"If such accused person (not being a European British subject) is accused of having committed an offence conjointly with a European British subject who is about to be committed for trial, or to be tried before the High Court on a similar charge, and the evidence appears to justify the Magistrate in sending the accused person for trial, he shall commit such accused person to take his trial before such High Court, and not before a Court of Sessions; and such High Court shall have jurisdiction to try such person.

Explanation.—A commitment once made by a competent Magistrate can be quashed by the High Court only, and only on a point of law.

This explanation applies also to S. 196."

It may well be that in this Code, as in the subsequent Codes, the definition of "High Court" (which is the same as that now appearing in S. 4 of the Code of 1898) is one that does not always fit in with the meaning of the words as used. This is no great matter in the Code of 1872 as S. 4 of the Act qualifies the definition therein contained by the phrase "unless a different intention appears from the context." Remembering, however, that it was no part of the purpose of the Act of 1872 to regulate the procedure of High Courts in the exercise of their original criminal jurisdiction, we will find it impossible to suppose that an "explanation" appended to S. 197 of this Code which itself speaks of "trial before the High Court" was intended to alter the law under which a High Court Judge at Sessions had the right and the duty to quash the charge if the prisoner had not been brought before him in due course of law. In the Code of 1882 this explanation re-appears as S. 215. In that Code the old definition of "High Court" is still applicable to Chap. 18. Section 215 re-appears in the Code of 1898 in which Code the definition applicable to Chap. 18 is the definition in S. 266.

In my judgment the question is put upon a wrong footing if it be asked in the form whether the power conferred by S. 215 is conferred upon the Judge exercising the ordinary original criminal jurisdiction. To begin with the internal arrangements of the High Court are dealt with by its Rules and the Code does not decide what functions can be exercised by a single judge or must be exercised by a Division Bench. It deals with the High Court as one and the definitions of High Court are not intended to do more than to point to the Court itself so as to distinguish it from other Courts. In the second place S. 215 is a negative or restrictive section. It is intended to negative the existence in Sessions Courts of power to quash a commitment and it is intended to restrict the High Court to cases in which it can be said that the commitment is bad in law. This last restriction is a restriction put upon all powers which the High Court might otherwise possess. I have no doubt at all that it is a restriction which attaches to the powers of the High Court in revision. Indeed as a Court of trial there could be no question of the High Court quashing a commitment on the ground that the evidence would not support the charge. But it is a very different matter to contend that it takes away by implication any other power to quash a commitment for illegality which the High Court may have had. If a Judge of the High Court trying a prisoner discovers that the accused or the offence is, for any reason, outside the jurisdiction of the Committing Magistrate or that the accused has been brought before him by an illegal order of an inferior Court, it is clearly his duty to take some action upon these considerations. His concern with S. 215 is, in my judgment, only this, that he is bound to see that he does nothing which the section prohibits.

The question of what he has to do takes us first to S. 532 of the Code. This section, it is to be observed, is one of a series which give power to remedy defects of procedure, which otherwise might result in criminal proceedings being set aside for errors not productive of injustice. Section 532 in my opinion is directed to the case of commitments that are bad by reason of a defect personal to the committing officer. It envisages a Magistrate purporting to exercise powers duly conferred upon him and this in my judgment is a reference to S. 206. The case supposed is one in which everything that has been done has been regular but the person who has committed the accused for trial is not empowered so to do. In these circumstances S. 532 provides that if the Court of Sessions or High Court considers that the accused has not been injured by the irregularity, it may accept the commitment, provided, however, objection had not been made to the jurisdiction of the Magistrate before the order of commitment was made. This section in my opinion has no reference to a case in which a Magistrate who has general powers to commit an accused person to the High Court commits an accused over whom he has no jurisdiction or commits him for an offence which, upon a true construction of the Code, is not triable by a Court of Sessions or High Court. Section 532 has, in my judgment, no application to the present case but it does remind us that an order of commitment has a double aspect, being at once an order of the committing Court and an order which is the foundation of the jurisdiction of the higher Court. For the limited purposes of the section the Court of Sessions as well as the High Court has to make up its mind whether to accept a commitment or to quash a commitment. The section is a curing or remedial section and it must be strictly interpreted in the interests of accused persons. It is idle to argue from the provisions of this section that it assumes or implies that the High Court at a trial has no other authority to quash a commitment.

The next section to be considered is S. 273. This is a special power given to High Courts. If it appears to the High Court at any time before the commencement of the trial that any charge or any portion thereof is clearly unsustainable, the Judge may make on the charge an entry to that effect and

"such entry shall have the effect of staying proceedings upon the charge or portion of the charge as the case may be."

In my judgment this section has no reference to cases of illegal commitment. The reference to portions of a charge and to the charge or portion thereof being "clearly unsustainable" is sufficient to show that the section is intended to provide a short and effective way by which charges which have no merits may be disposed of.

The prohibition in S. 215 by which the High Court is limited to a point of law as a reason for quashing a commitment has in my opinion a plain purpose. In Charoo Chunder Mullick v. Empress (2) the Court refused an application under S. 147, High Courts Criminal Procedure Act (10 of 1875), finding that the object of the application was to get an order quashing a commitment on the ground that there was an insufficient case upon the evidence. The Judges pointed out that if a commitment may be quashed upon the merits and application to this effect may be made, it would in practice be made only in doubtful cases. If such an application were entertained and refused the result would be that a prisoner committed upon evidence, sufficiently weak to make the result of a trial doubtful, would come to his trial prejudiced by the opinion of the High Court pronounced against him to the effect that the commitment ought not to be quashed. Applications of this character would clearly be objectionable. But S. 273 provides suitably for this very class of cases. The charge must be "clearly" unsustainable or else the Judge will not take into his own hands the functions of the jury.

If these Ss. 532 and 273 are not addressed to a case in which the High Court as a Court of trial has before it a prisoner whose commitment is contrary to law in the sense that he is not amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court at all, it would seem that there is no express provision in the Code to direct the Judge's action. The Sessions Judge has a power of reference to the High Court. Is the High Court Judge left in such a case to some irregular or informal arrangement by which he may call in aid a different jurisdiction of the Court—the revisional jurisdiction over the committing Magistrate? Or is he to say to the prisoner:

"You have made a very good plea in Bar but I cannot listen to it. I will try you though I see I have no right to try you but I will let you take your objection on the general issue?"

One may well hesitate to impute either intention to the legislature.

As it appears to me to be clear that prior to the Code of 1882 at all events, the right and duty of the High Court at Sessions to quash a charge is plain, I am of opinion that before it could be held that the Judge in the exercise of the original criminal jurisdiction of this High Court is unable to quash a commitment, it must be shown from the language of the Code or from the scheme of the Code that the legislature has taken away this power prima facie incident to any superior Court receiving commitments from the lower Courts as the basis of its own jurisdiction. In my opinion no construction that could properly be placed upon S. 215 of the Code could be put so high. The legislature in this matter has I think been somewhat wiser than has been supposed. It has been content, in view of the revisional powers of the High Court, to take away the power of quashing a commitment, save under S. 532, from Courts of Session on which formal powers of reference have been conferred, and to leave the powers of the High Court upon this matter unaffected by special provision save that commitments are not to be quashed except upon a point of law. The Code of 1882 intends no more than the Code of 1872 intended. It was unnecessary for the purpose of the legislature in any of the Codes and it was no part of its scheme, to analyse High Courts as though they were a complex of jurisdictions or to set forth the different ways and occasions which might present the question of quashing a commitment for the consideration of High Courts.

In the present case the High Court has in fact quashed the commitment and I think in answer to this reference the Chief Presidency Magistrate may be informed that it is his duty to treat that order as a valid and subsisting order.

The next question raised by the Magistrate is whether the order of Buckland, J., has the effect of a discharge so that the Magistrate has no further jurisdiction in the matter in the absence of a fresh complaint, or whether the Magistrate can proceed with it as it stood prior to the passing of the order of commitment. To this question I would reply that while the primary effect of the order quashing the commitment is to supersede any action taken by the Magistrate under S. 210 and his proceedings subsequent thereto, it is necessary for the Magistrate in this case to go back to the point at which he took cognizance of the complaint. There is no need whatever for a fresh complaint but it is necessary for the Magistrate to treat the case as a warrant case and not as the subject matter of an enquiry under Ch. 11. The Magistrate must begin the trial afresh under S. 252.

The last question raised by the Magistrate concerns the merits of the order of Buckland, J., and raises the question whether the learned Judge was right in holding that it is illegal for a Magistrate to commit the accused to trial when the offence is neither exclusively triable on commitment nor one of which it is possible to hold that the Magistrate has insufficient power to inflict adequate punishment.

That the Magistrate should think fit to raise this question is presumably to be explained by the circumstance that he entertains a doubt whether or not the order of the learned Judge was without jurisdiction. That doubt having been resolved, it is not to be supposed that the Magistrate will entertain a suggestion that when he rehears the case, he should again commit the accused to the High Court Sessions. Such a procedure would in this case be in the highest degree disorderly. The question whether it is lawful for the Magistrate to commit this case to the High Court Sessions has been decided by this Court once. This Full Bench is not sitting on appeal from the order of the learned Judge. Whatever be the difficulties in the question raised and whatever be the answer, there is only one order which could in this case be correct and I am of opinion that it is open to us on this reference to direct the Chief Presidency Magistrate to proceed with the case as a warrant case and to try it as such in conformity with the decision which has already been given in the presence of the accused.

This reference to the Full Bench has been made under R. 5, Chap. 7 of the Rules of the appellate side. Under this rule the whole case is referred to the Full Bench for such orders as to the Full Bench may deem fit. The order which I would propose is as follows:—

1. Declare that the order of Buckland, J., is a valid and subsisting order.

2. Direct the Chief Presidency Magistrate to try the accused under Chap. 21, Criminal P. C., upon the basis of the complaint already made.

3. Direct the Magistrate that he is not again to commit this case for trial at the High Court Sessions.

4. Save as aforesaid, this Court does not think fit to make any further order upon this reference.

Rajaram Majhi—Complainant.

v.

Panchanan Ghosh—Accused.

Criminal Ref. No. 26 of 1929, Decided on 17th April 1929, made by Addl. Sess. Judge, Hooghly.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 250 (1)—Order to show cause for compensation—No date fixed—Complainant has to show cause then and there unless adjournment is obtained.

The effect of an order calling upon a complainant to show cause why he should not pay compensation to an accused, under S. 250, without fixing date is that the complainant is to show cause then and there unless he obtains from the Court some order adjourning the matter to a further date. [P 763 C 2]

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 250—Order to show cause—Date fixed verbally—Complainant absent on fixed date—Another date fixed—Magistrate must issue notice or summons to complainant.

Where after an order calling upon the complainant to show cause why he should not be made to pay compensation, the Magistrate fixes the date verbally, and on the date of hearing fixed, the complainant does not appear it being doubtful whether complainant knew the date, and a further date is fixed, the Magistrate ought to issue a summons to appear and show cause, or at any rate he ought to issue a notice to the complainant informing him that the date for showing cause has been fixed for a particular day. [P 764 C 1]

(c) Criminal P. C., S. 250—Acquitting—Magistrate should deal with cause shown.

It is the Magistrate who deals with the substantive case and makes the order of acquittal or discharge, who has got to deal with the cause that is shown why compensation should not be awarded. [P 765 C 1]

Suresh Chandra Talukdar—for Complainant.

Manmatha Nath Ray and Suryya Kumar Aich—for Accused.

Judgment.—This is a reference made by the Additional Sessions Judge of Hooghly, under S. 438, Criminal P. C. recommending that an order passed against the complainant Rajaram Majhi under S. 250, Criminal P. C. should be set aside and the said complainant should be summoned and an opportunity given to him to show cause why compensation should not be ordered.

In order to appreciate the confusion that has arisen and in consequence of which this reference has been made it is necessary to state the facts quite shortly. Rajaram Majhi was the complainant.

in a case which he had instituted against one Panchanan Ghose for an offence under S. 420, I. P. C. On 21st July 1928 which was a Saturday, the accused Panchanan was acquitted and if anything is clear in this case it is this that on the acquittal of Panchanan as aforesaid the trial Magistrate Mr. Basanta Kumar Banerji recorded an order which ran in these words:

"Complainant to show cause why he should not pay the accused the sum of Rupees one hundred as compensation under S. 250 Criminal P. C."

What happened immediately after this order was recorded is a matter of some dispute. But in a matter of such controversial character it is preferable always to go upon the statement of the Magistrate if in point of fact there is nothing in the record to contradict such a statement. In the explanation which the learned Magistrate submitted in answer to the rule that was issued by the Sessions Judge it was made clear by him that immediately after he had recorded this order,—and it was an order by which he wanted the complainant to show cause then and there for he had not fixed any date in the order by which the cause was to be shown—he received some intimation of some sudden illness in his family which compelled him to leave the Court. He said in that explanation that at the time when he left the Court immediately after recording the aforesaid order he gave verbal orders that cause might be shewn on 23rd July 1928. He did not say, however, that he himself told the complainant that the latter was to appear on 23rd July and show cause in pursuance of the said order. According to the explanation what happened afterwards was as follows: On 23rd July 1928 when he came to the Court what he did was that he sent for the complainant and then his pleader Babu Bhagwan Das Chatterjee. The complainant, of course, was not to be found, but the pleader appeared and represented to him that in his absence his Bench Clerk had fixed the date for showing cause as 2nd August 1928. The Magistrate made an enquiry of the Bench Clerk as to whether he had done so and told Babu Bhagawan Das that the Bench Clerk had no power to allow any time as he himself fixed 23rd July 1928. The Bench Clerk denied having fixed the date for 2nd August 1928. Babu Bhagawan Das, as far as can be made out from the Magistrate's explanation, then asked the Magistrate to give time till 2nd August 1928. On being asked by the Magistrate to file a petition, Babu Bhagawan Das did so, with the result that the Magistrate made an order allowing time till 24th July 1928. On 24th July 1928 the complainant did not appear and the learned Magistrate then recorded the following order:

"On 23-7-1928 complainant wanted time to show cause and he was granted one day's time. No cause has ever been shown today. He is not found even after calls. The order to pay compensation of Rs. 50 to the accused is therefore made absolute."

It is this order which forms the subject matter of this reference.

Now two things are quite clear. One is that on 21st July 1928 when the Magistrate called upon the complainant to show cause by the written order that he passed he fixed no date, and as I have said the natural consequence of that order was that the complainant was to show cause then and there until and unless he obtained some order from the Court adjourning the matter to a further date. As the Court was unable to sit any longer it was obviously the duty of the Court to fix a date on which the cause was to be shown. No written order was passed fixing such date and all that the Magistrate is able to tell us is that before leaving the Court he made a verbal order. There is nothing at all on the record to indicate—and indeed all circumstances point to the contrary,—that the complainant was aware that it was the intention of the Magistrate to take the matter up on Monday 23-7-1928. The fact that the complainant's pleader had the audacity to tell the Court knowing full well that an enquiry would immediately be made from the Bench Clerk that the Bench Clerk had fixed 2nd August 1928, goes a long way to indicate that some such impression must have been produced in the mind of the complainant, and although I am prepared to accept the explanation which the Bench Clerk offered to the Magistrate saying that he had not fixed the 2nd August in contravention of the Magistrate's verbal order, I cannot for a moment believe that the whole of this story as to 2nd August 1928 was a pure invention and an afterthought for the purpose of getting rid of the liability to show cause. Enquiry in point of fact was made and the Bench Clerk denied having fixed the date. But then the fact remains that when the application was filed on 23rd August the complainant was not present in Court. The other fact is that there is absolutely no reason to suggest that the order which the Magistrate passed on the petition of 23rd July fixing the date for 24th July was ever communicated to the complainant. It is only natural therefore that on 24th July the complainant did not appear with the result that the order was passed in his absence. What the law contemplates is that the complainant is to show cause, not that it would be enough to serve notice on the pleader or pass an order on a petition filed by the pleader which may or may not be communicated to the complainant. In the present case I am not at all satisfied either that the complainant knew that he had to show cause on 23rd July 1928 or that he had to show cause on 24th July 1928. For these reasons I am of opinion that the ground upon which the reference has been made by the learned Additional Sessions Judge is perfectly well founded and that if the Magistrate on 23rd July thought that the order which he had passed on 21st July was to be complied with by the complainant he ought to have issued a summons, as the learned Judge suggests, in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the latter part of S. 250 (1), Criminal P. C., which says:

"If such person is not present, directing the issue of a summons to him to appear and show cause as aforesaid."

In any event he should have given notice to the complainant that the date for the showing of cause had been fixed by him for 24th July 1928.

It has been contended on behalf of the opposite party who has appeared in this case that when no date was fixed for showing cause by the order of 21st July 1928 it was the bounden duty of the complainant to appear in Court on 23rd July 1928, and if he did not do so he cannot be permitted to complain. In support of this view reliance has been placed on two decisions to which I shall presently refer. One is the case of Lalit

Mohan v. Kunja Behari Ghose (1). There what happened was this. The order to show cause was passed on 3rd September 1910. No cause was shown on that date or on any of the dates following and on 6th September the order to show cause was made absolute. Now the point which distinguishes that case from the present one is that in that case there was nothing to show that on 3rd September 1910 immediately after recording the order which purported to be an order calling upon the complainant to show cause then and there in pursuance of the order the Magistrate left the Court depriving the complainant of an opportunity to show cause at that time. This case in my opinion, is not an authority for the proposition that when an order has been made without fixing a date the man is to come necessarily on the next day and comply with the order. If at all, the case is an authority for the position that if no date is fixed cause is to be shown on that very date unless time is taken by the complainant for the purpose.

Another case relied upon is the decision of the Madras High Court reported in 5 Madras High Court Reports Appendix p. 15. What happened in that case was that under the Code of 1861, an accused person appeared on a particular date before the Magistrate but the Magistrate was unable to take up the case. The Magistrate then left the Court making a verbal order on the accused asking him to appear on the following day. The accused did not turn up on the day so fixed and on that he was convicted under S. 174, I. P. C. It is clear from the proceedings that the accused when called upon to answer a charge under S. 174, I. P. C., admitted that he had received the Magistrate's verbal order but pleaded that he had some other case to attend to in another Court. The contention that was put forward before the Court was that the accused was absolved as there was no written order and no recognizance had been taken from him in pursuance of the verbal order. This contention was overruled. If in the present case there is anything to suggest that the complainant admitted that he knew of the order asking him to show cause on 23rd July the position would have been entirely different. As matters stand the facts are entirely distinguishable and the ruling has no bearing whatsoever on the points that arise in the present case.

The question then arises as to whether the part of the recommendation made by the Sessions Judge to the effect that the complainant should now be given an opportunity to show cause in pursuance of the order passed on 21st July 1928 should be accepted or not. Now it is quite clear from a perusal of S. 250, Criminal P. C., that the intention of the legislature is that it is the Magistrate who deals with the substantive case and makes the order of acquittal or discharge who has got to deal with the cause that is shown as to why compensation should not be awarded. The word "forthwith" used in sub-S. (1), S. 250, the words "the Magistrate" appearing in sub-S. (2) and (2-A) and the provisions contained in sub-S. 2 which regulate the amount of compensation as being dependent on the class to which the Magistrate who has dealt with the substantive case belongs unmistakably point to the conclusion that the legislature never intended that one Magistrate should deal with the case and make the order for calling upon the complainant to show cause and that another Magistrate may pass the order for compensation. Now in the present case an unfortunate circumstance has happened, namely, that the trial Magistrate Mr. Basanta Kumar Banerji has been transferred from the district. I say unfortunate, because as far as I can make out from the perusal of the order he passed by which he acquitted the accused in the case in which Rajaram was the complainant that there was very little justification for the complaint that was filed by the complainant, but the clear intention of the law makes it impossible to make an order directing that the matter should be dealt with by another Magistrate.

I am, therefore, of opinion that this reference should be accepted. The order for compensation against which it is directed should be set aside and it is further ordered that there should be no further proceeding under the section against the complainant. The compensation, if paid, will be refunded to the plainant.

Criminal Appeal No. 886 of 1928, Decided on 20th March 1929 against an order of Addl. Sess. Judge, 24-Parganas.

(a) Evidence Act, S. 33—Application is essentially matter of discretion of Court.

It is impossible to lay down hard and fast rule for the application of S. 33. Each case must depend upon its own facts and the matter is essentially one for the exercise of discretion on the part of the Court applying it. [P 766 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 297—Charge to jury—Judge should place before jury in coherent manner salient points arising on evidence adduced—Evidence of witnesses need not be incorporated.

In a trial by jury it is an entirely wrong view to hold that it is the duty of the Judge to incorporate in his charge the evidence of witnesses who have already given their depositions before the jury. The duty of the Judge is to place before the jury in a coherent manner the salient points arising on the evidence adduced before the jury and further it is no part of the Judge to make a second speech on behalf of the defence. [P 766 C 2]

Sasi Sekhar Bose and Tarapada Banerjee—for Appellants.

C. C. Ghose, J.—The appellants before us were charged before the learned Additional Sessions Judge of the Twenty-four Parganas and a jury under Ss. 366 and 376, I. P. C. They were convicted on an unanimous verdict of the jury under the said sections and sentenced each to suffer rigorous imprisonment for five years under S. 376, I. P. C. and for three years under S. 366, I. P. C., the sentences to run concurrently.

The short facts are as follows: On the night of 25th April 1928, it appears that Uttami Dassi's husband was absent from home and so also was his brother. Taking advantage of that fact, 8 or 10 persons including the present accused are alleged to have entered the house of Uttami Dassi and forcibly carried her off. They also attempted to seize Uttami's sister, but the latter managed to run away. It is further alleged that these men took Uttami to the bank of the river near by, threatened her that she would be put to death, beat her and forcibly ravished her, and then left her in the fields. Uttami was found by her son Haripada, her sister, who is P. W. 3 and a neighbour, who is P. W. 4. She was taken home by these persons and nursed. She recovered after sometime, and related what had happened. She mentioned the names of the present accused. The Matbars of the village being informed about the occurrence came to her house but it appears that these men were at first against any information being lodged with the police. Their reason was that some of their relatives and friends were involved in the case. Uttami Dassi, however, managed to send Haripada to the thana on 27th April 1928, and the latter lodged an information with the police. A police investigation followed and the accused along with several others who were absconding, were sent up for trial.

The first point urged on behalf of the appellants is that the learned Sessions Judge ought not to have admitted in evidence in his Court the deposition of a witness named Sripati Maity under S. 33 Evidence Act. Now the matter stands thus. This witness Sripati Maity had given evidence on behalf of the Prosecution in the committing Magistrate's Court. In the Sessions Court, he was not available and the police officer in charge of the case stated on good authority before the learned Sessions Judge that enquiries had been made about the whereabouts of Sripati but he could not be traced. Thereupon the deposition of Sripati in the Committing Magistrate's Court was admitted in evidence by the learned Sessions Judge. In my opinion the learned Sessions Judge was entirely right in admitting in evidence the deposition of Sripati in the Committing Magistrate's Court. Sufficient foundation for the admission in evidence of that deposition had been laid in view of the evidence of the police officer who is P. W. 9 and it appears to me that the learned Sessions Judge had reasons to be satisfied that the requirements of the statute had been complied with. It is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule for the application of S. 33, Evidence Act. Each case must depend upon its own facts and the matter is essentially one for the exercise of discretion on the part of the Sessions Judge. I am reluctant to say a single word which will have the effect of fettering

the exercise of such discretion. It is sufficient for me to observe that no attempt was made on behalf of the defence to challenge in any way the statements made by the police officer in the course of his deposition in the Sessions Court relating to the whereabouts of Sripati and if that was so, there was nothing wrong or illegal in what was done by the learned Sessions Judge. This point fails and must be negatived. The second and the third points relate to the question as to whether the evidence of two witnesses named Haripada Das and Preo Bera had been fully placed before the jury or not. The learned Sessions Judge's charge to the jury had been read out to us in its entirety and I am not prepared to say that the charge is in any way defective so far as the evidence of these two witnesses is concerned. I think it is an entirely wrong view to hold that it was the duty of the learned Sessions Judge to incorporate in his charge the evidence of witnesses who had already given their depositions before the jury. The duty of the Sessions Judge is to place before the jury in a coherent manner the salient points arising on the evidence adduced before the jury and in my opinion it is no part of the duty of the Sessions Judge to make a second speech on behalf of the defence. In this case, I have examined the passages in the evidence of these two witnesses to which attention has been drawn by the learned advocate for the appellants and I am satisfied that no prejudice, whatsoever, has been caused to the appellant in any way by the manner in which the charge was framed by the learned Sessions Judge. There is no substance in these two points and they must also be negatived.

There is one small point which has been urged and it is this: that the Chemical Examiner's report should have been placed before the jury. Now there is no evidence on the present record that any report from the Chemical Examiner was at all obtained by the police. It may be and probably is the fact that the Chemical Examiner was asked to examine a certain piece of cloth but it does not appear that the Chemical Examiner ever sent in his report or that such report was available to the prosecution and that such report has been withheld by the prosecution.

I am of opinion that there is no substance whatsoever in this appeal and it must be dismissed. The appellants, - if on bail, must surrender to their bail bonds and serve out the remainder of the sentences imposed on them.

Criminal Appeals Nos. 809 and 920 of 1928, Decided on 28th March 1929, from order of Addl. Sess. Judge, Tipperah, D/-15th September 1928.

Penal Code, Ss. 342, 368 and 109—Conviction of minor offenders under Ss. 368 and 109 after acquittal of principals under S. 342 is not sustainable.

Conviction of some persons who, as minor offenders, are charged as engaged in a conspiracy to conceal a minor girl after abduction, under S. 368 read with S. 109, after having acquitted the principal offenders under S. 342 is not sustainable. [P 767 C 2]

Mrityunjoy Chatterjee and Bholanath Roy—for Appellants.

Khundkar—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—This is a case which has had reference to the abduction from her home of a minor girl and the accused Muktal, it is clear, wanted to marry her. There were eight persons put on their trial of whom we are concerned with four only. Muktal has been given five year's rigorous imprisonment and Imamuddin has been given two years' rigorous imprisonment under S. 366, I. P. C., that is, abducting a woman to compel her to marry. The other two Tobdul and Sundar Ali have been fined Rs. 200 each upon a conviction under S. 368 read with S. 109, I. P. C. and the charge against them was that they were engaged with Muktal and Imamuddin in a conspiracy wrongfully to conceal Jobeda Khatun—an abducted girl—knowing her to have been abducted in pursuance of which conspiracy she was actually wrongfully concealed. All the accused were charged under S. 342, I. P. C. (wrongful confinement) and all were expressly acquitted under that section.

Mr. Chatterji on behalf of Tobdul and Sundar Ali points out that, if there was no conviction of Muktal and Imamuddin or anybody else under S. 342, I. P. C. and no conviction or even accusation against them under S. 368, I. P. C., then it cannot be that the conviction of Tobdul and Sundar Ali upon this charge is sustainable. By S. 109, it is premised that the offence abetted is an offence which has been committed. If persons who are said to have been the principals are acquitted under S. 342, it cannot, therefore, be right, according to Mr. Chatterji's argument, to convict the others under S. 368 read with S. 109. That argument is logical and there is no escape from it. Mr. Chatterji has pointed out that abetment does not necessarily involve that the offence has been committed; but, in this case, it would not seem right merely to alter the conviction to one under S. 368 read with S. 116 because in this case we have to consider that the abetment alleged is an abetment by conspiracy; and, if we were to alter the charge in the manner suggested, we would probably have to retry the case from an angle at which it has not yet been examined. That too, if I may say so, appears to me to be a sound argument.

Mr. Khundker for the Crown points out that what is really wrong in this trial is that, on the prosecution case which has been accepted by the jury, the principal accused Muktal and Imamuddin ought never to have been acquitted under S. 342 and that certainly it would seem paradoxical to say in this case that the jury accepted the prosecution case for any purpose and still were able to find that Muktal and Imamuddin had not committed an offence under S. 342.

In these circumstances, no doubt there has been a miscarriage of justice in that sense; that is to say, the jury having acquitted people under S. 342, it becomes impossible to sustain what otherwise is a perfectly good charge against Tobdul and Sundar Ali under S. 368 read with S. 109. In this case, it is to be observed that Tobdul and Sundar Ali have been fined Rs. 200 each and I am not minded to enter a conviction for any purpose where the jury have entered an acquittal merely to get over a technical difficulty. I doubt extremely whether in a case of this sort the powers of the Court under

S. 537, Criminal P. C., could be employed so as to straighten the matter out. I am of opinion that the correct course in this case is to give effect to the argument of Mr. Chatterji and to acquit Tobdul and Sundar Ali. They will, therefore, be acquitted and the fines, if paid, will be refunded.

As regards Muktal and Imamuddin, the only question which arises is the question of sentence. I do not know that this is as bad a case as one often met with; but, at the same time, there remains the fact that this girl of 13 or 14 years of age was gagged and taken away by force and very elaborate steps were apparently taken to induce her to marry Muktal. I do not think it necessary to interfere with the discretion of the learned Sessions Judge and the appeal of Muktal and Imamuddin must be dismissed.

Per Suhrawardy, J.—Order passed by a Sub-Divisional Officer under the Alluvial Lands Act directing that some huts which were erected on the disputed char were to be sold and the sale proceeds credited to the treasury, is not passed in judicial capacity but as an executive officer and as such cannot be revised by the High Court.

Langford James and Asitaranjan Ghose—for Petitioners.

Mukund Behary Mullick—for Opposite Parties.

Suhrawardy, J.—This rule is directed against an order purported to have been passed by the Sub-Divisional Officer of Tangail under the Bengal Alluvion Lands Act (5 of 1920) directing that some huts which were erected by the second party on the disputed char were to be sold and the sale proceeds credited to the treasury. This rule should in my opinion be discharged on several grounds. The first is that the order passed by the Sub-Divisional Officer is an order passed in his capacity as Collector as defined in the Act. That being so, it is an order which is passed not in his judicial capacity but as an executive officer invested with certain powers under the Act. That an order passed under the Act is an executive order is indicated by certain provisions in the Act itself. It is laid down that in attaching a char the Collector has to determine what costs are to be paid by any party and any person who is aggrieved by such order must prefer an appeal to the Commissioner. Thus it is clear that the order passed by the Collector is not a judicial order but an executive one.

The second ground on which this rule should fail is that conceding that it is a judicial order, it is not an order which can be revised by the Criminal Bench of this Court under S. 439, Criminal P. C. I am not prepared to say that it is an order which can be revised by the civil side of this Court but that is the proper side to approach in matters like this.

The third ground which seems to settle the matter is that there is no indication in the Act that an order under it is open to appeal or revision by any Court, civil or criminal. The Collector acts in his ordinary capacity of a revenue officer and is not subject to the control of ordinary Courts. Moreover, considering the circumstances of this case it seems to me that it is a very proper order to secure tranquillity in the locality.

The rule fails and is discharged.

Graham, J.—I agree; but I prefer to base my decision solely upon the ground that the order complained of having been passed by the Collector in his capacity as such, we have no jurisdiction to deal with the matter in the exercise of our criminal jurisdiction.

The definition in the Act does not really define gaming but merely indicates what it is like and excludes wagering or betting on some particular occasion and in some particular circumstances and also excludes "lottery." To bring the case within the meaning of "gaming" all that has to be seen is whether the game that was going on was for money which was staked on the result of the game which was to be lost or won according to the success or failure of the person who has staked provided of course that it was not a lottery: 31 Cal. 542; 39 Cal. 968; 40 Mad. 556, Ref. The question as to whether a game is one of pure chance or one in which the element of skill preponderates are no longer pertinent under the Act as it stands now. What is to be seen is whether the game is covered by what is meant by "gaming"; if it is, it is hit by the Act unless it is a game of mere skill: 6 C. L. J. 708, Expl. [P 769 C 2]

Khoda Bux and Satindra Nath Mukerji—for Applicants.

Judgment.—This is, reference made under S. 438, Criminal P. C., by the Sessions Judge of Hooghly recommending that the conviction of 15 persons, one Arjoon Singh and 14 others, under S. 4, Act 2 (B. C.) of 1867 and the fine imposed thereunder may be set aside. The case has been argued before me in great detail on behalf of the petitioners as well as on behalf of the Crown.

The only question that arises for determination in the case is whether the game that was being played at the time when the petitioners were arrested was "gaming" within the meaning of the Act. The definition in the Act does not really define "gaming," but merely indicates what it is like and excludes wagering or betting on some particular occasion and in particular circumstances and also excludes a "lottery." In Hari Singh v. Emperor (1) it was held that a game of skill is not an offence under the Act but a game of chance is, and that if a game involves a certain amount of skill as well as a certain amount of chance, if the chief element of the game is skill it is not an offence. This decision was passed in 1907. It was incidentally approved of in Bengali Shah v. Emperor (2). In Ram Newaz Lal v. Emperor (3) the learned Judges referring to S. 10 of the Act which said:

"Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this Act contained shall be held to apply to billiards, whist or any other game wherever played"

observed:

"The criterion is not whether it is a game of mere chance, but whether it is a game of mere skill and we may point out that the word "mere" is used in legal language in its meaning derived from its Latin origin and imports the meaning of "pure skill" . . . . . There is a further point which we wish to set out and which was not apparently discussed in Hari Singh's case and that is that the games of skill referred to in S. 10 obviously refer to a game where there are two parties pitting their skill against each other."

The Allahabad High Court dealing with a case under S. 12, Act 3 of 1867 in which Hari Singh's case appears to have been cited held that the words of the Bengal Act were materially different and held that under the other Act the conviction was all right as the game was not a game of mere skill. Bengal Act 2 of 1867, however, was amended by Bengal Act 4 of 1913 by which amongst other alterations S. 10 was repealed and a new section numbered 11-A was introduced which is in these words:

"Nothing in this Act shall apply to any game of mere skill wherever played."

The result, therefore, is that we are left with the definition of "gaming" such as it is in S. 1 and the provision exempting games of mere skill as contained in S. 11-A. The question as to whether a game is one of pure chance or one in which the element of skill preponderates—considerations which were thought important under the Act as it stood before—are no longer pertinent. We have to see whether the game is covered by what is meant by "gaming"; if it is, it is hit by the Act unless it is a game of mere skill.

As regards the definition of "gaming"

(1) [1907] 6 C. L. J. 708.

(2) [1913] 40 Cal. 702=20 I. C. 612=17 C. W. N. 883.

(3) [1914] 15 Cr. L. J. 276=23 I. C. 484.

it has been already said that it is hardly a definition. Etymologically it is equivalent to playing a game. In the Imperial Dictionary gaming is defined as :

"to use cards or other instruments according to rules with a view to win money or other things waged upon the issue of the contest."

In Murray's Dictionary it is defined as "the action of playing at games for stakes." In Wharton's Law Lexicon it is defined as :

"the act or practice of playing or following any game, particularly those of chance."

In Hari Singh v. Jadunandan Singh (4) Stephen, J., incidentally laid stress on the accompaniment of stakes or betting as the distinguishing element of "gaming." In Ram Pertap v. Emperor (5) where the meaning of "gaming" pure and simple was in question, it was explained as meaning :

"playing at any game for money, which is staked on the result of the game, i. e., which is to be lost or won according to the success or failure of the person who has staked."

In the case of Emperor v. Musa (6) Oldfield, J., said that "the existence of a stake, not the character of the game as one of skill or chance, is regarded as constituting the distinction between playing a game and gaming," and Sadasiva Ayyar, J., observed :

"I do not think that the question of chance or skill enters into the connotation of the verb."

I entirely agree in this view. In my judgment, all that has to be seen in this case is whether the game that was going on was for money which was staked on the result of the game which was to be lost or won according to the success or failure of the person who has staked, provided of course that it was not a lottery.

The version of the game given by the witnesses for the defence, a version by putting forward which the accused obtained sanction or permission to play—is one that is perfectly understandable. That perhaps would amount to a "lottery" as D. W. No. 2 says, but it is not necessary to express any definite opinion on this question as this, according to the prosecution, was not the game that was being played on this occasion. I may, however, mention in passing that I do not understand the sense of this game, because called by whatever name it may either as "the American sale system" or the "Jullendhur play" it fetches nothing to the principals for whose benefit the game is meant to go on. According to the defence as I understand it, each player has to put in four annas in lieu of which all the players get articles worth ranging from four annas to Re. 1-8-0. It may be that the agents get a commission, but the principals undergo a loss of a good decent sum at each round of the play. I need not dilate further on it as I do not believe that that was the kind of game that was ever seriously pursued.

As regards the game which the prosecution allege was being played on the occasion Mr. Basu has made several attempts before me to construct it out of the evidence of the prosecution witnesses, but I must say I am not satisfied that he has been successful. The witnesses examined in the case have not been made to describe the play in detail or at any rate in a sensible way and I entirely agree in the opinion which the D. W. 1 has expressed, viz., that the description as given by the witnesses is "nonsense" and in what the Sessions Judge says namely, that their evidence as recorded is "extremely incomprehensible." It does not signify much that one witness says that on one occasion he lost Rs. 2, for we have to see what was done not on one occasion but on the present occasion. The putting out of the light on the arrival of the police though significant, cannot be held as supplying all lacunæ in the evidence. I share in the view which the Sessions Judge has expressed, namely, that the offence has not been proved. The consequence is perhaps regrettable but a case of this sort should certainly have been more adequately tried.

It may be noted here that there is on the record the warrant which was issued by the Superintendent of Police for the search that took place. It is not possible to avail of the presumption that the law provides for a case like this, because the warrant has not been marked as a piece of evidence against the accused persons. Moreover, it may again be that such presumption, even if it did arise, has been rebutted by the fact that the presence of the dice, etc., is accounted for by the kind of game which the de-

JACK AND MITTER, JJ.

S. a Pleader, In the matter of— Petitioner.

Civil Rule No. 223 of 1929, Decided on 28th March 1929.

(a) Legal Practitioner's Act (18 of 1897), S. 12—Conviction for criminal offence—High Court can proceed without enquiry.

Conviction of a legal practitioner is sufficient without any further enquiry to justify the High Court in taking proceedings under S. 12. It is not permissible to go behind the conviction and the pleader cannot be allowed to have indirect appeals against the judgment of conviction. [P 772 C 2]

(b) Legal Practitioner's Act (18 of 1897), S. 12—High Court has absolute discretion.

The use of word "may" in S. 12 after the words "the High Court" shows that the discretion of the High Court in each particular case is absolute. [P 772 C 2]

(c) Legal Practitioner's Act (18 of 1897), S. 12—Conviction—Circumstances of mitigation—Less severe punishment awarded.

A legal practitioner was convicted of criminal breach of trust and abetment thereof, in respect of certain moneys of a client. It was found that he was to a certain extent the victim of his senior. He paid the amount of defalcation after his conviction. High Court in consideration of the fact that he was victim of circumstances and had expressed his repentance and assured to lead honourable life suspended the practitioner for one year. [P 773 C 1]

*H. D. Bose, Sarat Kumar Mitter and Anil Chandra Roy Choudhuri—*for Petitioner.

Jack, J.—By this rule under S. 12, Legal Practitioners' Act, S. a Pleader, has been directed to show cause why he should not be suspended or dismissed on the ground that he has been convicted of two offences of breach of trust and abetment of the same implying a defect of character unfitting him to be a pleader.

He does not dispute the accuracy of the recitals of the two judgments of the Chief Presidency Magistrate in the cases in which he was convicted.

From these we find that Babu A. C. Chundra his co-accused in one of these cases was previously prosecuted for embezzlement and had been declared an insolvent and prohibited by the Court from withdrawing money on behalf of clients from the Court. Knowing all this S withdrew in each of these cases a large sum on account of a client of Babu A. C. Chunder by virtue of a power of attorney in which his name was entered unknown to the client. These sums were not paid to the clients and hence his conviction in these two cases.

Further it appears that when asked for the money he told various untruths to explain the delay in payment.

In his application to be allowed to resume practice in the Small Cause Court he urged (i) that he always acted bona fide under the direction of his senior (i. e., his co-accused in one case, Babu A. C. Chundra) little knowing that he would be put to such trouble, and now repents his extreme indiscretion; (ii) that he has paid up the amount of the defalcations; (iii) that he has already suffered considerably through his prosecution and conviction.

These pleas indicate that he scarcely seems to appreciate the extent of moral delinquency indicated by his conduct. Such conduct is not compatible, as he seems to imagine, with bona fides and is not merely a matter of indiscretion. That he should have thought such pleas justified in the circumstances seems in itself an indication that his present character unfits him to be a member of an honourable profession and that he is not a man to whom the affairs of clients could be safely entrusted. His learned advocate very wisely does not now seek to justify his conduct though he still seems anxious to put most of the blame on his co-accused.

He has, it is true, since he was convicted paid up the amount of the defalcations and, putting the most favourable interpretation on this, some credit must be given to him for restoration of the amounts embezzled. But the fact that he did not act in a straightforward manner after the defalcations occurred is very much against him. An order of dismissal seems almost to be demanded in the interests of the profession and of the litigant public. So much so that it is with some hesitation that we refrain from ordering that his name be struck off the roll of pleaders and adopt the alternative course suggested in the rule. Both the Chief Judge of the Small Cause Court and the Chief Presidency Magistrate regard as a mitigating circumstance, the fact that he was apparently led astray by Babu A. C. Chundra, and in this view of the case we are disposed to treat him leniently in the hope that when he resumes practice he will have been so impressed with the heinousness of such conduct that nothing of the kind will recur. We accordingly order that S be suspended from practice as a pleader for one year from this date.

Mitter, J.—This rule was issued by the Full Court by virtue of the powers vested in the High Court by S. 12, Legal Practitioners' Act (Act 18 of 1879) by which S, a pleader practising in the Calcutta Small Cause Court, was called upon to show cause why he should not be suspended or dismissed on the ground that the offences of which he was convicted imply a defect of character which unfits him to be a pleader.

It appears that the pleader was charged with aiding and abetting another pleader Amar Chandra Chandra in committing breach of trust of a sum of Rs. 1,002 withdrawn on 14th November 1925 by the said Chandra from the Court, the sum being due to one Bholaram Kundalal. He was convicted under S. 406 109, I. P. C., by the Chief Presidency Magistrate and was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six weeks. He was also charged under S. 409, I. P. C., with criminal breach of trust for misappropriation of a sum of rupees 1,350 drawn on behalf of his client one Sudarshan Chandra Mallik and he was sentenced to another six weeks' imprisonment on this charge. The pleader moved the High Court and C. C. Ghose, J. and Gregory, J., reduced the sentences observing in their judgment that he has tried to make amends after his conviction. Mr. H. D. Bose has appeared on behalf of the pleader and has argued that the money misappropriated had been paid up and that as the pleader was a junior pleader of only six years' standing and that as regards the first offence the Presidency Magistrate observed in his judgment that he was to some extent the victim of the co-accused Chandra a merely nominal punishment should be given. When a pleader does an act which involves dishonesty it is for the interest of the suitors that the Court should interpose and prevent a man guilty of such misconduct from acting as pleader of the Court. In this case the pleader had been proceeded against criminally and has been convicted of breach of trust and abetment of the same and upon those convictions being brought to our notice it is the bounden duty of the Court to act. It is not permissible to us to go behind the conviction nor has learned counsel for the pleader asked us to do so. In our opinion the convictions followed by the sentences were sufficient without further enquiry to justify the High Court in taking proceedings under S. 12 of the Act, for it is now firmly established that the pleader cannot be allowed to have indirect appeals against the judgment of the Chief Presidency Magistrate confirmed by the High Court: see in the matter of Rajendra Nath Mukerjee (1). Where a pleader has been convicted of criminal offences for misconduct committed strictly in his professional character that prima facie at all events renders him unfit to be a member of the honourable profession. I do not, however, mean to say that wherever a pleader has been convicted of a criminal offence the Court is bound to strike him off the roll. The use of the word 'may' in S. 12 after the words 'the High Court' shows that the discretion of the Court in each particular case is absolute. In this connexion the following observations of Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls are instructive and may be usefully referred to:

"Where a man has been convicted of a criminal offence, that prima facie at all events does make him a person unfit to be a member of the honourable profession. That must not be carried to the length of saying that wherever a solicitor has been convicted of a criminal offence the Court is bound to strike him off the roll. That was argued on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society in the case of In re, a Solicitor, Ex parte Incorporated Law Society (2). It was there contended that where a solicitor had been convicted of a crime it followed as a matter of course that he must be struck off but Baron Pollock and Manisty, J., held that although his being convicted of a crime prima facie made him liable to be struck off the roll, the Court had a discretion and must inquire into what kind of a crime it is of which he has been convicted, and the Court may punish him to a less extent than if he had not been punished in the criminal proceeding. As to striking off the roll, I have no doubt that the Court might in some cases say, 'under these circumstances we shall do no more than admonish him'; or the Court might say 'we shall do no more than admonish him and make him pay the costs of the application'; or the Court might suspend him or the Court might strike him off the roll. The discretion of the Court in each particular case is absolute. I think the law as to the power of the Court is quite clear": see in re, Weare (3).

Bearing these observations in mind let us consider what are the circumstances of mitigation in this case. There is the fact that he has paid the sums withdrawn by him. On the other hand it is to be noticed that the repayment was after the discovery of the fraud. If he had spontaneously come forward and acknowledged the truth and of his own accord had made good the loss his clients had sustained through the embezzlement in question I think that would have entitled him to much more favourable consideration than the mere fact of his payment on the discovery of the fraud. He paid the money more for the purpose of protecting himself from the consequences of his misconduct rather than from any contrition on his part and desire to make good the mischief he had done. But still taking into consideration the facts that he has paid the money, that he was to some extent the victim of circumstances in that he associated himself with his senior pleader whose conduct was known not to be above board, that he has conducted himself well and had done nothing wrong since his last offence that he through his counsel has expressed his repentance and has given us the assurance that he would lead an honourable life henceforth we think we are not called upon to go the extent of striking him off the roll; but we cannot pass the case over without marking our sense of the misconduct of the pleader in the two instances of misappropriation which are found to have taken place. The least that we can do is to say that he must be suspended from practising as a pleader for the period of one year from this date. For these reasons I agree with my learned brother in the order which he proposes to make.

Asaduzzaman and Jnana Nath Boral—for Opposite Party.

Mukerji, J.—The petitioners who have been convicted under S. 426, I. P. C., have obtained the present rule upon three grounds. Two of these grounds relate to the summary dismissal of the appeal and they purport to state that the judgment of dismissal was wrong as no sufficient reasons have been given therefor. This argument cannot be supported in view of the fact that no reasons need be recorded in support of the summary dismissal of an appeal. The third ground complains of the prejudice that has been occasioned to the petitioners by reason of the fact that while they were charged with an offence under S. 379, I. P. C., they have been convicted under S. 426, I. P. C. This conviction for an offence with which the petitioners were not charged, however, has not been to the prejudice of the petitioners. It is clear that they would not have liked a conviction under S. 379, I. P. C., to justify which there are ample findings in the judgment of the trial Court, any more than a conviction under S. 426, I. P. C. In any event, the Magistrate having found that the kalai that was cut and taken away was unripe, the conviction for mischief is fully justified. The rule is discharged.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 18, R. 18—It is not desirable to order scene before accident to be re-enacted in local inspection—Workmen's Compensation Act.

It is not a desirable thing for the Commissioner to order the parties, in local inspection to re-enact the scene just before an accident in which the workman claiming compensation is alleged to have lost his arm, to decide the question whether the machine was in motion or not when the workman began the work of cleaning it. It is common knowledge that when an accident has happened it is very difficult to recall every little incident that happened just before the accident as the parties were not working anticipating an accident. [P 774 C 2]

(b) Workmen's Compensation Act (1923), S. 30—Appeal lies when finding is based upon no evidence.

Where the finding is based upon no evidence, a substantial question of law arises and an appeal lies. [P 775 C 1]

Pannalal Chatterjee—for Applicant.Lalit Mohan Sanyal—for Opposite Party.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal against an order of the learned Commissioner under the Workmen's Compensation Act dismissing the application made by a workman who had been injured by his arm being torn off by a machine while in the service of the respondent. His case was that he was cleaning jams by putting his arm into the machine when another, a boy named Panchu who was employed under the respondent, put the machinery in motion and the result was that his hand was torn off above the arm. He asked for compensation of a lump sum of Rs. 882. The learned Commissioner dismissed his claim. Two witnesses were examined on behalf of the appellant before the learned Commissioner and one witness was examined on behalf of the respondent. Two issues were framed by the learned Commissioner. One refers to the fact whether the accident arose out of the employment. There is no question that that issue should be decided in favour of the appellant and the learned Commissioner has apparently done so. Issue 2 was:

"Was the accident directly attributable to the wilful disobedience of the workman of a rule expressly framed for the purpose of securing the safety of the workman namely not to work on the machine while it is in motion."

The petitioner stated that he was cutting away the tangled thread with a knife putting his hand through the pinion. His case was that the machine was at rest at the time and not in motion and that the boy Panchu who was either a spinner or a shifter started the machine without warning, with the result that the accident happened. There is no doubt that this man was cleaning the machine. The question really is whether the machine was in motion or not when this man actually began the work of cleaning the machine. The learned Commissioner visited the locality; but he visited it not for the purpose of understanding the evidence that was given before him, but he went there after the examination-in-chief of two witnesses for the applicant but before they were cross-examined. The learned Commissioner seems to have asked the parties to re-enact the scene just before the accident happened. It seems to us that it is not a desirable thing to do on a local inspection. It is common knowledge that when an accident has happened it is very difficult to recall every little incident that happened just before the accident. The parties were not working anticipating an accident. The use, therefore, made of the local inspection does not commend itself to us.

It appears next that a suggestion was made at the time of the cross-examination of the applicant that Mr. Mahong, the Spinning Superintendent of the machinery, came and warned the appellant as he was cleaning the machinery when in motion. The appellant repudiated that suggestion and he said that it would be dangerous to do so. It seems to us that a man must be demented to put his arm through a moving machine. How can that be done it is difficult to imagine. Mr. Mahong does not say that he saw the applicant cleaning the machinery when it was in motion. He only says that he spoke to the applicant about the guard being unfastened and away from machine. That rather supports the story of the applicant that the machinery was not then in motion. The next thing is that Panchu who was brought into Court by the opposite party and exhibited before the Commissioner was not examined. The learned advocate for the opposite party says that it was the duty of the applicant to examine him. It is difficult to say that it is so, because Panchu is accused of having done the thing which caused injury to the applicant and certainly the applicant would not expect that Panchu would support his story, if that was a true story. The learned Commissioner dismissed the claim on the ground, first, that Panchu must have been so close to the applicant as practically to touch him at the time of starting the machinery. Assuming that to be so, there is nothing in the evidence that Panchu could not have started the machinery through inadvertence. The learned Judge really disposed of the case in two sentences, where he says that the evidence subsequently taken on oath confirmed his view that the story of the claimant is incredible.

We do not find anything in the record of the evidence taken to support this finding. The Commissioner again finds that there can be no doubt that the machine was in motion when he (the applicant) tried to clean the jam. There is no evidence to support this finding. As the finding is based upon no evidence, that is a substantial question of law which entitles the applicant to maintain this appeal. We, therefore, set aside the decision of the learned Commissioner and decree the appeal. As there is no question raised in the Court below or in this Court as to the reasonableness of the damage claimed, we decree that the appellant should get Rs. 882 as compensation for the loss of his hand with costs in this Court as well as in the Court below. We assess the hearing-fee in this Court at three gold mohurs.

Decided on 16th August 1929.

Criminal P. C., S. 109 (a)—Application.

It is an entire mistake to read Cl. (a), S. 109 as applying to any person who takes a step to conceal himself in the sense of concealing his presence in the way in which a criminal conceals his presence when he goes in the dark or by a deserted road, or by some other secret means to commit a crime in his neighbourhood: A. I. R. 1927 All. 50, Foll. [P 776 C 1]

*Upendra Kumar Roy—*for Petitioners.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the accused men have been bound down under S. 109, Criminal P. C., and they have been ordered rigorous imprisonment in default of their giving security. It appears that these two men were found not very far from their home in a place outside a village and there is evidence to show that they were bent upon committing burglary at night, one man was found in possession of a sindh-kati and a pair of tin-cutters and the other of a bunch of keys and there can be little doubt these people were outside the village in which they lived for the purpose of committing burglary. They were seen to be approaching a certain house and at the barking of a dog they lay quiet and sometime afterwards they attempted to approach again and in these circumstances they were arrested and they were charged as being people who were taking precautions to conceal their presence within the local limits of the Magistrate's jurisdiction and that there was reason to believe that they were taking such precautions with a view to commit an offence. It appears that they were trying to conceal themselves from persons in the house and from anybody who might come to pass that way, and there is no doubt that they were taking such precautions with a view to commit an offence. But has this anything to do with the meaning of S. 109? In my opinion, it has nothing whatsoever to do with the meaning of S. 109. The first thing to be noticed is that this is not a section which constitutes certain conduct a crime. It is not a section which gives authority to arrest somebody who otherwise could not have been arrested. The section says that where a Magistrate receives information of certain kind he may require the person to show cause why he should not give security. Looking at it from that point of view the Magistrate is supposed to have had an information that there were persons who were taking precautions to conceal the fact that they were present within the local limits of the Magistrate's jurisdiction. The idea is that someone may be taking precaution to conceal himself within the local limits of the Magistrate's jurisdiction, not to conceal himself as one who hides from a policeman but to conceal the fact of his infesting the Magistrate's jurisdiction, and in that class of case if there is reason to believe that this is a precaution taken with a view to commit an offence, the Magistrate can require him to give security. It is reasonable in that view that Cls. (a) and (b) should be found together, treating a man who has no ostensible means of subsistence and cannot give satisfactory account of himself as a person of the same kind as a person trying to escape notice and to inhabit the locality without his presence in the locality becoming known, and doing this for the purpose of committing an offence. Authority on this point has been cited to us in the case of Reshu v. Emperor (1), Piru v. Emperor (2) and Emperor v. Bhairon (3). The exposition of the law given in the latter case is the correct exposition of the meaning of Cl. 1. It is quite true that Cl. 1, S. 109, is not likely to come into operation every day. That is no reason why it should be applied to fill up any gap that there may be in the criminal law, or in a case in which it does not apply. The learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court say:

"In our view it is an entire mistake to read that clause as applying to any person who takes steps to conceal himself, in the sense of concealing his presence in the way in which a criminal conceals his presence when he goes in the dark or by a deserted road, or by some other secret means to commit a crime in his own neighbourhood."

I agree with that proposition and that is sufficient to decide this case.

In the circumstances the order made by the Magistrate must be set aside and the petitioners are discharged from the obligation of giving any security. If the prisoners are in custody they must be forthwith released.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case it is alleged that the applicant was driving a motor bus at 10-45 a. m. on 22nd October 1928 in Chowringhee Road and that he stopped the bus too suddenly in the centre of the road without warning: thereby causing another bus which was behind to dash against it. The Magistrate proposed to try this case upon the question of negligent driving. This incident happened on 22nd October 1928, and the Magistrate proposed to try the case sometime in May 1929. A case like this ought to have been tried within a week. Instead of that it was proposed to be heard months afterwards when the accused and his witnesses might be entirely unable to reconstruct their recollection as to what had happened. In this case it appears that on 1st December 1928 the Magistrate ordered that the case should be tried on 17th December. On 17th December the petitioner appeared in Court with his witnesses but neither the complainant nor his witnesses were present. Consequently the matter seems to have been adjourned sine die. Witnesses at that late stage could not be traced and the Magistrate's order was "takid." The petitioner was again served with summonses, the idea being that the police had revived the case. It appears to me that such proceedings are most lamentable proceedings. In our opinion these proceedings must be quashed and the order complained of must be set aside.

The Rule is made absolute.

Original Criminal Case, Decided on 8th March 1929.

(a) Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (3 of 1909), Ss. 103 and 104 — Offence under S. 103—Commitment to High Court Sessions is illegal—Criminal P. C., S. 254.

Due to S. 104, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act as amended read with S. 254, Criminal P. C., commitment of an accused for trial to the High Court Sessions for an offence under S. 103, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, is illegal because the case under that section is a warrant case and the maximum punishment for the offence is only two years' imprisonment: 24 Cal. 429; (1906) A. Judgment.—Girish Chandra Kundu, Sudhir Chandra Kundu and Pramatha Nath Kundu have been committed to this Court for trial upon charges under S. 103, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. A doubt as to the legality of the commitment having arisen in my mind, I have given the learned counsel for the Crown and the prisoners an opportunity of arguing the point. Though nothing has been urged on behalf of the prisoners, it is desirable that I should state my reasons for the order which I propose to make.

Before a recent amendment, the procedure prescribed by S. 104, Insolvency Act, was that the Insolvency Court should cause notice to be served upon the insolvent, and if it framed a charge against him, it should follow the procedure for the trial of warrant cases by Magistrates prescribed by Chap. 21, Criminal P. C. The Chapter of the Code relating to trials before High Courts and Courts of Sessions was not applicable to such trials. In the year 1926, S. 104 was altered and it was provided that where the insolvency Court is satisfied that there is ground for inquiring into any offence referred to in S. 103 and appearing to have been committed by the insolvent, the Court may record a finding to that effect and make a complaint of the offence in writing to a Presidency Magistrate and such Magistrate shall deal with such complaint in the manner laid down by the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898. That new section may at first sight appear to empower the Magistrate to commit the person charged with an offence under S. 103 of the Act to this Court for trial, but, as I shall show, that is not a correct view of its effect. The objects of the amendment would appear to be, firstly, to avoid the necessity of trials upon charges under S. 103 being held by the Judge by whom jurisdiction under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is exercised and, secondly, in order to bring the procedure into conformity with that prescribed by S. 476, Criminal P. C.

Section 103 provides that, on conviction, the insolvent may be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years. There is no provision for the imposition of a fine in addition to imprisonment. A case under S. 103 is a warrant case, which is defined in S. 4 (1) (w) of the Code as a case relating to an offence punishable with death, transportation or imprisonment for a term exceeding six months. S. 54, Criminal P. C., provides that if the Magistrate is of opinion that there is ground for presuming that the accused has committed an offence triable under Ch. 21, the chapter prescribing the procedure in warrant cases, which he is competent to try and which in his opinion could be adequately punished by him, he shall frame in writing a charge against the accused. There is no question as to the Magistrate's competency to try this case, nor can any question arise as to whether he can adequately punish the prisoners for the offences with which they are charged, for the reason that he may impose a sentence of imprisonment as long as any which this Court could impose. It was, therefore, the duty of the Magistrate under that section to frame a charge in writing against the accused and he had no power to commit them to this Court for trial.

Support for this view is to be found in Queen Empress v. Kayemulla Mandal (1).

(1) [1897] 24 Cal. 429=1C. W. N. 414.

That was a case under S. 147, I. P. C. which had been committed for trial to the Court of Sessions. The learned Judges, in the course of their judgment, pointed out that, as under S. 207, Criminal P. C., a Magistrate who is competent to commit a case to the Court of Sessions, can commit to that Court both cases triable exclusively by that Court and cases which in his opinion ought to be tried by that Court, the commitment of a case under S. 147 to the Court of Sessions was not necessarily illegal. The same observations apply to this case with reference to S. 207. The learned Judges, however, went on to say that there are sections which limit a Magistrate's power of commitment and that, in a warrant case, he is bound by the provisions of S. 254, which they quote and lay emphasis on the word "shall." They then pointed out that an offence under S. 147, I. P. C., is also punishable with a fine of unlimited amount while the Magistrate could impose a fine of Rs. 1,000 only. The Magistrate might, therefore, have committed the case to the Court of Sessions, if he had considered that the fine which he had the power to impose would not be an adequate punishment for the offence. That is the only distinction which can be made between that case and this case. The conclusion at which the learned Judges arrived was that as the Magistrate did not say that he considered the case to be one in which he was not competent to inflict an adequate punishment, he could not under S. 254, Criminal P. C., commit the case to the Court of Sessions. In this case, no similar considerations arise as the utmost sentence which the law allows any Court to impose is one within the competency of the Magistrate and this case, therefore, is even a stronger case than that cited. The commitment, in my judgment, was clearly illegal. The same view was taken in Emperor v. Dharam Singh (2), where Knox, J., held that the commitment of the prisoner was wrong, among other reasons, because the maximum penalty under each offence charged was one which the Magistrate could inflict. My attention has also been drawn to Emperor v. Bindeshri Goshain (3), which is a further authority for the same proposition.

(3) [1919] 41 All. 454=50 I. C. 161=17 A. L. J. 456.

The question of jurisdiction to make an order under S. 215 has been touched upon by the learned counsel for the Crown. I do not think that this presents any difficulty. Whatever may be the effect of the definition of "High Court" in S. 4 (1) (j), another and a wider definition, comprising the High Court in every jurisdiction, is substituted in Chaps. 18 and 23, Criminal P. C., (excluding Ss. 276 and 307) by S. 266. As this definition, therefore, applies to "High Court" in S. 215, there can be no doubt about the matter. The Clerk of the Crown has drawn my attention to the unreported case of Emperor v. Mahadeo Bhujia (1st Sessions on Original Criminal side decided on 21st February 1912), in which a Judge of this Court, when exercising original criminal jurisdiction, quashed a commitment and the jurisdiction seems to have been taken for granted in Phanindra Nath Mitra v. Emperor (4).

The order will be that the commitment be quashed. The record with a copy of this judgment will be returned to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, in order that he may deal with the complaint according to law. The Clerk of the Crown will communicate this order to the Chief Presidency Magistrate by letter in the course of to-day, so that, if he thinks fit, he may grant bail in anticipation of the record reaching him. The prisoners, meanwhile, will remain in custody and I direct that they be placed before the Chief Presidency Magistrate.

Judgment.—The question raised in this rule is whether Cl. (8), S. 526, Criminal P. C., applies to proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. The words in Cl. (8) as they stood before the amendment of 1923 were:

"If in any criminal case or appeal, before the commencement of the hearing &c."

By the amendment aforesaid these words have been altered into:

"If in the course of any enquiry or trial or before the commencement of the hearing of any appeal &c."

The introduction of the word "enquiry" in place of the words "any criminal case" may ordinarily be taken to have been intended for the purpose of including proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., but the rest of the clause if read properly would militate against this view. Proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., are no doubt proceedings by way of enquiry. But then the words of Cl. (8), S. 526, such as "the complainant" "the accused" and perhaps also the word "public prosecutor" would be wholly inapposite in connexion with proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. The parties to proceedings under S. 145 are described as parties in that section and use of the words "complainant" "accused" and perhaps also the word "public prosecutor" and the non-mention of the word "party" in the latter part of Cl. (8) makes it perfectly clear that it was not the intention of the legislature to include proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., within the meaning of the clause. For this reason we are of opinion that the contention that has been urged on behalf of the petitioner, which is to the effect that it was obligatory on the learned Magistrate to grant an adjournment on receipt of the application filed by the petitioner intimating to him that an application would be made for transfer under S. 526 and, asking him to adjourn the case for that purpose, should be overruled, and the rejection of that application cannot be held to have been in the violation of the provisions of Code. Apart from Cl. (8), S. 526 the petitioner had no case whatsoever because in the application that was made asking for an adjournment to enable the petitioner to move this Court for transfer no ground whatsoever was stated and also because the said application was made at a very late stage of the proceedings, after the evidence on behalf of the opposite party, which had been taken on two different dates, was closed. We are of opinion that there is no substance in this rule. It is accordingly discharged.

Penal Code, S. 500—Statements in petition to Court subject of charge—Intelligence of accused, his capacity to reason and circumstances he is in, should be considered while determining "due care" by accused.

In matter of a case under S. 500 when it is said to rest upon allegation made in petition to a Court, in determining whether due care was taken by the accused allowances should be made for the intelligence of the accused, his capacity to reason, the circumstances under which he was placed, and the occasion which necessitated his making the imputation. When the facts seem to show that the accused being a comparatively ignorant and timid man apprehending harassment by the complainant did what a man of superior intelligence and knowledge could not have done, namely presented a petition, there can be little doubt that he acted with a desire to protect himself by an appeal to the Magistrate rather than to injure others and he should not be convicted; 31 Bom.

Judgment.—The petitioner has been convicted under S. 500 I. P. C., and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 40 in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one month. There were two items forming the subject-matter of the charge. One of them was certain imputations made orally as against the complainant and the other consisted of certain statements made in a petition which the petitioner had filed before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Barrackpore. As regards the first of these items the evidence that was brought to establish it was not accepted as reliable by the trial Magistrate. The conviction is based upon the statements contained in the petition to which I have referred. Those statements are to the effect that the complainant was threatening the petitioner with assault and also with murder, imprisonment and so forth ; and that the complainant was giving out that he would institute civil as well as criminal cases against the accused and further that the complainant belonged to a gang of badmashes and goondas and the members of that gang were all conspiring together for the purpose of putting the petitioner into trouble and that for all these reasons the petitioner was apprehensive of his safety.

The learned Magistrate has recorded certain findings in his judgment in which he has dealt with the whole case very clearly and elaborately and to these I shall now refer. One line of defence taken by the petitioner was that he had himself heard the complainant and others hatching a plot against him. The learned Magistrate has held that the direct evidence that the accused gave for the purpose of establishing that he overheard a plot being hatched against him by the complainant was not reliable. The substance of the other line of defence was that there was enmity between the parties and the petitioner had reasonable ground for believing that there was such a plot. The learned Magistrate had observed, so far as this line of defence is concerned that had some reason for filing the petition, because it is probable that the petitioner feared something in the way of a litigation.”

At the same time the learned Magistrate was of opinion that the petitioner “had no justifiable grounds for wording the petition in the way that he did or at least that the contents of the petition were gross exaggerations.”

The learned Magistrate appreciated fully the difficulty of sustaining a charge under S. 500, I. P. C., upon a petition of this character presented before a Magistrate and has pertinently observed thus :

“As regards the written defamation the responsibility of the accused for stating that the complainant meant to kill him is a problem of great difficulty.”

He appreciated also that the motive of the complainant in instituting the present case was “not to vindicate himself but to injure the accused”. In the result, however, he held that the accused did not use due care in wording his petition in the way in which he had done and being of opinion that the accused had overstepped his privilege convicted him under S. 500, I. P. C.

In convicting the accused on the findings to which I have referred the learned Magistrate in my opinion has not given due weight to two important matters. In the first place it seems that there is a body of evidence proceeding from the witnesses who were examined on behalf of the defence and which to a certain extent showed that from time to time threats were uttered by the complainant or his associates, though not exactly of the same nature as was alleged in the petition which the accused filed. It may be that the witnesses who have deposed to these threats are people in whom not much confidence may be placed. This I say because of the fact that the learned Magistrate has not thought fit to make any particular reference to the evidence of these witnesses. Even then the question remains as to whether these witnesses who have now come before the Court to speak to these threats did not supply to the petitioner the information which formed the foundation of his petition and which information was to a certain extent exaggerated for the purpose of making out that there was a threat to murder the petitioner and so on. This in my opinion, is not an altogether unreasonable assumption to make and if these witnesses communicated the information to the petitioner and the petitioner apprehending that there was some risk of his life or his safety exaggerated the information that he received and put in the petition in matters which ultimately brought about this case. I am very doubtful as to whether a conviction under S. 500, I. P. C., would be maintainable.

The other matter is the important principle which should guide a Court in the matter of a case under S. 500, I. P. C., when it is said to rest upon allegations made in a complaint to a Court. That principle has been laid down in a series of decisions amongst which I propose to refer to only a few. In the case of Emperor v. Abdool Wadood (1) the High Court of Bombay in dealing with Excep. 9 to S. 499, I. P. C., and following an earlier decision of that Court in the case of Bhawoo Jivaji v. Mulji Dayal (2) observed thus ;

"Good faith in the Excep. 9 requires not, indeed, logical infallibility but due care and attention. But how far erroneous actions or statements are to be imputed to want of due care and caution must, in each case, be considered with reference to the general circumstances and the capacity and intelligence of the person whose conduct is in question. It is only to be expected that the honest conclusions of a calm and philosophical mind, may differ very largely from the honest conclusions of a person excited by sectarian zeal and untrained to habits of precise reasoning."

This principle has been accepted as well-founded by Suhrawardy, J., in the case of Promotho Nath Mukhopadhaya v. Emperor (3). In determining whether due care was taken by the accused allowances, therefore, have got to be made for the intelligence of the accused, his capacity to reason, the circumstances under which he was placed and the occasion which necessitated his making the imputations. Bearing this principle in mind, I am of opinion the learned Magistrate in considering the question as to whether there was due care and caution on the part of the accused has applied to the case a rather too exacting standard. In view of the findings to which I have referred I think this is a case in which I might say adopting the words of Markby, J., as used in the matter of a petition in Sibo Prosad Pandah, In the matter of (4) that the facts seem to me to show that the accused, a comparatively ignorant and timid man apprehending harassment by the complainant did what a man of superior intelligence and knowledge of the law could not have done, namely, presented a petition to the Magistrate but I have little doubt that he acted with a desire to protect himself by an appeal to the Magistrate rather than to injure others. I am of opinion, therefore, that it would not be right to uphold the conviction of the petitioner under S. 500, I. P. C., in the circumstances to which I have referred.

The result is that the rule is made absolute, the conviction and sentence passed on the petitioner are set aside and ordered that the fine, if paid, be refunded.

Bepin Chandra Malik and Probodh Krishna Shome—for Petitioner.

Suhrawardy, J.—In this revision application the petitioner has asked us to set aside the order of demolition of the boundary walls constructed by him in his premises passed by the Municipal Magistrate of Calcutta. The facts are that sometime in 1911 the petitioner obtained sanction to build a house and according to it he constructed the present house with boundary walls 10 feet high. Recently he raised the height of the boundary walls in order to secure the privacy of his premises to 18 feet. This he did without obtaining sanction from the Corporation. A notice was therefore served upon him under S. 363, Calcutta Municipal Act (Ben. Act 3 of 1923) and the case started against him resulted in the order complained of.

"Building" was not defined in the previous Act of 1899, but a definition has now been added by the Act of 1923. According to that definition a wall other than a boundary wall and not exceeding 10 feet in height is a building; and under the provisions of the Act, sanction has to be obtained from the Corporation before constructing any building. It is not disputed that the walls were raised to their present height of 18 feet without sanction from the Corporation; and an application subsequent to the prosecution was made for necessary sanction. The learned Municipal Magistrate has ordered demolition of the boundary walls mainly upon the ground that they were built without the sanction of the Corporation. The order passed by the learned Magistrate is in these words:

"As the 18 feet high boundary walls are unlawful, I direct that so much of those walls be demolished by the Corporation of Calcutta at owner's expense as will reduce their height to 10 feet."

Then he goes on to add:

"As it is stated that ladies would be visible by the reduction of the high walls, I have no objection to temporary screens of mats or corrugated iron sheets being put up where required until a change in the configuration of the buildings in the vicinity makes such screens unnecessary."

The ground therefore upon which the order was passed is that the building is unlawful, that is, in contravention of the provisions of the law. S. 363, Act of 1923 is not imperative inasmuch as it says that the Magistrate may make an order directing that such erection &c., &c., or so much thereof as has been executed unlawfully be demolished or altered. One of the grounds on which such an order can be passed is that the erection has not been commenced after obtaining the permission of the Corporation but the section makes it discretionary with the Magistrate to make such an order and it has been interpreted by this Court that this discretion vested in the Magistrate under this section should be exercised on an equitable consideration of all the circumstances of the case: Abdul Samad v. Corporation of Calcutta (1). In Chuni Lal Dutt v. Corporation of Calcutta (2), it was held that the power of the Municipal Magistrate under S. 449, Act of 1899, corresponding to S. 363 of the present Act is similar to the power exercised by a Court of equity in granting mandatory injunctions and therefore such power should be exercised with due regard to those rules which guide Courts of equity in granting injunctions. The learned Magistrate, it seems to me, has not considered whether the walls have as they are at present caused any inconvenience to neighbours house-owners or are otherwise undesirable from sanitary or any other point of view. The Magistrate does not exercise proper discretion when he takes into account simply the fact that the structures were put up without the sanction of the Corporation and orders their demolition. The object which the legislature had in view by making it discretionary with the Magistrate to order demolition of unauthorized structures will be defeated if it is held that unauthorized structures as such must be demolished. In my judgment the legislature has intentionally vested the Magistrate with such discretion in order that the Magistrate should take into account all the circumstances present in a particular case and then if in its judgment, it is necessary that such structures should be demolished, he should so order. In the present case the Building Inspector of the Corporation has stated (and it has been accepted by the Magistrate) that the walls are necessary for securing privacy of the premises; and further that it would not be objectionable from the municipal point of view if the petitioner put up instead of brick-built walls, matwalls or corrugated iron sheets. This view may or may not be correct but it shows from the point of view of the petitioner that these walls were necessary and that the Corporation could have no objection on the ground of inconvenience to the neighbours or on any other ground if the walls instead of bricks are made of iron-sheets.

(1) [1906] 33 Cal. 287=10 C. W. N. 182=3 O. L. J. 90.

(2) [1907] 34 Cal. 341=11 C. W. N. 30.

In the course of his judgment the learned Magistrate has referred to certain rules contained in Sch. 17 of the Act which require some spaces to be left on two sides of a building and some other rules relating to the height of a building with reference to spaces around it which must be at the angle of prescribed degrees mentioned in those rules. They are Rr. 30 and 32, Sch. 17 of the present Act. These rules and some others laying down special considerations which should prevail in allowing construction of a building were also in the repealed Act of 1899. Though by the Act of 1923 the definition of building has been introduced no change has made in these rules. Reading these rules it would appear that they were intended to affect buildings and structures dealt with by the Act of 1899 and were never intended to apply to boundary walls which are included in the term "building" by the Act of 1923. For instance there is a provision that some space should be left on both sides of a building; it can hardly apply to boundary walls for it would not be possible to leave any space on the outer side. There were other matters also dealt with by the rules which cannot apply to boundary walls. In my opinion these rules do not apply in the case of boundary walls. R. 18, Sch. 17, empowers the Corporation to allow boundary walls to be erected to any height which the Corporation may think fit and proper. This discretion is not given in the case of any other building and therefore it is clear that the rules affecting buildings properly so-called are not applicable in the case of boundary walls.

I am therefore of opinion that the learned Municipal Magistrate should not have passed his order only on the fact that these walls were raised to a height of 18 feet without the sanction of the Corporation. He should have taken into consideration the circumstances of this particular case and if in his opinion it was necessary that these walls should be removed he might under S. 363 order their demolition. If, on the other hand, as is apparent from his judgment there is no such special objection to the walls remaining in their present condition, he should not as a Court of equity order their demolition. In this view of the matter I would make the rule absolute to this extent that the order of the Municipal Magistrate of Calcutta dated 8th October 1928 should be set aside and the matter remitted to him for a consideration of the entire case and all the circumstances attending it and decide it according to law.

Graham, J.—In this case a rule was issued to show cause why an order of the Municipal Magistrate of Calcutta directing a portion of the boundary walls to be demolished should not be set aside. The facts are not disputed. The petitioner Sham Lal Khatri residing at 21½ Baranashibashi Ghose's Street erected or caused to be erected a boundary wall upon this premises to the height of 18 feet without obtaining the sanction of the Corporation. Now, that being so, it is clear that there was a breach of S. 363, Calcutta Municipal Act (3 of 1923) read with S. 3 (7) of the Act, and that the order for demolition is a valid and legal order.

But it is argued that, even if the order was a legal order, the learned Magistrate was not bound to direct the demolition of the wall and that he ought not, having regard to the facts of the case, to have made such an order. One of the reasons advanced in support of this contention is that the Magistrate has himself observed that there would be no objection to a temporary screen consisting of mats or corrugated iron sheets, and therefore it is urged that the walls although over 18 feet in height should have been allowed to remain, and the petitioner should have been merely fined, if necessary, for not obtaining previous sanction. Such temporary erections would, it may be observed, not be the same thing as a pucca wall; but the learned Magistrate may be in error in this view that they would not be open to objection. for such erections, though temporary, may amount to an interference with the rights and amenities of persons occupying houses in the immediate neighbourhood. Be that as it may, the order of the Magistrate is warranted by law and I see no reason why we should interfere with it. The petitioner is not certainly entitled to any sympathy, since he admittedly failed to comply with the law, and it was only after these proceedings were instituted that he made his belated application to the Corporation for sanction. On grounds of principle I think that we ought not to interfere unless there has been some gross or palatable failure of justice. In the exercise of our revisional jurisdiction, all that is necessary for us to see is whether there has been any error of law, or irregularity, or abuse of, or failure to exercise judicial discretion such as to justify our interference. In my judgment no such case has been made out. It has been urged that the matter should be looked at from the point of view of equity; and reference has been made to the case of Chunni Lal Dutt v. Corporation of Calcutta (2). In my opinion equitable considerations ought not to be invoked on behalf of a party who has put himself in the wrong by wilfully disregarding the law. Furthermore even if the view laid down in the reported case which I have just referred be accepted, I would hold that the Magistrate has exercised his discretion and has on a due consideration of the facts made the order for demolition. For these reasons the rule should in my judgment be discharged. (Their Lordships having differed, the case was put before Buckland, J.)

Buckland, J.—This is really a very simple matter. The petitioner without sanction and in defiance of the provisions of the Calcutta Municipal Act of 1923 and the rules of the Corporation erected a boundary wall 18 feet high though under the law he was limited to a height of 10 feet. That he has broken the law there is no question. Nor is there any doubt that the learned Magistrate had the power to make the order which he has made. It has been argued that the learned Magistrate did not properly exercise his discretion and that it has not been shown that the wall erected to the height of 18 feet would be a nuisance or, as has been said, an obstruction to the public whatever that may mean. In this connexion it is necessary to point out that there was only one witness called before the Magistrate and that was the Building Inspector. After establishing the case for the prosecution he was cross-examined on points arising out of the provisions of the Calcutta Municipal Act. It is true that he said that:

"Had the boundary walls been made 10 feet high and corrugated iron sheets properly fixed over them to the present height there would be no objection."

This appears to have been adopted by the Magistrate in making his order for he said:

"I have no objection to temporary screens of mats or corrugated iron sheets being put up where required, until a change in the configuration of the buildings in the vicinity makes such screens unnecessary."

The Magistrate in my opinion not only exercised his discretion in the matter upon the very limited materials before him but did so correctly, and his order therefore should be upheld.

I desire, however, to add, without expressing any final opinion on the matter, that so far as the Magistrate has referred to corrugated iron sheets it is doubtful whether having regard to the definition of "building" in S. 3, sub-S. 7, Calcutta Municipal Act, corrugated iron sheets superimposed upon a boundary wall 10 feet high would not in law have the same effect as the erection of a masonry structure 18 feet in height. It is also questionable whether upon a prosecution of this nature the Magistrate was competent in effect to give sanction to a structure such as he describes. The Rule is discharged.

It is discretionary with the Magistrate to act under S. 562 (1-A) having regard to all or the various matters which are there enumerated and unless it can be said that discretion has been wrongly exercised or has not been judicially exercised, High Court cannot interfere. [P 785 C 1]

Probodh Chandra Chatterjee — for Petitioner.Mrityunjoy Chattopadhyaya and Biraj Mohan Roy—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—In this case the accused was charged under S. 427, I. P. C. relating to an incident whereby the accused cut down a coconut tree belonging to the complainant. The accused set up the case of consent, but that has been negatived by the learned Magistrate. He, however, was satisfied that the offence was of a trivial nature. Accordingly he dealt with the case under the provisions of S. 562 (1-A) whereby the accused was released with an admonition.

The complainant has obtained this rule and asks that some punishment should be awarded in respect of the offence committed. It is not a matter which commends itself to us, whether we look upon it as an application made by a complainant for enhancement of sentence, or as in the nature of an appeal against an acquittal, and it is quite clear that a strong case would have to be made out on the merits before this Court would interfere at all in such a case. It is a case for the discretion of the learned Magistrate to act under this subsection having regard to all or any of the various matters which are there enumerated, and unless it can be said that that discretion has been wrongly exercised or has not been judicially exercised we should be in any event unable to interfere. It is not necessary to express any opinion as to the practice to be followed in a case such as this where the rule has been issued and at the hearing it is not supported on behalf of the Crown but is supported by the complainant only, though it is said that on that ground also the rule ought to fail.

As the rule in this case has been granted by a Bench of this Court we have gone into the case on the merits and we think that it ought to be discharged.

Criminal Revn. No. 1036 of 1928, Decided on 1st February 1929, against decision of Additional Sess. Judge, Backergunj, D/- 26th June 1928.

Criminal P. C., S. 439—Rule issued for the enhancement of sentence on application of complainant should ordinarily be discharged, if the Crown does not support the application.

Where a person was convicted on a plea of guilty and on a rule being issued for enhancement of sentence on the application of the complainant, the Crown did not appear to support it.

Held: that in such a case the rule should ordinarily be discharged unless it is clear beyond doubt that it should be made absolute [P 787 C 2]

Radhika Ranjan Guha—for Petitioner.Suresh Chandra Taluqdar—for Opposite Party.

Mukerji, J.—This rule has been issued at the instance of the complainant in a case in which the accused has been convicted by the Additional Sessions Judge of Backergunj under Ss. 304 (ii), 326 and 148, I. P. C. and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one year under S. 304 (ii), I. P. C. and for six months under S. 148, I. P. C., the sentences to run concurrently, no separate sentence under S. 326, I. P. C., being considered necessary by the learned Judge. The accused had pleaded guilty to the charges and prayed for mercy. The learned Judge in passing the sentence has observed that he had considered the circumstances under which the offences had been committed and also taken into consideration the age of the accused.

The Crown has not moved in this matter nor has the Crown appeared to back up the application for enhancement though the rule was issued upon the District Magistrate.

Apart from the reasons which I have set out in full in my judgment in Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, Bengal v. Jnanendra Nath (1), which have led me to hold that in a case like this it is not possible to enhance the sentence unless there has been a regular trial of the case in spite of the accused's plea of guilty. I think the rule should be discharged on the simple ground that the Crown has not supported it. For the view I take I have given my reasons in full in Pramatha Nath v. Ganga Charan (2).

I would discharge the rule.

Graham, J.—In this case a rule was issued to show cause why the sentence passed upon the accused Kasem Ali should not be enhanced.

The case for the prosecution was that on 13th December 1927 at about 1 p. m. one Asmat Ali, uncle of the petitioner, was going to a place called Baliakhali to receive instructions in connexion with a civil suit when he was waylaid and severely beaten by the above mentioned Kasem Ali and others, and Asmat Ali, who raised an alarm, received a spear wound in the chest from Kasem Ali which resulted in his death some 10 days later.

The accused was committed for trial to the Court of Sessions on charges under Ss. 304 (2), 326 and 148, I. P. C., and pleaded guilty. The learned Additional Sessions Judge accepting the plea convicted the accused under these three sections and sentenced him under S. 304 (ii) to one year's rigorous imprisonment and to six months' rigorous imprisonment under S. 148, I. P. C. both sentences to run concurrently. No sentence was passed under S. 326, I. P. C. Thereafter the present rule was obtained.

The question is whether the sentence is so manifestly inadequate that we ought to interfere. In my opinion there can be no doubt that the sentence which has been inflicted is altogether out of proportion to the offence committed. It seems to be clear that Asmat Ali was deliberately waylaid by a number of persons including the accused Kasem Ali the motive for the attack being civil and criminal litigation between the parties. Afsar Ali appears to have gone to the spot where Asmat Ali was lying and was thereupon speared through the chest by Kasem Ali. The medical evidence shows that it was a penetrating wound on the left side of the chest and was severe in character.

The learned Additional Sessions Judge has referred to the circumstances under which the offence was committed and accused's age as his reasons for inflicting a lenient sentence. But neither of these reasons appears to me to carry much weight. The attack seems to have been a deliberate pre-arranged affair and as there was no evidence before the Judge it is difficult to know what circumstances he was referring to.

As regards the question of age it appears that the accused's age is given as 23 so that there can be no question of leniency on that account.

In my judgment the sentence passed is inadequate and I would make the rule absolute and enhance it from 1 year to 3 years' rigorous imprisonment.

(On difference the matter came before Buckland, J.)

Buckland, J.—In this case a rule has been issued at the instance of the complainant calling upon the accused to show cause why the sentence should not be enhanced.

The accused was convicted on his plea of guilty by the Additional Sessions Judge of Bakarganj under Ss. 304 (ii), 326 and 148, I. P. C., and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment under S. 304 (ii) and six months' rigorous imprisonment under S. 148, the sentences to run concurrently. The learned Judge stated that considering the circumstances under which the offence was committed and having regard to the accused's age he accepted the accused's plea and convicted him accordingly. The rule was issued by this Court at the instance of the complainant on the ground that in considering the nature of the offence and the circumstances in which the occurrence took place the learned Sessions Judge ought to have passed a more severe sentence. Notices were issued to the person convicted as the law requires and to the District Magistrate of Bakarganj.

Upon the hearing of the rule nobody has appeared for the Crown. This is a matter of some importance because it makes it clear that the Crown has not thought it necessary in the interest of public justice either to apply or, on the matter being brought to the notice of the Court at the instance of the complainant, to appear in support of the rule. On behalf of the complainant it is stated that he is actuated solely by the desire to further the ends of justice and that nothing is further from his mind than to gratify his personal vindictiveness, but this cannot be taken literally. That the gratification of personal spite should be discouraged is no doubt the reason why the Court has consistently refused to entertain applications of this nature at the instance of a private prosecutor. At the same time there is no absolute rule, and in a case where there is manifestly a ground for interference beyond all reasonable doubt, it matters not whether the case comes before the Court of its own motion or at the instance of a private prosecutor or through any other channel whatever and the Court will interfere. This aspect of the matter was considered by my learned brothers Mukerji and Graham, JJ. in Pramatha Nath v. Ganga Charan (2), in which they differed and the case was thereupon laid before C. C. Ghose, J. who appears to have taken the view that a rule having been issued there was nothing to be done but to consider whether or not the sentence should be enhanced, which he did by restoring the sentence passed upon the person convicted by the trial Court and which had been reduced on appeal. I do not take the same view for the reason that a rule is issued ex parte and matters have to be taken into consideration upon the hearing of the rule which are not before the Court at the time when it is issued, for instance, contentions urged on behalf of the accused, the attitude of the Crown and other possible contingencies. In this case it has been urged before me by the learned advocate for the accused that the circumstances of the occurrence were all taken into consideration by the learned Sessions Judge, that the deceased man was injured in the course of an affray, and consequently it cannot be affirmatively held that a more severe sentence should have been passed.

I have considerable doubt whether the sentence is adequate, and had the application been made at the instance of the Crown I should have been more inclined to enhance it. The learned Judge has not stated what circumstances he took into consideration and it would have been helpful had he stated what the circumstances were which led him to pass what appears at first sight to be too lenient a sentence. But as I take a decided view that applications of this nature ought not to be encouraged at the instance of a complainant or private prosecutor, I am not disposed to give such an application any support unless it is clear beyond all question that it should be allowed. In my judgment this is not such a case, for in the circumstances I will give the accused the benefit of a very doubtful supposition that there were sufficient reasons present to the mind of the learned Sessions Judge for the sentence which he passed. The rule will be discharged.

Hindu Law — Guardian has authority to gift immovable property for estate's benefit or necessity — Gift even in excess of his authority binds ward on ratification, after attaining majority.

The Hindu Law does allow a gift even of immovable property by a guardian, just as much as by a karta, for the benefit of the estate or for necessity and that however much a guardian may have exceeded his powers, or otherwise acted improperly in his trusts, his acts will be rendered binding on the ward by being ratified or acquiesced in, by him, after he had attained majority: 8 M. Jadu Nath Kanjilal and Subodh Chandra Dutta—for Appellant.

Harendra Kumar Sarbadhikari and Mahima Mukul Hazra—for Respondents.

Judgment.—These two appeals have been preferred by defendants 1 and 2, respectively from a decree of the Addl.

tional District Judge of Howrah, confirming a decree passed by the Subordinate Judge, First Court, of that place. The suit was one for partition and for some other reliefs with which we are no longer concerned. The claim for partition was based on the following allegations:—One Ganesh Chandra Chakravarty was the father of the plaintiff, defendant 1 and defendant 2's husband Prosanna. The properties in suit belonged to Ganesh and he during his lifetime desired to give one-third share thereof to the plaintiff who was her daughter but being unable to carry out this wish, directed his sons, namely Prosanna and defendant 1 to do so after his death, that in accordance with this direction Prosanna, the eldest son, during the minority of defendant 1, and for himself and as guardian of defendant 1, made a gift of a one-third share of the properties to the plaintiff. Defendant 3 is a purchaser of one of the plots from defendant 2. The defence denied the gift and also challenged its validity.

In S. A. No. 15 of 1927, defendant 2 is the appellant. On her behalf the genuineness of the transaction has been questioned. The findings of the Courts below are conclusive on this question.

In S. A. No. 14 of 1927 in which defendant 1 is the appellant the validity of the gift is questioned. The first question that arises upon this contention is whether the gift was void or voidable. Prosanna admittedly was the elder brother of defendant 1 and karta of the family, and the natural guardian of the latter, on the death of their father. The Hindu Law makes no distinction between a gift and other kinds of alienation. The guardian of a minor cannot give away his ward's property in charity, and under ordinary circumstances the karta of a family cannot bind the other members of the family by making an alienation in the nature of a gift. But the Hindu Law does allow a gift even of immovable property by a guardian, just as much as by a karta, for the benefit of the estate or for necessity: see the Mitakshara Chap. I, S. 1, paras. 28 and 29; and Kalu v. Barsu (1). It cannot, therefore, be said that the gift will not operate on the share of defendant 1 under any circumstances or that it was altogether void. There is clear authority for the proposition that however much a guardian may have exceeded his powers, or otherwise acted improperly in his trusts, his acts will be rendered binding on the ward by being ratified or acquiesced in, by him, after he has attained majority: C. C. Venkatachala Reddyar v. Rangaswamy (2) and Ramaswami Aiyar v. Venkataramaiyar (3). Nothing in the shape of a justifying necessity has been proved in the present case. The true question therefore is whether there has been ratification or acquiescence.

On the question of ratification or acquiescence the finding of the learned District Judge is that "some 10 or 12 years after the execution of the deed of gift the provisions of that deed had actually been put into operation between the parties."

This finding, he has arrived at upon two documents only, viz., Exs. 1 and 3 which, in our opinion do not by themselves lead to any such conclusion. They only go to indicate that defendant 1 knew that the plaintiff held some share under a gift from Prasanna, and even though they conveyed an information to defendant 1 as to the quantum of that share, they do not show that defendant 1 was aware that the plaintiff had got under the gift a half of one-third out of the share of defendant 1. There are we find other materials on the record on which a finding on the question of ratification or acquiescence was arrived at by the trial Court, but the learned District Judge has not dealt with those materials or examined them with a view to see whether they would support such a finding.

The decree of the lower appellate Court is accordingly set aside and the case is remanded to that Court to rehear the appeal on the aforesaid question and then to dispose of it finally.

The result is that S. A. 15 is dismissed but without costs, and S. A. 14 is allowed in the manner indicated above, costs therein being dependent on the result of the remand.

Wherever any instrument is purposely altered by a person in lawful possession of it in a material part of it the instrument is void for the purpose of enabling any person to sue on it or defend himself by using it as a direct defence depending on its obligatory force as an instrument : *Master v. (b) Bengal Tenancy Act (8 of 1885), Ss. 105 and 50—Claim for amount on account of submerged land on basis of kabuliati and further for enhancement of rent for excess of land—Kabuliati materially changed by interpolation regarding unit of measurement—Kabuliati was held void for claim and in latter case presumption under S. 50 took effect.

In a proceeding under S. 105, a landlord put forward a kabuliati as the governing document of the tenancy and on the basis of that asked first of all for Rs. 5 on account of the suspension of rent on account of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  bighas of land submerged under water at that time. The second relief was for enhancement of rent on account of the rise in the price of crops. Thirdly he asked for additional rent on account of additional area. The kabuliati contained the usual terms : "Whenever you so desire at future time you will measure the land and for the land thus found out on measurement you will be competent to settle the jama according to the rates prevailing for the different classes of land in the village." In the margin there was a subsequent interpolation "measurement of the land will be made in accordance with the terms of the kabuliati by a rasi of 80 cubits, 1 cubit being equal to 18 inches." The kabuliati was thus materially altered.

Held : (i) that as the kabuliati formed the foundation of the claim of Rs. 5 kabuliati cannot be the evidence at all on the part of the landlord and further (ii) that it cannot be evidence for additional rent as it was immediately necessary to enquire what land was comprised in kabuliati so as to determine amount of encroachment which in its turn necessitated the reference to the void instrument, and thereafter presumption under S. 50 took effect and took away the claim altogether. [P 790 C 1, 2]

Radha Binode Pal and Bhupendra Kumar Basu—for Appellant.Samarendra Nath Dutt and Tarakeshwar Nath Mitter—for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the question arises in a proceeding before the Assistant Settlement Officer under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act. The position is quite shortly this that the plaintiff has three causes of action. He puts forward a kabuliati as being the governing document of this tenancy and he asked first of all for Rs. 5 to be allowed because that sum of Rs. 5 was, on the basis of the terms of the kabuliati, a suspension of rent on account of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  bighas of the holding being submerged under water at that time. He asked secondly for enhancement of rent because of rise in the price of the crops and he asked thirdly additional rent for additional area. There can be no doubt that the claim for Rs. 5 is a claim based upon the kabuliati; that appears from the plaintiff's own claim before the Settlement Officer. The question of excess land is plainly a claim based upon the kabuliati not because he could not get it but for the kabuliati under the Bengal Tenancy Act but because it is immediately necessary to enquire exactly what land was then comprised within the kabuliati in order that one may know whether there has been an encroachment or not. The kabuliati contains the usual terms :

"Whenever you so desire at any future time you will measure the land and for the land thus found out on measurement you will be competent to settle the jama according to the rates prevailing for the different classes of land in the village. . . ."

Now in that kabuliati there was an interpolation :

"measurement of the land will be made in accordance with the terms of this kabuliati by a rasi of 80 cubits, 1 cubit being equal to 18 inches."

It all depends upon the standard of measurement employed at the time of this kabuliati, what area was included in it and the plaintiff when he had his claim put forward under this kabuliati insisted upon it being accepted as the term of the tenancy including the interpolation.

Now the question arises because the lower appellate Court has found that the kabuliati itself is not a forgery altogether but that it is clear enough that this writing in the margin is a subsequent interpolation. In dealing with the kabuliati it appears that the interpolation must have been made by a person in whose possession the kabuliati was, namely from the side of the landlord and the doctrine which is relied on in this appeal is the doctrine laid down in the case of Master v. Miller (1) a doctrine which has been stated in this way :

"whenever any instrument is purposely altered by a person in lawful possession of it in a material part of it, the instrument is void for the purpose of enabling any person to sue on it or to defend himself by using it as a direct defence depending on its obligatory force as an instrument."

These are the words used by Brett, L. J., in Supfel v. Bank of England (2).

The lower appellate Court has held that the tenant has proved that he has held the tenancy at an unvarying rate of rent for over 20 years and when the tenant appeals to the presumption under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act, that lower appellate Court holds that the claim would be good but for the fact that the kabuliati shows that the jama was created in 1275.

We have therefore to consider whether this kabuliati may be used in connexion with that point in connexion with the question of Rs. 5 the suspended rent and the question of additional rent for the excess area. As the tenant has succeeded upon all the points except on the question of rise in the price of crops and haja, we consider that aspect of the case first.

In my judgment this kabuliati in these circumstances is not evidence at all on the part of the landlord because it is the foundation first of all of his claim to the Rs. 5. In the second place I do not think it is any evidence on the question of the rise in the price of staple crops. Prima facie the tenant has a tenancy which would entitle him to the presumption that he held it at a fixed rate of rent since the Permanent Settlement. This document has been put forward in a claim for enhancement of rent as the foundation of the landlord's title to enhance the rent because in its absence the presumption under S. 50 would take away the claim altogether. The landlord has been using the very terms of the kabuliati to show the origin of this tenancy to rebut this presumption; and to say that that can be distinguished from a case in which he is suing on the kabuliati is to my mind a distinction without difference. The landlord takes his stand on this kabuliati as the origin of the tenancy and fails to prove it otherwise. The presumption under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act therefore prevails against him.

In my judgment therefore the correct view is to allow the appeals by the defendant and to find that he has a tenancy the rent of which is not enhancible by virtue of the presumption under S. 50 disregarding the kabuliati. In the same way the claim for Rs. 5 as charged is also disallowed. In my judgment the plaintiff's claim for excess rent for excess area must be disallowed, first of all it is impossible to make that case without putting in the kabuliati as the basis of the case; secondly it was with respect to this very matter that the interpolation was originally put in; and thirdly the claim laid was upon the document as altered and not upon the document as it originally stood.

In my judgment the principle of the case of Master v. Miller (1) should be enforced very strictly when the occasion for its application arises. In this case I think the result is that the defendant's appeals should be allowed with costs and the cross-objection of the plaintiff is dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—In this case the order of the Subordinate Judge appears to us to be wrong. He has applied the provisions of S. 60-A, Court of Wards Act, in holding that the interest of the judgment-debtor in the property attached is not saleable. S. 60-A, however, refers to debts incurred by a ward. The judgment-debtor in this case is not a ward of Court. The Court of Wards was appointed the common manager under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act by the District Judge. That does not render all the cosharers of the property wards of Court so as to disqualify them from incurring debts or selling their interest in the property in question. As every cosharer is entitled to sell his interest a creditor of such cosharer is entitled to sell his property in execution of his decree against him.

The order of the Subordinate Judge is set aside and the case remitted to the Court below for proceeding with the execution. The appellant is entitled to his costs as against the respondent, which we assess at five gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 338 of 1927, Decided on 7th June 1929, from original decree of Offg. Sub-Judge, Assansole, D/- 7th May 1927.

(a) Bengal Regulation (19 of 1793)—Grant of land by zamindar antecedent to Company's accession—Land revenue-free and possession with grantee—Zamindar has no interest.

All grants made antecedent to 12th August 1765, and by whatever authority made and whether in writing or not, were admitted or allowed to be valid, if the grantees had got possession of the land and the land had not subsequently been made subject to the payment of revenue by competent officers of Government, and the zamindar can have no interest in such lands. [P 793 C 1]

(b) Bengal Regulation (19 of 1793)—Rent free grant of patah to debuttar by zamindar—Grant becomes rent-free lease and rights to subsoil remain with grantor unless expressly granted.

Where the document or sanad granting a piece of land describes the grant as a debuttar patah rent-free and not as danapatra or arpanam the grant becomes a rent-free lease and unless the grantor expressly gives away his rights in the subsoil the grantee has no right to it: A. B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants against a judgment and decree of the Officiating Additional Subordinate Judge of Assansol partially decreeing the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff has preferred a cross-objection against that part of the decree by which the learned Subordinate Judge dismissed a portion of his claim. The suit refers to a mouza called Itapara and the plaintiff claims that the property is situated within the ambit of this zamindari. An ancestor of his made a grant of the lands within the mouza to an ancestor of the defendants for performing the sheba of an idol named Sri Sri Gopi Nath Jue without payment of any rent. Recently, at the instance of the defendants the revenue authorities recorded the mouza in the Register under the Bengal Land Registration Act (Act 7 of 1876) as a revenue-free estate. Coal has recently been discovered underneath the mouza and the defendants have set up their right to the underground minerals. The plaintiff, therefore, brought the suit praying that his title to the mouza Itapara as zamindar might be declared and his possession of the uncultivated waste lands and subsoil minerals might be confirmed. No argument was addressed as regards those surplus waste lands. It was also prayed that it might be declared that the defendants are only entitled to the surface lands consisting of an area of about 121 bighas and 18 cottas for the service of the idol above mentioned. There was a further prayer that the record of the mouza in the Register by the revenue authorities as a revenue-free property may be declared to be erroneous and ultra vires. The defendants pleaded that the mouza is their revenue-free property. It is admitted that the original grant of the property in suit was to one of their ancestors by an ancestor of the plaintiff. It was alleged that the land originally formed part of a mouza called Bilagram. Subsequently the land granted to the defendants' ancestor formed a different mouza called Itapara a name which it now bears having been carved out of the parent village Bilagram. The grant was made prior to the accession of the East India Company to the Diwani of Bengal and this grant was confirmed by a Superintendent of Baje-Jamin-Duftar, the result of which was that it constituted a revenue-free estate quite unconnected with the zamindari of the plaintiff. That being so, the defendants are the proprietors of the mouza including the subsoil minerals and the plaintiff has no connexion whatsoever with the property. This being the principal question in dispute between the parties several issues were framed in the Court below. It was found by the learned Subordinate Judge that the grant in this case was in the nature of a demise for divine service but that it was not a grant in favour of the deity and that, therefore, the idol was not a necessary party to the suit.

The main issues for trial are issues 6, 8 and 9. The learned Subordinate Judge held in favour of the defendants' contention that the mouza in dispute formed part of mouza Bilagram alias Chaitanyapore.

It became subsequently necessary to give a separate name to the land demised and it was named Itapara. But the plaintiff was not in possession of any portion of the land in dispute and the land in dispute formed a separate revenue-free estate and it did not form a part of the revenue paying estate of the plaintiff. The learned Subordinate Judge, however, held that the defendants were not entitled to the subsoil minerals, because the grant in their favour was made by the zamindar who was an ancestor of the plaintiff and that, as there was no grant of the minerals by the zamindar, according to the long line of authorities the defendants are only entitled to live upon the land and to enjoy the profits from the surface and that they are not entitled to the subsoil minerals. On these findings he made a decree to the effect that the plaintiff's possession of the underground minerals in the disputed mouza be confirmed in view of the finding that he was the zamindar of the disputed mouza and was entitled to the minerals and did not part with them in the defendants' favour, but that the other reliefs claimed by him including the prayer for a declaration that the said mouza appertained to his revenue-paying estate be disallowed. The defendants appealed against the former part of the decree declaring the plaintiff's right to the minerals and confirming his possession and the plaintiff preferred a cross-objection against the latter part of the decree principally against that portion where it is declared that the mouza does not appertain to his revenue-paying estate.

The argument on behalf of the appellants amounts to this that upon the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge that the mouza is a revenue-free estate and does not form part of the revenue-paying zamindari of the plaintiff, they are entitled to the minerals and that the Subordinate Judge's finding that the plaintiff is entitled to the minerals under the property in dispute is un consequential to his previous finding. The appellants based their title upon three documents Ex. (A) the date of which cannot be found; but it would appear from Ex. B (1) which is dated 16th June 1785 that Ex. (A) was granted sometime in 1761. The learned Subordinate Judge finds that by Ex. (A) a certain quantity of land in mouza Bilagram was granted to an ancestor of the defendants free of revenue. The Bengali word is to the effect that no "Rajaswa" was to be paid. This word "Rajaswa" may mean both rent and revenue. The Subordinate Judge finds that it was necessary to grant a second document Ex. B (1) in 1785 as the area of the land granted was not specified in the previous document. The third document is Ex. B dated 27th August 1807. This is a copy of an order from the Maharajdhiraj Bahadur, the ancestor of the plaintiff, to the Raj officers and thanadars and inhabitants of mouza Bilagram and runs to the effect, that there was a debuttar village Itapara and that on ceremonial occasions in the said village the persons named belonging to the village Bila wrongfully committed oppression on people with respect to certain imports in respect of village Itapara and that those persons were forbidden from molesting the inhabitants of the village Itapara.

It is contended by the learned advocate for the appellants as it was found by the learned Subordinate Judge under S. 48, Regulation 19 of 1793, this grant in favour of the defendants was confirmed by the Superintendent of the Baje Jamin-Duftar, therefore although it was not registered under the provisions of S. 27 of that Regulation, the right given to the grantee to hold the land revenue-free cannot be considered to have been annulled. He further says that the Subordinate Judge ought to have held that the plaintiff has no concern whatsoever with this property and cannot claim any right as zemindar of the mouza and that consequently the cases upon which the learned Subordinate Judge held that there was no grant of the subsoil by the plaintiff's ancestor cannot be supported. The defendants being the proprietors of the property are entitled both to the surface and the minerals of the mouza. It seems to me that the Subordinate Judge is right in holding that if this grant be of a revenue free interest made antecedent to 12th August 1765, it having been confirmed by the Superintendent of Baje-Jamin-Duftar under S. 48, Regn. 19 of 1793, the defendants would be proprietors of the mouza and entitled to hold it revenue-free and the plaintiff would have no right to the property. As Mr. Field points out in his Regulation of the Bengal Code at p. 246 :

"Non-Badshahi lakheraj grants may be divided into three classes namely, (1) grants of dates antecedent to 12th August 1765 the date of the Company's accession to the Diwani, (2) grant posterior to 12th August 1765 but antecedent to 1st December 1790., (3) grants posterior to 1st December 1790."

With respect to the first class, all grants by whatever authority made, and whether in writing or not, were admitted or allowed to be valid if the grantees had got possession and the land had not subsequently been made subject to the payment of revenue by competent officers of Government. With regard to this class of lakheraj grant the zemindar can have no interest.

It is, however, contended on behalf of the respondent that reference should be made to the preamble of the Regulation where it is stated that grants made previous to the date of the Diwani and provided the grantee had obtained possession before that date should be held valid to the extent of the intentions of the grantor as ascertainable from the terms of the writings upon which the grants might have been made, and from their nature and denomination. It is next contended by a reference to the grant (Ex. A) that the object was that the grantee should build a debuttar homestead and by blessing the grantor and performing the sheba of the deity should go on enjoying the lands without payment of rent. The intention of the grantor was not therefore to be presumed to be that he desired to make the grantee full proprietor of the lands concerned by the grant. It is argued by a reference to S. 7, Regulation 8 of 1793 which has now been repealed, where it was provided that when taluqdars hold their taluqs in writing or under sanads from the zemindar which did not expressly transfer the property in the soil but only entitled the taluqdars to possession so long as they continued as leaseholders and not actual proprietors of the soil, that the sanads did not transfer the property in the soil and that, therefore, the grantee should only be considered as a leaseholder. With regard to the question of fact as to whether the disputed lands are covered by the sanads Ex. (b) and Ex. B (1) it is argued that the defendants have not been able to make out that these lands were included within those sanads. The name of Itapara first appeared in the order Ex. (B) dated 27th August 1807 which has already been referred to. The defendants stated that Itapara has got an alias Chaitanyapore and that was stated with the object of identifying Itapara as included within mouza Bilagram, because in Ex. B(1) of 1785 in the schedule the mouza Bilagram is also called Chaitanyapore. The learned Subordinate Judge did not accept that statement of the defendants, as he observed:

"Defendant 1 is not correct in saying that the disputed mouza was also called Chaitanyapore."

The learned Advocate-General on behalf of the respondent contends that the Subordinate Judge is wrong in holding that Itapara was a portion of Bilagram, as he says, there is no evidence in support of such a conclusion. It is also contended on behalf of the respondent that this mouza was included within the zemindari of the plaintiff and that the Subordinate Judge is wrong in holding otherwise. The two questions involved in the appeal and in the cross-objection are so connected that they must be decided together.

It is pointed out by the learned Advocate-General that all the documents except the very recent documents show that Itapara was always considered as included within the estate of the plaintiff. The documents on which the respondent relies are the following: Ex.7(a) dated 1859-60. It is a copy of a statement presumably of the villages within the zemindari of the Raj of Panchakote. Column(2) shows the number of the chakla 'Panchakoti' which has another name Pachete; the next column contains the names of the mouzas as Itapara (1) and Dhadka  $\frac{1}{2}$  mouza and Sri Sri Gopinath Jeu  $1\frac{1}{2}$ . This idol whose shebait is the defendant is said to be the owner of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  anna. This was filed by Raja Nilmoni Singh, the ancestor of the plaintiff. Panchakote or Pachete is the estate of the plaintiff. The next document is Ex. 7 (c) dated 1860-61 the name of the zemindar and landlord of the chakla is given as Nilmoni Sinha Deo. The name of the mouza is Itapara, one mouza and there is also the name of the deity Sri Sri Gopinath Jeu. In the remark column it is stated that the land under this party is applied to the seba of Sri Sri Jeu and that there is no particular of jama at this place. This document was also filed by Nilmoni Singh Deo. In Ex. 2 (a) which is a thak statement dated 10th May 1862 with regard to mouza Itapara the deposition was recorded of a gumasta on behalf of the ancestor of the present defendants who are described as bramottar-holders. In answer to the question :

"What is your connexion with this village? whether you are the zemindar, taluqdar, or mokararidar."

The answer recorded is :

"I am the gumasta of this village on behalf of Wooni Thakur and Nani Thakur, bramottar-holders; and the bramottadars are on behalf of Maharajh Nilmoni Singh, zemindar of (illegible) and the gross jama of the said entire village comes to about one hundred."

This is signed by the gumasta on behalf of the Wooni Thakur and Anir Thakur brahmottar-holders and underneath that there appears also the signature of Wooni, who was one of the brahmottadars.

Exhibit (8) is the next document, which is an extract from the mouzawar register dated 1862-63. There mouza Itapara is recorded as appertaining to chakla Panchakoti, the plaintiffs zemindari. Next comes the general register of revenue-paying lands of estates in one district and borne on the touzi of a different district. This is Ex. (7) dated 1877-78—register kept under the provisions of the Bengal Land Registration Act (Act 7 of 1876). There the name of the mouza and the description of the interest are given as Itapara (1) khas, Seba Debuttar or Sri Sri Gopinath Jeu and the name of Maharajdhiraj Nilmoni Singh Deo Bahadur is given as the proprietor.

Exhibit (7) is also a similar document.

Then it is pointed out on behalf of the respondent that decrees for cesses have been obtained by the plaintiff and his predecessor, which have been exhibited in this case, from the year 1894. No assertion of any right was made by the defendants that they were not bound to pay any cesses to the plaintiff in those cases on the allegation that they did not hold an interest subordinate to that of the plaintiff.

The next document is the Record-of-Rights, Ex (5) where this mouza Itapara was recorded as within the zemindari of the plaintiff. This Record-of-Rights was published in 1919. It is argued on behalf of the respondent that the cumulative effect of these documents is that the plaintiff is the proprietor of the mouza in question and that the defendants hold a debuttar interest under him without payment of any rent. No question can be raised that the mouza is a revenue-free estate dissociated from the zemindari of the plaintiff.

It is quite true that the payment of cesses to the plaintiff will not affect any title which the defendants may have in the property and they are entitled to argue that in spite of the fact that they had paid cess to the plaintiff they can establish their right to their property as proprietors of the soil. But from the fact that never at any time before 1918 did the defendants raise the question that they held the mouza independently of the plaintiff's right as proprietors of the soil, they are bound to prove that all these proceedings that had taken place for a considerable number of years were not challenged for some cogent reason. It is only in 1918 that the defendants made an application to the revenue authorities for recording this mouza as their revenue-free property in B Register (Part *) under the Land Registration Act. The Deputy Collector allowed the prayer but on appeal, it appears, that the Commissioner doubted the identity of the land granted in the sanad being the same as the land of village Itapara and directed a further enquiry into the matter. In the end, however, the defendants succeeded in having the property recorded as revenue-free property under the order of the Board of Revenue. The learned Subordinate Judge considers this order of the revenue authorities as rebutting the Record-of-Rights Ex. (5). The learned Subordinate Judge observes:

"This mouza was treated as appertaining to the plaintiff's revenue-paying estate for a long series of years till the revenue authorities decided otherwise in 1920 and the plaintiff seeks relief against the decision of the revenue authorities. The onus is upon the plaintiff to show that the disputed mouza had been assessed with revenue at the time of the permanent settlement and in my opinion the plaintiff has failed to prove that."

Now whether this mouza was assessed with revenue or not at the time of the permanent settlement does not appear to me to be a guiding factor in this case. From the documents filed by the plaintiff it is quite clear that this mouza had all along been treated as within the revenue-paying estate of the plaintiff and his predecessor. The sanad as stated above does not distinctly make a grant of the soil to the defendants' ancestor, assuming that it includes the lands of the mouza. Under such circumstances, it seems to me to be rather a large assumption to make that the grant was a revenue-free grant to be held independently of the grantor for all time. That assumption is further negatived, in my opinion, by the description of the document by which the grant was made. This document is bogus as:

"This debuttar patta is granted in San 17 Sal to the effect following" and it concludes thus: "To this effect I grant (this) debuttar patta." Now the expression patta can only mean that that is a grant by way of a lease. It was contended by the learned advocate for the appellants that in common parlance every document is described as a patta. Even if it be so, the various documents to which I have referred show that this was not a gift out and out. If it had been a grant free of all interest it might have been described as danpatra or arpannama and not as a patta. The zemindar in this case maintained his interest in the property without objection till recently. The true inference, therefore, is that it was rent-free grant by way of a lease by the grantor for the purpose of deb sheba.

The question whether the mouza Itapara is covered by the sanad Ex. A and the confirming sanad Ex. B (1) is left in great obscurity by the evidence. It is difficult to say as the learned Subordinate Judge has found that at the time of the grant these lands formed part of the parent mouza Bilagram and that subsequently to the grant it became necessary to give the lands a separate name. The learned Subordinate Judge, however, notes:

"that the western, northern and eastern boundaries as given in the defendants' sanad, namely, mouza Bila and Nuniapore, obtained even at the time of the Revenue Survey as appears from the map Ex. (c)."

It is, however, very difficult to identify the boundaries of the lands in the sanad with the boundaries of mouza Itapara. In my opinion the finding that the sanad refers to mouza Itapara is one which cannot reasonably be arrived at. However, on the opinion that I have expressed the grant should be considered as a rent-free lease, even assuming that Ex. (a) refers to mouza Itapara, the defendants would not be entitled to the underground minerals and the plaintiff would remain the owner of those minerals. It is not necessary for me to pile up authorities for the proposition that even when a lease-holder is granted a rent-free tenure the rights to the subsoil remain with the grantor unless there are express words granting such rights. It is only necessary to refer to this case of Ragu Nath Roy v. Raja Durga Prasad (1) and to the last case on this point, the case of Raja of Pittapur v. Secy. of State (2). On the evidence also it should be held that the defendants held the rent-free tenure for deb seba which was granted to them for the performance of deb seba of the idol of Sri Sri Gopinath Jeu.

(1) A. I. R. 1919 P. C. 17=47 Cal. 95=46 I. A. 158 (P. C.).

(2) A. I. R. 1929 P. C. 152.

The result, therefore, is that this appeal will stand dismissed with costs and the cross-objection allowed to this extent that the disputed mouza is declared to be within the revenue-paying estate of the plaintiff and not an independent revenue-free estate. The defendants, however, will be entitled to hold the whole of the surface of the mouza in their debuttar right including 121 bighas odd.

The plaintiff is entitled to his costs in the appeal and the cross-objection, the hearing-fee being assessed at ten gold mohurs consolidated in the appeal and the cross-objection.

Appeal No. 99 of 1928, Decided on 18th April 1929, from original decree of Page J., D/- 19th December 1928.

Appeal—Competency—Party accepting benefit under conditional decree is precluded from appealing.

So far as a final decree in a suit is concerned there is no reason for saying that the decree-holder cannot approbate a decree in respect of the sum which it awards to him and reprobate it in respect of the sum which it refuses to him. There is no rule that acting on any order necessarily debars a party from appealing against the order on any point. The only principle is that a party is precluded from challenging the validity of an order after accepting the benefit of a term imposed in his favour as a condition of that order upon the opposite party at whose instance the order is made : A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 380, Rel. (on. Cases Referred.) [P 798 C 2]

B. K. Ghosh and S. C. Mitter—for Appellant.

N. N. Sirkar and R. N. Sarkar—for Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the appeal has been set down for hearing on a preliminary point. In 1911 the plaintiff executed a mortgage of the suit lands to the defendants whom he put in possession and empowered to realize rents from the tenants. In 1915, the plaintiff claimed to redeem the mortgage. There was a dispute as to the amount due thereunder and on 11th February 1916 the plaintiff filed his suit for redemption of the mortgage and possession of property. It appears that under an order made on 17th March 1916, the plaintiff paid to the defendants Rs. 43,000 and the defendants made over possession of the property to the plaintiff. On 17th May 1922, it was referred to the Assistant Referee to take the mortgage account on the basis of wilful default and neglect and after protracted proceedings before the Assistant Referee, he reported that the defendants were liable to pay to the plaintiff Rs. 38,918. The defendants filed exceptions to this report and ultimately Page, J. allowed certain of the exceptions and disallowed certain others. On 19th September 1928 a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiff for Rs. 12,946-4-3 with certain costs. The decree continued :

“ And it appearing that there is now in the hands of the Registrar of this Court standing to the credit of the account in this suit 3½ per cent Government Promissory Notes of the face value of Rs. 60,000 deposited by the defendant Sobha Chand Bhutoria as security under an order made in this suit dated 25th November 1924, it is further ordered and decreed that the said Registrar do out of the said sum in his hands pay to the plaintiff the said sum of Rs. 12,946-4-3 and to the defendants the balance thereof.”

Under this decree the plaintiff has drawn out of Court Rs. 12,946-4-3 and has brought this appeal to establish his right to the balance of the amount found by the Assistant Referee to be due to him as also for certain costs not awarded to him by the decree. The defendant Sobha Chand Bhutoria has filed a cross-objection disputing the amount found to be due by the decree.

As the matters in controversy concern a voluminous and protracted account, and as the defendants desired to take a preliminary objection to the competency of the appeal, this Court ordered the appeal to be set down for hearing on the preliminary point.

The objection taken by the defendants is that the appellant having taken out of Court the sum of money awarded to him by the decree, he is incompetent to proceed with his appeal. They rely upon a decision in this Court in the case of Banku Chandra Bose v. Mariam

Begum (1) and upon Manilal Guzrati v. Harendra Lal Roy (2), Tinkler v. Hilder (3) and Kenard v. Harris (4).

I find that in Second Appeal No. 2676 of 1920 decided in this Court by Chatterjee and Cuming, JJ. in December 1922 cf. Jogendra Nath v. Khoda Bakhsh (5) the cases on this subject were carefully reviewed. In that case the suit was upon a registered bond for a money debt bearing compound interest at 18 per cent per annum. The trial Court allowed simple interest at 18 per cent and directed the decretal amount to be paid in three instalments with costs of the suit the costs to be paid by Jaista 1326, and the principal and interest in two equal instalments thereafter. The District Judge on appeal disallowed compound interest on the ground inter alia that the plaintiff had accepted Rs. 65-10-0 being the first instalment, namely the instalment in respect of the costs, under the decree. This Court reversed the decision of the District Judge and, upon a review of all the cases, held as follows :

"It will appear that in the English cases as also in the case in Banku Chandra Bose v. Mariam Begam (1) cited above, the opposite party having accepted the benefit which he would not have obtained otherwise than under such order, was held to be precluded from challenging the validity of the order.

In the case before us, there was no such thing. The plaintiff appealed against the decree in so far as it disallowed compound interest. After the appeal had been filed, against that part of the decree which disallowed compound interest, he accepted the costs (deposited by the respondent) and which was decreed by the lower Court on the basis of simple interest as to which there was no dispute and which the plaintiff would have got in any event whether the appeal succeeded or failed. In these circumstances, the principle of the cases referred to above does not apply to the present case."

In my opinion the principle of the cases relied upon by the defendants does not apply to the case before us and I agree in the observations that were made by Chatterjee, J. in the unreported case which I have cited.

To deal with the English cases first, we must distinguish cases which have reference to awards in arbitration. Kenard v. Harris (4), is a case of this type and in England under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the principle contended for by the defendants has been applied to awards made by County Court Judges sitting as arbitrators under the Act. It is true that the principle appears to have worked some injustice and its results to have been regretted by Pickford, L. J. in the case of Josey v. Vincent (6), but the principle is well established : see Harris v. Minister of Munitions (7), Johnson v. Newton Fire Extinguisher Co. (8). An award is bad unless it deals with the whole matter submitted and prima facie cannot be set aside in part only. A person who accepts costs payable under an award or any other sum of money given to him by an award is held to be precluded from asking the Court to set aside the award.

If, however, we put on one side cases of this character, we find a series of cases which have reference to interlocutory orders of Courts of law. In Banku Chandra Bose's case (supra) an order was made setting aside the dismissal of a suit for non-prosecution and giving to the defendants certain costs of and incidental to the plaintiff's application. The defendants had their bill taxed and obtained an allocatur for the amount. They also received under the order the sum of Rs. 250 on account of their costs. In that case the defendants had no right to the costs except under the order and the Court purported to follow the principle of Tinkler v. Hilder (3). In the previous case, Mani Lal Guzrati v. Harendra (2), the plaintiff was given leave to amend his plaint upon payment of Rs. 150 as costs to the defendants. The costs were paid at once and were received by the defendants under protest. The defendants on appeal contended that the Subordinate Judge ought not to have allowed the amendment. This Court held that as the defendants had no option but to accept the payment of the costs and did so under protest, they had not debarred themselves from questioning the order, but it was said that if the Judge had directed the costs to be paid into Court to the credit of the defendants and they had voluntarily withdrawn the sum deposited they might have been debarred from questioning the validity of the order. It is clear that in this case the payment of the sum of Rs. 150 was really a term or condition of the liberty given to amend the plaint.

Coming now to the English cases, Tinkler v. Hilder (3) was a case in which the Judge on summons made an order to stay an action for trespass on payment of the costs of the day and of the execution of a certain writ of enquiry. These costs had been taxed and paid. On a motion to rescind the order, it was contended that the plaintiff could not now question the order after having adopted it and acted under it by accepting the costs. King v. Simmonds (9) and Pearce v. Chaplin (10) were cited. In reply it was argued that in those cases the costs were given by the order and could not otherwise have been obtained whereas in the present case they would have followed the judgment. Parke, B. replied:

"you have obtained them more speedily by means of the order which gives you the advantage. You have therefore received the benefit under the order and cannot now say it is valid for one purpose and invalid for another."

In King v. Simmonds (9) the Judge having ordered on summons by the plaintiffs that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to amend the record and also that they should pay the defendant his costs occasioned by such amendment, it was held that the defendant could not, after taxing and receiving his costs, apply to set aside the order. In Pearce v. Chaplin (10) the judgment and execution were set aside on summons and it was ordered that no action should be brought. The Sheriff who had taken the defendant's goods relinquished them on being served with the Judge's order. The defendant objected to that part of the order which precluded him from bringing an action. It was held that the order of the learned Judge was not shown to proceed upon the basis of irregularity in obtaining the judgment and that the order did not appear to have been made ex debito justitiae, but should be construed to mean that the Judge was not prepared to make the order unless the defendant agreed to bring no action. Lord Denham, C. J. said:

"There is no case which shows that when a party has acted upon such an order and has availed himself of the benefit under it, he is not bound by all its terms."

(9) [1845] 7 Q. B. 289.

(10) [1845] 9 Q. B. 802=16 L. J. Q. B. 49.

A similar case was Hayward v. Duff (11).

It appears to me that the English cases are clearly inapplicable except upon the basis that the defendant is seeking to challenge an order after accepting the benefit of a term or condition imposed upon the opposite party at whose instance the order was made. So far as the final decree in a suit is concerned, there is no reason for saying that the plaintiff cannot approbate the decree in respect of the sum which it awards to him and reprobate it in respect of the sum which it refuses to him. The plaintiff in the present case was not awarded the sum which he has drawn out of Court as a term upon which the defendants were considered to be entitled to the dismissal of part of his claim. In the Irish cases of McCullough v. Munn (12) and McHugh v. McGoldrick (13), another principle may be discerned. The former was a very clear case, and in the latter a suit in the King's Bench Division had been remitted for trial before the Recorder unless the plaintiff within ten days gave security for costs to the satisfaction of a Master. The plaintiff applied to a Master to fix the amount of the security and an order was made fixing it at £100. The plaintiff then appealed against the order remitting the action. It was held that the plaintiff had accepted and adopted the order and could not appeal from it. Whether that decision was right or wrong, it has no application in my opinion to such a case as the present. There, if the appeal succeeded the proceedings before the Master would have become idle and the course adopted by the plaintiff was at least inconsistent and would have made the Court's action inconsistent: Contrast Anlaty v. Proetorius (14). I do not accept as a sound proposition that acting in any way on any order necessarily debars a party from appealing against the order on any point. In my opinion there is no such rule and the language used in the decided cases must be taken with reference to the substance of the matter before the Court.

Re: Marine Insurance Policies.

Reference by the Board of Revenue Bengal, under S. 57 (2), Indian Stamp Act, Decided on 25th June 1929.

Stamp Act (2 of 1899), S. 57 (2) — Reference cannot be made unless question arises out of a particular case.

Under S. 57 (2) it is not open to make reference to the High Court for obtaining an opinion as a question of general nature not arising out of any particular case: 3 Cal. 347; 25 Mad. 752 and 37 All. 125 (F. B.); A. I. R. 1923 Bom. 51, Rel. on. [P 800 C 1]

N. Sirkar and N. N. Bose — for the Board of Revenue.

Rankin, C. J.—This is a reference made by the Board of Revenue, Bengal, under S. 57, Stamp Act, 1899. The reference is for the opinion of the Court as to whether a certain type of document represented by a blank form attached to the statement of the case drawn up by the Board of Revenue should be stamped with duty payable under Art. 47 (A) (1) (ii), Sch. 1, Stamp Act, or with duty under Art. 62 (c) of the said schedule or with some other and what duty.

It appears that a certain company or association called the Marine Insurance Association, Calcutta, carry on business in India in the course of which they issue Marine Insurance Policies upon goods. Accordingly, they have upon their policies to pay the stamp duty required by the schedule to the Indian Stamp Act. This Association has observed that, in the course of shipments to India, the policies of insurance or their equivalents sometimes take the form not of policies that have been executed in India but of certificates that have been taken out abroad. It appears that this kind of certificate is so worded in some cases that it may be construed as a document which transfers the rights of the original policy holder under a policy taken out abroad to the person interested in India in the goods shipped in many cases to the bank through whom the bills for the price of the goods are discounted. Accordingly, this Marine Insurance Association appears to have entered into correspondence with the Government of Bengal representing that these certificates, to give them a neutral name, ought to be subjected to duty under the Stamp Act before they are allowed to operate in India. This question has been discussed in the correspondence between this Association and the Government of India, Finance Department, (Central Revenues) as well as the Government of Bengal. Various views have been expressed.

One view has been expressed by the Stamp Superintendent, Calcutta, to the effect that these documents are chargeable with duty as though they were Marine Insurance Policies. Another view has been expressed by a Department of the Government of India that these documents are of the nature of transfers of interest in a policy and are chargeable with duty under some other heading in the schedule to the Stamp Act. Accordingly without taking steps with reference to any particular document or seeking to make any person liable for duty upon any particular document, the Board of Revenue, Bengal, have attached to their case stated a specimen blank form of certificate and have asked for the opinion of this Court under S. 57 of the Act upon the question whether documents of the character disclosed by this blank form are liable to stamp duty, and if so, under what heading.

In my opinion, this reference is entirely incompetent. It is not within the purview of S. 57, Stamp Act, at all. That section does not provide a means by which the authorities concerned in collecting stamp duty can get advice from the Court by laying a case before it for the decision of a general question. It provides the machinery by which, when an actual case is being dealt with a particular instrument being in question and a particular party being sought to be charged with duty upon that instrument, a question of doubt may be referred to this Court by the revenue authority setting forth facts in the form of a case stated and the Court, either in the presence of the parties concerned or, at all events, with opportunity to the parties concerned to argue the matter, is to decide the question of law raised on the facts. In the ordinary way, if the Government desires legal advice upon a general question it can obtain it by consulting the law officers of the State or by taking such other advice as it may think desirable.

It is well settled by the decisions of all the High Courts in India that S. 57 cannot be used for the obtaining of an opinion from the High Court on questions of a general nature not arising out of any particular case. This is clear enough if one reads S. 56 of the Act together with S. 57. S. 56, sub-S. (2), contemplates that a Collector acting under S. 31, S. 40 or S. 41, that is to say, dealing with a particular document and finding a doubt in his mind as to whether that instrument is chargeable may draw up a statement of the case and refer it with his own opinion for the decision of the Chief Controlling Revenue authority. There is no provision there that the Collector at any time entertaining a doubt as to whether documents of a certain type amount or do not amount to policies of Marine Insurance can formulate this general question and get an opinion from the Controlling Revenue authority. The arrangement is that the Collector acting upon a particular case under one or other of the three sections named may refer to the Controlling Revenue authority in the manner set forth. Now, S. 57 goes on to say :

"The Chief Controlling Revenue authority may state any case referred to it under S. 56, sub-S. (2), or otherwise coming to its notice and refer such case with its own opinion thereon to the High Court."

It is quite clear that there again, it must be a specific case definite document, a definite person who is sought to be charged with duty—not an abstract question of chargeability of documents of a certain kind. When we go on, we find that the particular High Court to which the reference is to be made depends upon the territory within which the case arises. This emphasises, if possible, the necessity of a concrete case, and, lastly, it is quite clear that the revenue authority on receiving the judgment of the Court has to dispose of the case conformably to the High Court judgment.

These matters have not arisen in this case for the first time. So far that as 1877, In the matter of Thomson Policy (1), it was laid down by Garth, C. J. :

"I feel very strongly that, in giving an opinion upon questions submitted to us by the Board of Revenue which may serve in the future as 'guide to the Board in imposing' taxes upon the public, we are bound to advise upon the actual facts before us and have no right to speculate upon the possible nature of transactions of which we have no certain knowledge."

In the case of Re : Reference under Stamp Act (2), a Sub-Registrar had impounded certain documents and forwarded them to the Deputy Collector who certified that they were exempt from stamp duty. The Inspector-General of Registration disagreed and referred the matter to the Board of Revenue. The Board of Revenue referred the question to the High Court and the High Court held the reference was absolutely incompetent because when the Deputy Collector had certified that the documents were free from stamp duty there was no way by which any duty could be collected from the person sought to be made liable. The case was at an end. There was no case to be referred to the Court and no case which could be entertained by the revenue authority after the Court had given its opinion. In the same way, in Re : Stamp Reference (3) there had been certain legislation for the protection of agriculturists in Bundelkhand. When a decree on a mortgage was made against an agriculturist, instead of being executed in the usual way, it was provided that the decree should be sent to the Collector who should offer the decree-holder a mortgage in a certain form.

A question arose whether this document had to be stamped and, before any such mortgage had been executed the form of the mortgage which might or might not be executed was referred to the High Court for its opinion as to whether such a mortgage would be liable to stamp duty. It was pointed out by the Full Bench that, reading S. 56 and S. 57 of the Act, the power to make a reference to the High Court had reference to instruments which were already in existence and did not include a power to refer speculative questions of the liability to duty of documents which had not been executed. Again, in the case of Usuf Dadabhai v. Chand Mahomed (4), there was a decision in Bombay of the Chief Justice and two other Judges pointing out that the Chief Controlling Revenue authority could refer a case under S. 57, Stamp Act, only when there was a case which was to be disposed of by him on receipt of the High Court judgment and that he had no power to refer an abstract question when there was no case pending before him. In that case, the Collector had validated certain documents on stamps of proper description being affixed thereto the documents having been admitted in evidence and a decree passed. Thereupon, the question was referred to the High Court as to whether or not the amount which had been levied was sufficient. It was held that there was no case remaining to be disposed of by the revenue authority and therefore, the reference was not competent.

In the present case, the person at whose instance this matter has been raised as a general question is the Marine Insurance Association, Calcutta. Its complaint is that certain of its rivals are wrongly escaping stamp duty. No one of these rivals has been attacked either by being threatened that the documents will be impounded or in any other way. No one of the persons concerned is before the Court or has had an opportunity of coming before the Court or can be brought before it. This case illustrates very strongly the necessity of seeing that general questions are not referred to the High Court under the machinery provided by S. 57, Stamp Act.

In my opinion this reference must be dismissed.

K, a testator bequeathed his property to his son B and daughter N. The words by which he gave away property to son were as follows: "I give (arpan) to my (torn) son whatever rights I have in the said properties." The bequest to the daughter was in these terms: "I give (arpan) to my daughter Shrimati Nabinkali Debi . . . the Nishkar Brahmottar Baguladangi situate in the said Jalpaiguri district. In the absence of Nabinkali, i. e., on her death, her sons born of her womb and grandsons etc., shall enjoy and possess my 3-annas share in the said Brahmottar." A son was born to N after the death of testator. On N's death B brought a suit for construction of the will contending that the bequest to N was only for life and then to her son and the son being born after K the bequest to him failed.

It is well established that if an estate were given to a man simply without express words of inheritance, it would in the absence of conflicting context carry by Hindu Law an estate of inheritance. Mitter, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of the District Judge of Murshidabad, dated 9th February 1925, which affirmed a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of the same place, dated 13th May 1924.

The plaintiff, now appellant, brought a suit for the construction of a will of his father, Kunja Behari Goswami, and for a declaration of his title to the immovable properties mentioned in the ka and kha schedules of the plaint and for recovery of possession of property ka with mesne profits and for an injunction restraining the defendant from taking any step for recovery of rent from the plaintiff with respect to properties described in schedule ka.

The case stated in the plaint is that plaintiff's father died on 13th Falgun 1924, corresponding to 24th February 1886, leaving behind him the plaintiff, his only son, and Nabinkali Debi, his only daughter; that the plaintiff's father executed a will sometime before his death: that probate was taken of the will and the plaintiff was possessing the properties left by his father according to the terms of the will; that in the will there was a provision that Nabinkali would get 3-annas share in a brahmottar property named Baguladangi and that there was a further provision in the will that a sum of Rs. 1,000 should be paid to Nabinkali for the construction of a dwelling house out of the estate of the testator, that Nabinkali possessed and enjoyed ka and kha schedule properties and died on 14th Falgun 1325, corresponding to 26th February 1919, that the defendant, Satyendra, son of Nabinkali, was born on 6th Aswin 1297, corresponding to 21st September 1890; that the said Satyendra having been born after the testator's death, any bequest in his favour was void under the Hindu Law, as being a bequest in favour of an unborn person; that Nabinkali got only a life-interest in the suit properties; that during Nabinkali's lifetime, the plaintiff took a jote settlement from Nabinkali in respect of the ka properties and that, on her death, the jote has ceased to exist and the plaintiff became entitled to the full brahmottar right in schedule ka properties and the plaintiff also acquired title to the dwelling house (schedule kha) and that the defendant, in spite of the plaintiff's protest, got his name registered in the land registration register with regard to the ka schedule properties and has brought a suit for recovery of rent against the plaintiff and that the defendant was in wrongful possession of the schedule ka properties.

The defence of the defendant is that the defendant's mother, Nabinkali, acquired an absolute interest in the properties in suit and that, on Nabinkali's death, her son Satyendra, succeeded to the properties in suit as her heir. It was further said that with regard to kha schedule property that it was partly acquired by the stridhan of Nabinkali and partly by the money derived from the estate of the testator and that the plaintiff was estopped from bringing this suit.

The defendant Satyendra died during the pendency of the suit and his son, Sadhan, has been substituted in his place.

Several issues were framed in the suit, of which it is necessary to notice only two, viz., issues 7 and 8.

Issue 7 is as follows:

"Had the defendant's mother permanent, absolute and heritable interest in properties in suit?"

And issue 8 is as follows:

"Has the plaintiff any title to the properties in suit?"

The Court of first instance came to the conclusion that, on a proper construction of the will, issue 7 should be answered in the affirmative and against the plaintiff and issue 8 should be answered in the negative. The trial Court accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

An appeal was taken by the plaintiff to the Court of the District Judge and the learned District Judge has come to the same conclusion as the trial Court and has affirmed its decision dismissing the plaintiff's suit.

Against this decision, an appeal has been taken to this Court and it has been contended by Mr. Brajalal Chakravarti, who has appeared for the appellant, that on a proper construction of the will, the Courts below should have held that Nabinkali had only a Hindu daughter's estate in the disputed properties, which after her death reverted to the plaintiff.

The question turns on the construction of the will of Kunja Behari and we sent for the original will from the Court of the District Judge of Murshidabad and we have before us both the original will and the authorised translation made in this Court. The respondent contends that the construction put on the will by the Courts below, namely, that Nabinkali acquired an absolute interest in the properties in suit, is the right one.

In order to decide between these conflicting contentions, it is necessary to set forth the material parts of the will. Para. 1 of the will runs as follows:

"My son, Bipradas Goswami, who is born of my loins, shall be entitled to the zamindaris, patnis, darpatnis, upanchouki taluks, jote jamas, brahmottars and other immovable properties in the districts of Rangpur, Jalpaiguri Burdwan, Murshidabad and Rajshahi, with power to make sale or gift, and shall enjoy and possess the same in great felicity, down to sons and grandsons and others in succession. I give to my (torn) son whatever rights I have in the aforesaid properties, and I give to my daughter, Srimati Nabinkali Debi, who is born of my loins, the nishkar brahmottar Baguladangi situate in the said district Jalpaiguri. In the absence of Nabinkali, that is, on her death, her sons born of her womb and grandsons, etc., shall enjoy and possess my 3 annas share in the said brahmottar. If Nabinkali's sons do not reside at Sadikhandiar, then the said property shall vest in my heirs. If Nabinkali's sons and grandsons make any claim to that, the same shall be rejected. Nabinkali's husband Nagendra Nath Banerji or his agnates will not be entitled to possess the said properties or have any right to make a sale or gift of the same. A sum of Rs. 1,000 in cash shall have to be paid to Nabinkali as cost for the construction of a house or a house shall have to be built (for her) at a cost of Rs. 1,000."

It is not disputed that the testator's son, Bipradas (plaintiff), has got an absolute interest in the properties in the districts of Rangpur, Jalpaiguri, etc. The words by which he gets his absolute bequest are as follows :

"I give (arpan) to my (torn) son whatever rights I have in the said properties."

The bequest to the daughter, Nabinkali, is in the following words :

"and I give (arpan) to my daughter, Srimati Nabinkali Debi, who is born of my loins, the nishkar, brahmottar Baguladangi situate in the said district Jalpaiguri."

The bequest, therefore, if it is absolute in favour of the plaintiff by reason of the use of the expression "give" (arpan) in favour of the son (plaintiff) must also be taken to be absolute in favour of Nabinkali, for there is no reason that where the same expression is used to indicate the passing of a full proprietary right, that it should be cut down to anything less than a full proprietary right in the case of the daughter, Nabinkali, for if this construction is admitted, the appellants have to contend for two contradictory interpretations of the same phrase, which, however, is not permissible. In para. 5 of the will, the testator, while bequeathing an absolute interest in the moveable properties and the pucca buildings in his share uses the same expression "give" (arpan). Para. 5 of the will runs as follows :

"I give to my son, Bipradas Goswami, my moveable properties and the pucca buildings, etc. in my share."

By using the same dispositive term "give" in both cases, it seems to me, that the testator intended to bequeath the same kind of interest to both the son (plaintiff) and Nabinkali (defendant's mother). He gave the bulk of his properties, which consisted of zemindari, patnis, darpatnis, etc., in various districts in Bengal, to his son and gave only a 3 annas share in certain nishkar brahmottar in Jalpaiguri and a sum for the construction of a dwelling house in favour of his daughter by another wife absolutely. The dispositive term in the will, indicating the passing of an absolute interest, is the word "give" (arpan). It is now well established that if an estate were given to a man simply without express words of inheritance, it would, in the absence of a conflicting context, carry by Hindu law an estate of inheritance : see Jatindra Mohan Tagore v. Ganendra Mohan Tagore (1). The same principle would apply if the donee was a woman, for, as has been pointed out by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Surajmani v. Rabi Nath Ojha (2), this principle was of general application : see also Sasiman Chowdhurain v. Shib Narayan Chowdhury (3). As was pointed out by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Lalit Mohun Singh Roy v. Chukkun Lal Roy (4), one cardinal principle in the construction of wills is that clear and unambiguous dispositive words are not to be controlled or qualified by any general expression of intention. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the words :

"In the absence of Nabinkali, that is, on her death, her sons born of her womb and grandsons shall possess the three annas share."

coupled with the provision that :

"If Nabinkali's sons do not reside at Sadikhandiar then the said property shall vest in my heirs."

show that it was intended to give Nabinkali a life-estate with remainder over to her son and as the son was not born during the testator's lifetime, the gift to the son was void under the Hindu law and, consequently, this property reverted to the next heir of the testator, viz., the plaintiff. It is also said that the words putra poutradikrame signify that the succession after Nabinkali's death would be in the line of male heirs and was intended to prevent the succession of female heirs and that this was a provision contrary to rule of succession under the Hindu Law and was void. It seems to me that this provision in the will as to what is to happen on the death of Nabinkali is somewhat involved and obscure. It is possible to read the words "Nabinkalir o' garbhajata putra poutradikrame bhog dakhal karibe" to mean that those born of the womb of Nabinkali will enjoy and possess from generation to generation. The words putra poutradikrame have acquired a technical meaning. The words giving lands to the donee putra poutradikrame confer upon him or her an absolute estate. The word garbhajata means born of womb and if after that word the testator had used the word "children" and after that the words putra poutradikrame, then the meaning would have been absolutely clear and there could be no doubt that an absolute interest would have been bequeathed to Nabinkali. The absence of any such word after the word garbhajata creates the obscurity, but it seems to me that would be a more natural construction to fill up the ellipses after the word garbhajata by using the word children, rather than split up the phrase putra poutradikrame into words by tacking the word putra with garbhajata and reading poutradikrame as an independent phrase. If we look to the setting in which these words are placed, the latter construction becomes all the more unnatural, for in an earlier part of para 1, while bequeathing an absolute interest to the plaintiff, the testator uses the phrase putra poutradikrame and does not use the phrase poutradikrame by itself divorced from the word putra. In other words, the phrase putra poutradikrame is a term of art, whereas the word poutradikrame is rarely used in Bengali documents to indicate succession in the male line.

The respondent lays stress on the provision:

"that Nabinkali's son was also to enjoy from generation to generation in the absence of Nabinkali."

and contends that the word "also" signifies that Nabinkali was to enjoy the properties bequeathed to her in the same manner as his son Bipradas was to enjoy properties bequeathed to him. I think the word "also" has this significance and shows that the intention of the testator was to make the gift to his daughter absolute like the gift to his son. The meaning of every word in an Indian will must always depend on the setting in which it is placed, the subject to which it is related and the locality of the testator from which it may receive its true shade of meaning. The will was drawn outside Calcutta and we know that, outside the presidency towns, the art of conveyancing is but little understood, and the drafting of wills is generally of a very simple and inartificial character. It seems to me that, having regard to the whole frame and wording of the will the intention of the testator was to give Nabinkali an absolute interest and such restrictions as was repugnant to such interest must be disregarded.

Mr. Chakravarti has drawn our attention to the case of Radha Prasad Mullick v. Ranee Mani Dasee (5), where there was a gift to the daughters and the sons jointly and their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held that the daughters took only a life-interest. It is always dangerous to construe the words of one will by the construction of more or less similar words in a different will which was adopted by a Court in another case. But on an examination of the case it will appear that there was a gift to the daughters and sons jointly and there was a proviso that, in the event of one of the daughters dying without leaving any surviving male issue, then the share of the deceased daughter is to go to the surviving daughter and her son to the exclusion in both cases of female issue, and in these circumstances it was held that the daughters had only a life estate. In the present case the gift is to the daughter in the same terms as the gift to the son in respect of other properties, and there does not seem to be much resemblance between the present case and the decision of the Judicial Committee just referred to.

The case of estoppel made by the defendant is that the plaintiff himself put the same construction of the will when he took a permanent lease from Nabinkali of the ka schedule property as the defendants are contending for. It is true that this circumstance does not operate as an estoppel and prevent the plaintiff from asking relief on a proper and different construction of the will, but the circumstance is significant as showing that all the parties benefited by the will have proceeded on the footing that Nabinkali took an absolute interest in the ka schedule property. The plaintiff also suffers very little, for, after all, he enjoys the ka schedule properties absolutely subject only to the payment of a fixed rent to the defendant and his successor-in-title.

For the above reasons, I am of opinion that the view taken by the lower Courts is right and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Criminal Revn. No. 191 of 1929, Decided on 2nd July 1929, from decision of Dist. Magistrate, Faridpur, D/- 23rd November 1928.

Criminal P. C., S. 145—Whether proceedings should be taken or not is matter within Magistrate's own discretion.

The District Magistrate has no authority in law to direct a subordinate to institute proceedings under S. 145. Whether such proceedings should or should not be taken is entirely a matter within the Magistrate's own discretion.

Where the terms in which the District Magistrate's order is expressed, clearly indicate that the order was intended to leave the Magistrate free to exercise his own discretion in the matter, and he had ample materials before him on which S. 145 proceedings in respect of the whole land in question might be properly based, it cannot be said that the Magistrate failed to exercise his discretion vested in him by law, when he passed an order requiring certain additional land to be included in the proceedings: A. I. R. 1929 Cal. 751 and 24 Cal. 391, Ref. [P 806 C 1, 2; P 807 C 1]

Judgment.—This Rule is directed against an order of a Deputy Magistrate of Madaripur under S. 145, Criminal P. C., declaring the opposite party to be in possession of certain disputed land.

It is contended on behalf of the petitioner that the order complained of was without jurisdiction, inasmuch as certain additional lands had been included in the proceedings on which that order was based, not in the exercise of the Deputy Magistrate's own discretion, but in mechanical compliance with a direction given by the District Magistrate.

It is further contended that fresh proceedings should have been drawn up when the additional lands were included, and that the proceedings as finally framed were defective.

What happened was this: On 23rd March 1928, an Assistant Sub-Inspector of Matbarcharh police station submitted a report to the Magistrate to the effect that the petitioner was in possession of the whole of the land in question, that the opposite party were, however, putting forward a claim to be in possession thereof, and that, in order to support their claim, the opposite party had on 21st March 1928 forcibly dug a ditch, planted some plantain trees and erected a hut on the disputed land. On receipt of this report, the Magistrate called for a further report from the officer-in-charge, and on 1st April 1928, the Sub-Inspector reported that some more huts had been erected and some more plantain trees planted on the disputed land, and at the same time submitted a map from which it appeared that the land on which the ditch had been dug, the plantain trees planted and the huts erected, only formed a small portion of the land actually in dispute. The Sub-Inspector's recommendation was therefore that S. 145 proceedings should be started in respect of the portion of the land on which the huts etc., stood, and that a S. 144 notice should be issued on the opposite party in respect of the rest of the disputed land, whereas the Assistant Sub-Inspector's recommendation had been that a S. 144 notice should be issued on the opposite party in respect of the whole of the disputed land.

Acting on the recommendations of the Sub-Inspector, the Magistrate on 3rd April 1928, drew up S. 145 proceedings in respect of the land on which the huts etc., stood, and issued a S. 144 notice in respect of the rest of the disputed land.

The opposite party then moved the District Magistrate against the order under S. 144, with the result that that order was set aside.

In setting aside the order the District Magistrate remarked that:

"the reports do not disclose such imminence of a breach of the peace as would justify an order under S. 144, Criminal P. C., in respect of one portion of the disputed land, and a proceeding under S. 145, Criminal P. C., in respect of the rest," and concluded by saying that :

"the Magistrate should include the whole of the disputed land in the proceeding under S. 145, Criminal P. C., and attach the land if such action is called for by the circumstances of the case."

The above order was dated 21st April 1928, and on receipt of a copy thereof, the Magistrate, by his order of 4th May 1928, directed that :

"the land for which an injunction under S. 144, Criminal P. C., was passed, should be included in the proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C."

This order was given effect to by amending the proceedings that had already been drawn up in respect of the portion of the land on which the huts etc., stood, and by issuing fresh notices on the parties.

The enquiry was then proceeded with without any further objection from either side, with the result that the opposite party were ultimately declared to be in possession of the whole of the disputed land, i. e., the whole of the land covered by the amended proceedings.

The District Magistrate was moved against the said order, but he declined to interfere, holding that the Magistrate had drawn up proceedings on being satisfied from the reports of the local police that there was a likelihood of a breach of the peace about the land in dispute and further stating that the District Magistrate had given no direction that proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., should be drawn up, even if the Magistrate thought that there was no fear of a breach of the peace, but had merely said that it would be better to draw up proceedings under that section in respect of the whole of the disputed land.

Coming now to the questions at issue before us, it appears to be settled law that District Magistrate has no authority in law to direct a subordinate Magistrate to institute proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C.: whether such proceedings should or should not be taken is entirely a matter within the Magistrate's own discretion. The question then arises whether, in the present case, the Magistrate amended the proceedings in the exercise of his own discretion, or because he regarded the District Magistrate's order of 21st April 1928, as a direction for the inclusion of the whole of the disputed land, which left no room for the exercise of his own discretion in the matter. The terms in which the District Magistrate's order is expressed go against this view, inasmuch as the concluding words are :

"The Magistrate should include the whole of the disputed . . . if such action is called for by the circumstances of the case."

The order was clearly intended to leave the Magistrate free to exercise his own discretion in the matter, but the question is whether the Magistrate did or did not actually exercise that discretion.

Certain expressions used by the Magistrate in the course of the enquiry, suggest the inference that he did not use his own discretion in the matter, but considered himself bound to act under what he regarded as a discretion given by his official superior, the District Magistrate. For example, in para. 1 of his final order, he says that the District Magistrate directed that a proceeding under S. 145, Criminal P. C., should be drawn up for the entire disputed land, and that the whole of the land was accordingly, included in the proceedings.

On the other hand, it is clear from what has been stated above, that the Magistrate had ample materials before him, (viz., the Police Reports of 23rd March and 1st April 1928), on which S. 145 proceedings in respect of the whole of the land in question might properly be based. Those reports were, it is true, in favour of the petitioner, but that is really beside the question. They disclosed the existence of a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace concerning the whole of the land covered by the amended proceedings, and they therefore formed an adequate basis for these proceedings. The proceedings, both as originally framed and as subsequently amended, referred to the police report and stated that the Magistrate was satisfied from those reports that a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace existed between the parties: the amendment merely related to the subject matter of the dispute and did not in any way affect the real basis of the proceedings. In view of those circumstances,—and specially in view of the fact that the Magistrate had ample materials before him on which to base the amended proceedings,—we do not think we would be justified in inferring from a few unguarded expressions used by the Magistrate in the course of the inquiry, that he failed to exercise the discretion vested in him by law,—a discretion that had been expressly left entirely unfettered by the District Magistrate, in his order in the connected S. 144 proceedings.

In coming to the conclusion we are fortified by the views expressed by a Bench of this Court in the case of Kedar Nath Sikdar v. Bijoy Mandal (1) in which a distinction was drawn between cases in which the Magistrate had sufficient materials before him on which to base proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., and cases like that of Kailash Chandra Pal v. Kunja Behari Poddar (2) in which the Magistrate had no such materials before him, and based his proceedings entirely on the order of the District Magistrate.

As regards the second point raised on behalf of the petitioner, viz., that the amended proceedings are defective, and that fresh proceedings should have been drawn, we do not think there is much force in this, especially as the question has been raised at such a very later stage. The amended proceedings are to all intents and purposes fresh proceedings, and although the terms in which they are couched leave a good deal to be desired, there can be no doubt that they were perfectly well understood by the parties concerned, and that the defects, such as they are, did not make any difficulties, or cause any embarrassment to any one, in the course of the enquiry.

For the above reasons, we are of opinion that the application should be rejected, and the Rule discharged.

Criminal Revn. No. 131 of 1929, Decided on 25th July 1929.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 237—Charge for substantive offence and not abetment—Conviction for abetment can be sustained though there be no charge for abetment originally.

It cannot be definitely laid down that a person having been charged with the substantive offence cannot be convicted for abetment thereof when he is not charged with it originally. Every case depends upon its own facts and if the facts justify the conviction for abetment, though the person be charged with the commission of the offence itself, there is no bar in law to such conviction provided he is not prejudiced by the absence of such charge: 11 B. H. C. R. 240; 42 Cal. 1094; A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 466; A. I. R. 1927 All. 35; A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 35; A. I. R. 1925 P. C. 130 and A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 63, Ref; 33 Mad. 264 and A. I. R. 1924 Bom. 432, Dist. (b) Criminal P. C., S. 237—Woman induced to sell her property—Property sold to one and kabala prepared in name of third—Amount made over was Rs. 5 instead of Rs. 300—Accused who wrote the kabala aware of cheating practised and charged under S. 420, Penal Code, but convicted for abetment only—Conviction for abetment held sustainable.

A woman A was induced to sell her property to W under circumstances which made it a clear case of cheating. She told that she was to execute a kabala in favour of someone else for Rs. 300. As a matter of fact the kabala was written in favour of W to the knowledge of J, the writer of the instrument, and a bundle of money purporting to be Rs. 300 was made over to A. It was subsequently found to contain small coins and pice worth Rs. 5. On these facts as elaborated in the evidence the accused were charged under Ss. 120-B and 420, Penal Code. J was convicted under S. 420 read with S. 114, Penal Code. There was no charge framed under S. 114. Facts deposed by the complainant and the evidence of the witnesses proved that J wrote the kabala in the name of W, and the circumstances under which money was handed over show that J was privy to the commission of the substantive offence.

Held: that the conviction for abetment could be sustained and absence of charge did not prejudice him. [P 803 C 1]

Suresh Chandra Talukdar and Amrita Lal Mukherjee—for Petitioner.

Nirmal Chandra Chakraverty—for the Crown.

Suhrawardy, J.—The only question of law argued before us on behalf of the petitioner is that his conviction for abetment of the substantive offence, though he was not charged with it originally, is erroneous in law. Three persons were tried on a charge under S. 420, I. P. C. The petitioner is the third accused and he is said to have taken part in carrying out the purpose of the cheating. They were further charged under S. 120-B for conspiracy. The facts are that one Alekjan Bibi was induced to sell her property to accused 1 Wazaddi under circumstances which made it a clear case of cheating. She was told that she was to execute a kabala in favour of someone else for Rs. 300. As a matter of fact that kabala was written in favour of Wazaddi to the knowledge of the petitioner and a bundle of money purporting to be Rs. 300 was made over to Alekjan Bibi. It was subsequently found to contain small coins and pice worth Rs. 5. On these facts as elaborated in the evidence the accused were charged under Ss. 120-B and 420, I. P. C. The petitioner was convicted under S. 420 read with S. 114, I. P. C. and sentenced to three months rigorous imprisonment, though there was no charge framed under S. 114. It is argued that there being no such charge against the accused he could not be convicted under that section. There is some divergence of opinion on the question as to whether a person having been charged with a substantive offence can be convicted for abetment thereof. It is not necessary to refer to all the various cases that have been cited before us bearing upon this point, for I think the right view of the question raised before us is that it cannot be definitely laid down that a person having been charged with a substantive offence cannot be convicted for abetment thereof. Every case depends upon its own facts and if the facts justify the conviction for abetment, though the person was charged with the commission of the offence itself, there is no bar in law to such conviction. The principle is what was laid down long ago in Reg v. Chand Nur (1) where it is said that if evidence adduced in support of the charge for the substantive offence does not give notice to the accused of all the facts which would constitute abetment he cannot be convicted of abetment. This question was considered in the case of Indar Chand v. Emperor (2). Woodroffe, J., who was third Judge, to whom the case was referred on account of difference of opinion between two Judges observed at p. 1133 :

"I am not prepared to hold as a universal rule that in no case can there be a conviction for abetment where the charge is only for the substantive offence."

(1) 11 B. H. C. R. 240.

(2) [1915] 42 Cal. 1094=33 I. C. 289=19 C. W. N. 1239.

The same view has been expressed in the unreported case of the Emperor v. Kadir (3) by C. C. Ghose, J., in these words :

"It is true that there was no charge of abetment of murder against the present appellant before the jury but in my opinion it cannot be laid down as a universal rule that in no circumstances whatsoever where there is a charge for a substantive offence and there is no charge of abetment of that offence can the person so charged with substantive offence be convicted of abetment of that offence'.

The same view has been expressed in Emperor v. Mohabir Prosad (4) and Dibakar v. Saktidhar Kaviraj (5). A great deal of support for this view is to be obtained from the decision of the Judicial Committee in Begu v. Emperor (6) where the accused was charged under S. 302, I.P.C., but convicted under S. 201, I. P. C., for destroying the evidence for the commission of that offence. Their Lordships remarked :

"A man may be convicted of an offence although there has been no charge in respect of it, if the evidence is such as to establish a charge that might have been made."

I must, therefore, submit with great respect that the view taken in Hulas Chand Baid v. Emperor (7) by one of the Judges and adopted by the other Judge and couched in general language is not supported by authority. There are some cases which have held to the contrary but which seemed to have proceeded only upon the reading of S. 238, Criminal P. C. and make no reference to the other relevant S. 237. Padmanaba v. Emperor (8) and Emperor v. Rughya Nagya (9).

We have next to consider as to whether in the words of the Judicial Committee there is evidence such as to establish the charge of abetment and whether the accused has, by the absence of the charge of that offence, been prejudiced. The fact deposed to in the complainant's evidence and the evidence of her witnesses has been found by the Judge to be that the petitioner wrote the kabala in the name of accused 1 ; and the circumstances under which the money was actually made over to Alekjan show that the petitioner was a party in the cheating. He brought the receipt from the Sub-Registrar's office and made it over to accused 1. It was further proved that the petitioner was to make over the money to the complainant but he refused to do so as there was a danger if the bundle was opened before the Sub-Registrar. These facts sufficiently prove that the petitioner was privy to the commission of the substantive offence by accused 1. Upon these facts the petitioner's conviction was based and he had full notice that he had to meet the allegations in his defence.

The petitioner was further charged under S. 120-B. But it appears that no order was passed under that section by any of the Courts below. We have therefore ample authority under S. 423, Criminal P. C., to alter the finding and convict the accused under S. 120-B on the finding of fact arrived at by the learned Sessions Judge who says :

"it is clear that if Wazaddi was to carry through his plot successfully he would need the help of some one to write the deed. The circumstances under which the deed was written and in particular the circumstances under which the money was actually made over show that Gnanendra must have been a privy to the plan."

In any view of the case the accused has been rightly convicted and sentenced.

The rule is therefore, discharged. The petitioner's bail bond should be cancelled. He must serve out the remainder of the sentence.

Jack, J.—I agree. I would only like to add that in my opinion whether a man can be convicted without a separate charge on a charge of abetment of the principal offence depends upon the circumstances of the case. But it can only be done where the circumstances bring the case under S. 237, Criminal P. C. In the present case I think the circumstances are such as to bring the case under S. 237 and I think the Court was justified in convicting the accused inasmuch as the absence of a separate charge was not likely to prejudice the petitioner. I think, however, that in this particular case the trial Court should have convicted the accused under S. 120-B, I. P. C. The learned Judge finds that there is no direct evidence to sustain the charge under S. 120-B against four accused persons. It is not easy to understand what he means by this inasmuch as the evidence on which he convicted the petitioner under S. 420/114 was in itself sufficient to convict him on the charge under S. 120-B. On the findings arrived at by both the Courts below the petitioner was clearly guilty under S. 120-B and he ought to have been convicted under that section. But inasmuch as the appellant has not been prejudiced by the procedure adopted it is not necessary for us to interfere.

Misc. Criminal Case No. 194 of 1929,
Decided on 20th September 1929.

Criminal P. C., S. 526—Where susceptibilities of accused are moved by fact that Magistrate has outside knowledge of proceedings, case should be transferred.

A Judge or Magistrate having outside knowledge in respect of matters which form the subject matter of the proceedings before him and having such knowledge from outside the Court before the actual hearing of these proceedings commences is in a position of embarrassment in dealing with the case. The question is not in these cases as to whether the Magistrate having such outside knowledge will utilise that knowledge for the purpose of decision in the case but the question is whether there can be any reasonable apprehension in the minds of the accused persons that the Magistrate having the outside knowledge before him may not be betrayed by it into taking a view which the evidence might not support. Where the susceptibilities of the accused persons are reasonably moved by the reason of the fact that the Magistrate has outside knowledge not based on evidence on record, the case should be transferred from him: *Sergeant v. B. C. Chatterjee, N. R. Das Gupta, Suresh Chandra Taluqdar and Radhika Ranjan Guha—for Petitioners.

A. K. Bose—for the Crown.

Mitter, J.—This is an application under S. 526, Criminal P. C., on behalf of Satindra Nath Sen and 13 others for transfer of certain proceedings that are pending against them under S. 110, Cls. (e) and (f), Criminal P. C., from the file of the District Magistrate of Barisal before whom these proceedings are now pending.

The proceedings, when they were first started, were being heard by a Magistrate of that District, Mr. B. R. Sen, and an application was made to this Court for transfer of these proceedings from the file of Mr. Sen to the file of some other Magistrate in the district, to this Court. That application was heard by my learned brothers C. C. Ghose, J. and Jack, J., on 17th July 1929, and the learned Judges said in that case that having regard to the peculiar circumstances of the cases in which the present accused had been involved and in order to allay whatever suspicions or apprehensions might exist in the minds of the petitioners it was desirable that the case should be transferred from the file of Mr. Sen to the file of Mr. Hutchings, the District Magistrate. It was pointed out in that judgment that as against Mr. Hutchings nothing had been suggested and nothing could be suggested and the learned Judges were satisfied that if the case went to him, and was tried by him from the point which had been reached before Mr. Sen, adequate justice would be done to the accused. In that view, the learned Judges directed a transfer of the proceedings to the file of Mr. Hutchings. Mr. A. K. Basu, Government Counsel who is now appearing on behalf of the Crown was also then representing the Crown and he assented to that order of the learned Judges, dated 17th July. The matter was, accordingly being heard by Mr. Hutchings, the District Magistrate and up to now about 91 witnesses have been examined for the prosecution and cross-examined. During the course of these proceedings it appears that Mr. Hutchings, the learned District Magistrate, gave out in the course of a conversation with Mr. N. R. Das Gupta, counsel for the petitioners, outside the Court that he had personal knowledge of certain matters in respect of which these proceedings had been initiated. I shall advert to these matters in detail later.

After this information was communicated by Mr. Hutchings outside the Court, to the learned counsel, it appears that a petition was put in before the learned District Magistrate in which it was stated that the District Magistrate should not try the case and that the petitioners intended making an application for transfer to the High Court because of three reasons. It was said first that the learned District Magistrate had personal knowledge of certain incidents in the Barisal Exhibition, and some of the overt acts in connexion with that Exhibition which form some of the charges on which these proceedings under S. 110 are based. It was pointed out, in the second place, that the learned District Magistrate had outside knowledge in respect of incidents in connexion with the Laukati Union and he knew all the state of affairs in respect of that Union the incidents in connexion with which form the subject matter of some of the overt acts in respect of the S. 110 proceedings. It was further pointed out that the learned District Magistrate, in the third place, had acquired certain knowledge in connexion with the incidents the subject matter of controversy in the S. 110 proceedings from certain confidential report of Mr. Blandy, who was the previous Magistrate of the district.

The application which mentioned these facts was presented to the District Magistrate who directed the application to the filed. Subsequently on the basis of these facts which the petitioners say have been revealed by the District Magistrate himself, the petitioners feel that the case had better not be tried by the learned District Magistrate.

Mr. Chatterjee appearing for the petitioners has made it plain to us that he has nothing to say personally against the District Magistrate but he contends that having regard to the facts disclosed by the District Magistrate himself in the course of these proceedings his client's susceptibilities are moved in respect of this, namely, that even at this stage it is better that the learned District Magistrate should not try this case with the outside knowledge in respect of some of the incidents in his mind.

The matter was heard on a previous day when the Deputy Legal Remembrancer, Mr. Bhattacharya appeared for the Crown and Mr. Chatterji offered that if the Crown gave up the charges with regard to the Exhibition and with regard to the Union Board he would not press for a transfer of the case from the district. Mr. Bhattacharya put himself in communication with the District Magistrate and today we have heard Mr. A. K. Basu, Government Counsel, who now appears on behalf of the Crown. Mr. Basu is unable to agree on behalf of the Crown to give up the charges in respect of the Exhibition and, with regard to the incidents connected with the Laukati Union, Mr. Basu says that he is prepared to stand by the offer made by Mr. Bhattacharya that the Government was willing to give up this charge. To this, however, Mr. Chatterji does not agree. We have, therefore, now to consider this application for transfer on its merits.

It is stated by Mr. Basu that this transfer application should not be allowed in view of the fact that it was at the suggestion of Mr. Chatterji that the case was transferred to Mr. Hutchings and that Mr. Basu told the Court at that time that there was no officer in that district who was more intimately connected with the matter than Mr. Hutchings and who had a full knowledge of the circumstances. It is said, that Mr. Chatterji agreed to a transfer to Mr. Hutchings and it is argued on behalf of the Crown that it does not lie in the mouth of the petitioners to have the case retransferred from the file of Mr. Hutchings, more particularly when the prosecution case has almost come to a termination, so far as the evidence of witnesses is concerned. On the other hand, it is submitted on behalf of the petitioners that they are making this application as they are compelled to make it in view of the revelations, very candidly made by the learned District Magistrate himself both in respect of what was said to counsel as well as in the explanation which has been read to us by Mr. Basu. It is necessary to refer to particular parts of the explanation in order to consider whether in view of what has been said here, is it or is it not desirable that Mr. Hutchings should further deal with these proceedings. The learned District Magistrate says with regard to the Barisal Exhibition thus :

"I had no connexion officially or unofficially with the Barisal Exhibition in January 1929, although at the time I was holding the post of Additional District Magistrate, Barisal, I had no connexion with the organization of the Exhibition nor with its policy or with the policy of the District Magistrate towards it. I did, however, visit it as a spectator on many occasions and I observed the following incidents related by witnesses in Court: I saw young persons picketing on the road outside the exhibition and I saw the persons lying down to prevent the entry of the public through the main exhibition gate. I also walked up and down the outside exhibition gate to see that the methods adopted by the picketters did not result in an affray. In short, I observed the general methods adopted by the picketters but I had no knowledge from my own observation of the identity of any of the persons who took part in the picketting or by whom they were directed or what their motives were. I can say that from a conversation with persons who had knowledge of these things, I came to know that the picketters were organised and controlled by Satin Sen's party and eventually by Satin Sen himself. I also heard but did not observe that they had used offensive language to members of the public including ladies and there were at times considerable apprehensions that their actions might lead to affrays or even serious rioting."

With regard to the exhibition, the learned District Magistrate further said:

"I likewise recall and know from personal observation that after the exhibition special patrols were placed along the roads for the protection of officials and others. I did not issue the orders for these patrols, nor can I say who did so. But I saw the patrols myself and was informed of their purpose. I likewise recall that on a certain day in January on which Satindra Nath Sen was arrested under S. 107, Criminal P. C. and that I was attending the Races when the District Magistrate requested me to hold myself in readiness to assist him in dealing with a procession which it was feared to force its way up to the exhibition, and I likewise recall that the District Magistrate informed me that he had ordered the arrest of Satindra Nath Sen under S. 107, Criminal P. C. as he had received information that respectable citizens of Barisal apprehended a serious breach of the peace unless such action were immediately taken. Of the sources of this information or what orders were actually issued, I have no knowledge."

So much is said by way of explanation by the District Magistrate in regard to the incidents of the Barisal Exhibition.

With regard to the Unions the following explanation is given by the learned District Magistrate :

"The only extra judicial knowledge that I had of the Laukati incident arose from my study of a file regarding the spread of the Village Self Government Act in the District of Barisal. From this I gained the impression that there was opposition to Union Boards at a place called Laukati, that Satindra Nath Sen took part in the dispute, that on a certain occasion he came in conflict with the police and was reported both to have pushed or struck the police officers and to have received a slight injury himself. Of the details of the incident I have no personal knowledge. As regards the other Union Boards, my extra-judicial knowledge of them may be said to consist in this that in the file above referred to, it was recorded that opposition to Union Boards existed in them and was strengthened by the action of volunteers and politically minded persons who fostered discontent with a view to embarrassing the District authorities, and that in several Unions, the Boards had to be either superseded or the operations-of the Act suspended. This I trace from my recollection of a note based on reports of local officers at the time."

It has been contended on behalf of the accused that the explanation reveals at least with regard to the incidents connected with the exhibition that the District Magistrate had knowledge of the incidents which were the subject matter of the proceedings before him in connexion with the exhibition from outside sources; and as such it is not desirable on general principles which are accepted in all the Courts that the District Magistrate, having such outside knowledge, should try the case which is before him. It is true that the District Magistrate has not been cited as a witness with reference to these matters and as a matter of fact the learned counsel has abandoned any such case. But at the same time it is difficult to shut one's eyes to the fact that a Judge or a Magistrate, having outside knowledge in respect of matters which form the subject matter of proceedings before him, and having such knowledge from conversations outside the Court before the actual hearing of these proceedings commences, is in a position of some embarrassment in dealing with the case. The question is not in these cases as to whether the Magistrate, having such outside knowledge, will utilise that knowledge for the purpose of decision in this case, but the question is whether there can be any reasonable apprehension in the minds of the accused persons that the District Magistrate, having this outside knowledge before him may not be betrayed by such outside knowledge into taking a view which the evidence might not support. As I have said at the very outset, possibly Mr. Hutchings could have kept this knowledge out of the proceedings when he was dealing with these proceedings, but the point of view from which the transfer application has to be looked into is whether the susceptibilities of the accused persons are not reasonably moved by reason of the fact that the District Magistrate has, at least in connexion with some incidents, which form the subject matter of the proceedings, outside knowledge or knowledge which is not based on the evidence on the record.

In cases of this description, the rule which has been followed was laid down in a very early English case, the case of

Sergeant v. Dale (1) which has been followed in this Court. It is pointed out in that case by Lush, J. that in matters like this:

"The law has regard, not so much perhaps to the motives which might be supposed to bias the Judge, as to the susceptibilities of the litigant parties. One important object, at all events, is to clear away everything which might engender suspicion and distrust of the tribunal and so to promote the feeling of confidence in the administration of justice which is so essential to social order and security."

This view of the learned Judge has been followed in several other cases in this Court to some of which reference might be made. For instance, the case of Girish Chandra Ghose v. Queen Empress, (2) and the case of Dupeyron v. Driver (3).

We have been at pains to consider this question to which we have given our most careful consideration. Although it seemed at the outset extremely inconvenient to transfer the case which has almost come to a termination and in which as many as 91 witnesses have already been examined, yet we think, having regard to the incidents that have happened, and to what the District Magistrate himself has said that it would not be right to allow this case to remain in the file of Mr. Hutchings.

The question next arises whether this case should be transferred outside the district. In respect of this matter I asked Mr. Basu and he says that if any transfer is to be made at all, it should be made to the Court of Mr. Roxburgh, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta. To this also the accused have no objection.

In these circumstances we direct that these proceedings now pending before the District Magistrate be transferred to the file of the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta, to be taken up from the point which it has reached in the Court of the District Magistrate.

The learned District Magistrate of Barisal will send the record of this case to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta, with the greatest possible expedition.

S. K. Ghose, J.—I agree.

Criminal Revn. No. 106 of 1929, Decided on 21st June 1929, from order of Addl. Dist. Magistrate, Sylhet, D/- 11th February 1929.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 139-A — Magistrate cannot depute another Magistrate to make enquiry and report.

Section 139-A contemplates an enquiry by Magistrate himself and he cannot depute another Magistrate to make the enquiry and report. [P 813 C 2]

(b) Criminal P. C., Ss. 139-A and 537—Omission to conduct enquiry by Magistrate himself is irregularity incurable by S. 537.

A Magistrate in proceedings under S. 133 has no jurisdiction to make over the enquiry under S. 139-A to any Magistrate subordinate to him, and omission to conduct it himself is an irregularity incurable by S. 537.

The reason for the above proposition is that the Magistrate has to decide upon either staying the proceedings or further proceedings under S. 137 or 138 and this decision necessitates his considering the reliability of the evidence and proper valuation of it, which both he is better fitted to do if he himself undertakes it. Mere reading of the enquiry as made by a Subordinate Magistrate and acting upon it does not enable him to do this work efficiently. [P 813 C 2]

Priya Nath Dutt—for Petitioners.Benoyendra Nath Palit—for Opposite Parties.Judgment.—This Rule is directed against an order passed in proceedings under S. 133, Criminal P. C., relating to alleged obstruction of a public path. The conditional order was passed by the Additional District Magistrate on 5th June 1928. On 20th June the opposite party No. 3 appeared and denied the existence of the right, and 6th July was fixed for taking evidence. On 6th July all the opposite parties appeared and gave a denial of the right, whereupon the Magistrate passed an order making the case over to Babu A. M. Dam, E. A. C. for enquiry and to report to the existence of a public path. His report was submitted after enquiry, and the report was in favour of the existence of the right. On 17th August the Additional District Magistrate took the report into consideration and acted upon it by passing an order declaring it to be a public path. Matters then proceeded before a jury, the majority of whom found that the obstruction should be removed. This Rule was issued on the ground that the provisions of S. 139-A had not been complied with, and that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to direct an enquiry by another Magistrate as to the existence of the right. There was also a question as regards the constitution of the jury to which it is unnecessary to refer further in view of our decision.

It is conceded that the terms of the S. 139-A contemplate an enquiry by the Magistrate himself; there is no such provision in proceedings under Chap. 10 for deputing a subordinate Magistrate to make the enquiry as is to be found under Chap. 12 expressly laid down by the terms of S. 148. It is, however, said that in effect the Magistrate did hold the enquiry himself by reading and acting on the report of the subordinate Magistrate and there has been no prejudice; that the accused participated in all the proceedings in the subsequent stage: and that the omission of the Magistrate to enquire is a mere irregularity which is cured under S. 537. We are of opinion that the matter cannot be disposed of in this manner. Upon the result of the enquiry depends the subsequent procedure—either a stay of proceedings, or a further step under S. 137 or 138. The test is whether there is or is not reliable evidence in support of the denial of the existence of the alleged public right. The value of the evidence is a matter better determined by the Magistrate if he has heard it himself than if, as appears from the order sheet in the present case, he merely “read the report” of his subordinate. Moreover the Magistrate to whom the enquiry was deputed in the present case was, we are told, a Third Class Magistrate whereas the opening words of S. 133 shows that the intention is that this class of proceeding should be in the hands either of a District Magistrate, a Sub-Divisional Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class. We accordingly are of opinion that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction in the present case to make over the enquiry as he did, and for these reasons the Rule must be made absolute. Fresh proceedings may be instituted if necessary.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by a purchaser of a holding in execution of a rent decree. It appears that there was a litigation between respondents 1 and 2, and respondents 3 and 4 as to the title to the property in question. When they were litigating with regard to the property, the landlord, respondent 3, brought a suit for rent and obtained a decree against respondent 4 who was said to be his recorded tenant. In execution of that decree, the holding was sold and purchased by the appellant. The title suit between the respondents was decreed in favour of respondent 2 and dismissed as regards respondent 1 in the trial Court. There were two appeals against that decree and ultimately the title to the property was found in favour of both respondents 1 and 2. The proceeding out of which this appeal arises was instituted by respondents 1 and 2 under S. 144, Civil P. C., for recovery of possession of the property which was purchased by the appellant in execution of the rent decree.

It was said that the result of the litigation between respondents 1 and 2 on the one hand and respondents 3 and 4 on the other was that the rent decree obtained by respondent 3 against respondent 4 was reversed and, therefore, the applicants were entitled to restitution by way of recovery of possession from the auction-purchaser at the rent sale by the present proceedings. The trial Court held that S. 144 applied to the case and this opinion was affirmed by the learned District Judge on appeal by the auction-purchaser. Against that order the auction-purchaser who was the opposite party in the trial Court has preferred this appeal. His contention is that it is not a matter which falls within the provisions of S. 144 of the Code, that this section only applies where the decree of a Court of first instance is varied or reversed on appeal and it does not apply to a case where, as the result of a different suit, the title of a person derived by purchase under quite a different proceeding in execution of a decree which stands unreversed is questioned. In my opinion this contention is sound and must be accepted. A decree can only be said to be varied or reversed by an appeal, review or revision.

It may be possible that the result of a subsequent suit may affect the right of a person under a decree obtained in a previous suit but it seems to me that it would be straining the meaning of words to say that the previous decree is reversed or varied by the subsequent decree. Apart from authorities, which I shall presently discuss, it seems to me that the provision that the Court which is to make a restitution is the Court of first instance implies a Court the decree of which is reversed by a Court of appeal. Take for instance this case, where the decree for rent might have been passed by one Court, and confirmed on appeal in execution of which the appellant purchased the property. The suit for title between the respondents might have been tried by another Court which ultimately succeeded on appeal. Which Court of first instance is to make restitution? The legislature would not have left the matter unprovided for if it was contemplated that a decree might be reversed by a separate suit. Reference may be made to S. 583 of the Code of 1882 which has been replaced by S. 144 of the present Code, if there is any doubt about the matter. That section provided that any party entitled to any benefit (by way of restitution or otherwise) under a decree passed in an appeal was to apply to the Court which passed the decree against which the appeal was preferred.

In my opinion reference to an appeal was omitted in S. 144 because it was not necessary having regard to the expression "Court of first instance" the decree of which is varied or reversed. The learned advocate for the respondent, however, relies upon the case of Subbarayudu v. Seshasani (1), in support of his contention that S. 144 applies to cases where a decree may be held to have been reversed otherwise than in first or second appeal. There the learned Judges came to their conclusion "not without some hesitation." They referred to the case of Shama Purshad v. Hurro Purshad (2), (at pp. 211 and 212) as supporting their view. In that case their Lordships laid down the general principle of law about which there can be no question. The facts, however might probably be considered as lending support to the view of the Madras Court. But that case has been explained by the Privy Council in the case of Naganna Naidu v. Venkatapayya Ravi (3) (at pp. 305 to 307 of 50 I. A.). Referring to Shama Purshad's case (2), their Lordships say:

"In that case the Judicial Committee in applying the test already quoted, namely, "whether the decree or judgment under which the money was originally recovered had been reversed or superseded," were of opinion that it was plainly intended by the order in Council in that case that all the rights and liabilities of the parties should be dealt with under it, and it would be in contravention of the order to permit the decrees obtained pending the appeal on which it was made to interfere with this purpose. It was pointed out . . . . . that such decrees were mere subordinate and dependent decrees, which could no longer be held to have remained in force when the decree on which they were dependent had been reversed."

Their Lordships further said that they preferred the reasonings and conclusions set forth in the dissentient judgment of Garth, C. J., in the case of Jogesh Chunder v. Kali Churn (4). The learned Chief Justice said:

"I have searched in vain to find any other instance in which the decree of an appellate Court in one suit has been held to have the legal effect of annulling or altering ipso facto a decree made by a subordinate Court in another suit."

I respectfully agree with the observation and hold that S. 144 refers only to cases where a decree of the Court of first instance is reversed on appeal or revision. This view of S. 144 has been taken by the Patna High Court in the case of Chintaman Singh v. Chuni Sahu (5).

It seems to me that the object of S. 144 is to provide a speedy and simple remedy for any party who has suffered by reason of an erroneous decree made by a Court of first instance and it does not apply to a case where the Court has to decide questions of conflicting rights under different decrees which may be very complicated.

I, therefore, hold that the decision of the Court below is not correct.

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the application of the respondents dismissed with costs in both the Courts. We fix the hearing-fee in this Court at three gold mohurs.

(a) Court-fees Act, Sch. 2, Art. 17—Valuation of memorandum of appeal for court-fee—Appeal against preliminary decree in suit for accounts—Final decree passed subsequently—Art. 17 does not apply—Court-fee must be paid on amount of final decree.

Article 17 was never intended to apply to a case where a person with a definite decree for a particular amount of money against him seeks to set it aside. The question whether or not the decree is at the moment capable of being executed without payment of certain amount by the plaintiff as additional court-fee is not a question which affects the method in which the relief in a memorandum of appeal may be valued. [P 816 C 2]

Where the defendant has already appealed against the preliminary decree, and in the meanwhile the final decree is passed against him, it is the final decree that the appellant attacks and there is no escape from the conclusion that it is on the amount of final decree that the court-fee must be paid. Due allowance will be made for court-fee already paid. [P 817 C 2]

Judgment.—In this case, the plaintiff brought a suit for accounts against two defendants as executors of the plaintiff's grandmother. He valued his suit so far as regards the claim for accounts at Rs. 1,000 and this he appears to have done quite reasonably and correctly under sub-Cl. (f), sub-S. (4), S. 7, Court-fees Act.

A preliminary decree for accounts was made against the two defendants and from this they appealed to the High Court paying full court-fee so far as regards the claim for accounts, viz., on Rs. 1,000. They paid apparently a court-fee on Rs. 1,300 altogether. A stay of execution was asked for from this Court but was refused and the suit in the Court below proceeded; after an enquiry and report by a commissioner a final decree was made in the plaintiff's favour for Rs. 6,418 as the amount due from the defendants upon the taking of the accounts. The judgment did not require the plaintiff as a condition precedent to deposit an additional court-fee within a given time nor did it order that on his failure to do so, the suit should be dismissed. It appears that there is no provision in the Statute Law requiring the Court to make an order in that form. There is, however, a provision by S. 11, Court-fees Act, which is as follows :

"If the profits or amount decreed are or is in excess of the profits claimed or the amount at which the plaintiff valued the relief sought, the decree shall not be executed until the difference between the fee be actually paid and the fee which would have been payable had the suit comprised the whole of the profits or accounts so decreed shall have been paid to the proper officer."

Thereupon, the defendants bring in this Court an appeal from the final decree and the question before me is the question of the proper amount of the court-fee that they must pay upon their memorandum of appeal. It appears to me to be prima facie clear that the amount payable upon this memorandum of appeal is governed by the same words as governed the plaintiff's liability to pay court-fee when he brought his suit. It is governed by Cl. (f), sub-S. (4), S. 7, Court-fees Act :

"Suits for accounts according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the memorandum of appeal."

The Registrar, I think, viewed this matter exactly in the proper way. The question is the liability being according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the memorandum of appeal is it proper in this appeal to say that under Art. 17, Sch. 2, it is impossible to value the relief or is it open to the appellant to say that it is possible to value the relief, but that he can justify a valuation that is less than the sum of Rs. 6,418 by reason of the fact that the decree of the lower appellate Court as it stands is not at this moment a decree which can be executed without payment of further court-fee. In my judgment, it is reasonably clear that Art. 17, Sch. 2, cannot be applied in these circumstances at all. It was never intended to apply to a case where a person with a definite decree for a particular sum of money against him seeks to set it aside. The question whether or not a decree is at this moment capable of being executed without payment of a certain amount of money by the plaintiff as a court-fee is not, in my judgment, a question which affects the method in which the relief in a memorandum of appeal of this character can be valued. It is in no way for this Court to estimate or value the chances of the plaintiff paying the necessary court-fee in order to get execution. The appeal is an appeal from a decree. The execution of the decree seems to me to be an extraneous and collateral matter altogether. It is the decree which establishes the liability. The mere fact that the plaintiff would have to pay a fee to enforce the liability is not a matter which affects the fact that the defendants here are endeavouring to get rid of a liability of Rs. 6,418. One may consider this matter from the strict point of view of theory. It might quite well be that the plaintiff would never need to apply to enforce his claim by execution. He might have a cross-claim which he might set off. There might be other ways in which he might be able to utilize his decree. It cannot be said that there is anything defective in the decree itself and as the plaintiff is at the present moment not concerned with any question of execution it does not seem necessary that this question of execution should be taken to affect the case at all.

It has been contended by Mr. Bagchi that the reason why the Judge in the Court below did not insist upon payment of a further court-fee as a condition precedent was that if the appeal against the preliminary decree succeeded the additional court-fee paid by the plaintiff in respect of the final decree would be paid in vain since the final decree would be brought to the ground if the preliminary decree were set aside. I do not know whether that was the motive of the learned Judge or not but this question cannot depend upon the motive of the learned Judge in the Court below. It is said to be inequitable that the defendants should have to pay a court-fee on Rs. 6,418 when, so far, the plaintiff has never had to pay a court-fee upon that amount. Equity and equality are sometimes two different things. What the plaintiff had to pay is not to my mind relevant on the question of what the defendants should pay. Defendants have thought fit to appeal against the decree. They have sufficient respect or fear for the decree to make it seem worth while to bring the appeal against the decree itself. It does seem to me that even if it turns out that the plaintiff has been treated in a lenient way consistent with the court-fees Act that is not any reason why in a matter of this kind I should treat the defendants otherwise than in accordance with the meaning of the statute. It is very probable that the plaintiff will pay additional court-fee and in that case the question of equity will vanish altogether. I cannot think that the expression used in the course of discussing another matter in the case of Kanchan Mandar v. Kamala Prosad Chaudhuri, (1) ought to be regarded as in any way an authority on the point. It is quite true that in putting a hypothetical case the learned Judges said :

"If mesne profits had been decreed for a higher sum than what is claimed in the plaint and if the plaintiff had obtained a decree for such sum upon payment of additional court-fees, the defendants might have been called upon to pay the difference."

The learned Judges there put the case which was the usual case but their remarks cannot be treated as impliedly deciding a case in which the plaintiff got a decree without immediate payment of additional court-fees.

I have been carefully through the note made by the Registrar in this matter and agree in the view which he takes. It is quite clear upon the authority of the case I have already mentioned and also on the case of Ram Mandar v. Maharani Nawlakhati, (2) that for the purpose of this appeal the defendants will get credit for what they have already paid in connexion with the appeal from the preliminary decree, the principle being that the defendants are in the end resisting certain claim and on that they have come to Court and they do not have to pay the court-fees twice over. I am satisfied that the figure at which the Registrar has assessed the liability in his reference is the correct figure and confirm it.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the judgment-debtor against an order refusing to set aside the sale of certain properties in execution of a decree obtained by the respondent and purchased by him. The first objection refers to certain properties within the districts of Pabna and Rangpur. The properties were sold by the Subordinate Judge having jurisdiction in the district of Dacca. The learned Subordinate Judge has held that under S. 39, Civil P. C., the Court which passed the decree for money could sell properties belonging to the judgment-debtor situate outside its jurisdiction. He comes to that conclusion, because in S. 39 the language is that:

"the Court which passed a decree may send it for execution to another Court."

He held that the word "may" does not mean "shall" or "must." Having come to that conclusion he held that the Court which passed the decree could execute the decree by selling properties situate outside its territorial jurisdiction. There cannot be any doubt that this construction is not correct. Where it is necessary in execution of a decree for money to sell properties not within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree, the sale of the properties can only be effected by the Court within the local limits of which the property is situate. It is only necessary to refer to the Full Bench case of Prem Chand Dey v. Mokhoda Debi (1), at p 703. The learned advocate for the respondent sought to support the decision of the Subordinate Judge not on the ground on which he put it and in fact he stated that that ground cannot possibly be supported but on a different ground. His argument was that these properties had been attached at the instance of the decree-holder before judgment, and that being so, under O. 38, R. 11, Civil P. C., it was not necessary to attach these properties afresh in execution of the decree obtained by the respondent. He next referred to O. 21, R. 64 and his argument was that the Dacca Court was the Court executing the decree because there were other properties situate within the territorial jurisdiction of the Dacca Court. He then laid stress upon the opening words of O. 21, R. 64 namely:

"any Court executing a decree may order that any property attached by it and liable to sale . . . shall be sold."

He contended that as the Dacca Court was the Court executing the decree and the properties in question were attached by it, it can sell the properties. It was further argued in support of the contention that where a Court passes a decree on a mortgage by which the properties situated within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court and also those outside such local limits are mortgaged, the Court which passed the decree can sell the properties situated within both the jurisdictions. Similarly, as properties were attached before judgment both within and outside the local limits of its jurisdiction, the Dacca Court might sell all the properties attached by it before judgment. This argument would imply that the effect of attachment is the same as a mortgage. But that is not so. It has been pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Moti Lal v. Karrabuddin (2), that attachment confers no title. It only prevents a person from alienating the property. There is no analogy, therefore, between the case of a decree for sale of properties passed on a mortgage and a mere attachment before judgment where a decree for money is passed in favour of the plaintiff. The argument based on the wording of O. 21, R. 64 also seems to me to be incapable of the construction which is sought to be put upon it. That rule is one of a series of rules which deals with the mode of execution of a decree by a Court having jurisdiction to execute the decree and it has no reference to the question as to the jurisdiction of the Court which should execute a decree. The question of jurisdiction must be governed by the Full Bench case of Prem Chand Dey v. Mokhoda Debi (1), cited above. It is also expedient that in such a case as this the property should be sold by the Court within the territorial limits of which it is situate. The disadvantage which a judgment-debtor is likely to suffer by a sale effected by a Court situated at a great distance from the property can very well be imagined. One cannot expect to find a bidder for properties situated within the districts of Pabna and Rangpur, particularly of small shares, if those properties are sold at Dacca. We are of opinion that the Dacca Court had no jurisdiction to sell the properties outside the local limits of its jurisdiction. The sale of the properties within the districts of Pabna and Rangpur must accordingly be set aside.

The next objection on the part of the appellant is with regard to the sale of eight items of property given at pp. 6 and 7 of the paper-book. The contention of the appellant with regard to these properties is that the valuation given in the sale proclamation by the decree-holder was unconscionably low. It is not necessary to give in detail the valuations given with regard to all the properties. It would be sufficient to say that a property the value of which is given as Rs. 2 was purchased by the decree-holder himself for Rs. 300; another property which was valued at Rs. 5 was purchased by the decree-holder for Rs. 150 and so on. The judgment-debtor gave evidence to the effect that the value of these properties was considerably higher. This evidence was supported by two documents one of which was a sale certificate by which a three-annas odd share of property No. 10 given at p. 7 of the paper-book was purchased for Rs. 5,700. The appellant's share would be worth according to that valuation Rs. 950. The decree-holder purchased it for Rs. 150. The other seven properties were purchased by a kabala for Rs. 13,000 and odd in 1916. According to that the plaintiff's one sixth interest would be valued at Rs. 2,000 and odd. The decree-holder purchased those properties for Rs. 515 by adding up the prices he paid for each item. Whether the present price of the properties has increased or diminished they having deteriorated, we need not consider. The important fact is that the decree-holder himself purchased the properties at many times more than the value given in the sale proclamation. That itself brings the case within the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Saadatman Khan v. Phul Kuar (3) see also Basanta Kumari v. Ram Kanai (4). The gross under-valuation of the properties must have deterred intending purchasers from bidding at the sale and offering reasonable value. The sale of those properties, therefore, should also be set aside.

The appeal with regard to these properties must accordingly be allowed. The appellant is entitled to his costs ten gold mohurs.

lates that not merely may there be active inducement on the part of the declarant for a belief in the mind of another person but it is enough if the declaration is such by which the declarant in the ordinary course permits somebody else to believe in the truth of the declaration and to act on that belief. [P 821 C 1]

(b) Evidence Act, S. 115—Acts or declarations need not be intentional.

The law of this country gives no countenance to the doctrine that in order to create estoppel the person whose acts or declarations induced another to act in a particular way must have been under no mistake himself or must have acted with an intention to mislead or deceive. What the law and Indian Statute mainly regard is the position of the person who was induced to act and the principle on which the law and the statute rest is that it would be most inequitable and unjust to him that if another, by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it. So long as there is no duty cast upon the person induced not to rely upon the inducer's statement but to make further inquiries the word "intentionally" is satisfied: 20 Cal. 296 (P.C.), Foll. [P 821 C 2]

(c) Evidence Act, S. 115—Representation involving mixed question of law and fact is a "thing."

A representation that the interests of a deceased had devolved upon the persons making the representation is a "thing" within the meaning of S. 115 as it is not a question of law but is mixed question of law and fact. [P 821 C 2]

Judgment.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit for rent. The suit was decreed by the trial Court. The defendants then preferred an appeal during the pendency of which one of the plaintiffs respondents named Raja Mia died. The death of this person took place admittedly some time in the year 1925. The fact of his death, however, was not brought to the notice of the lower appellate Court by any of the parties. On 8th March 1926, the lower appellate Court allowed the appeal and reversing the decree of the trial Court dismissed the suit. The remaining plaintiffs then preferred this present appeal.

The contention that is sought to be urged on behalf of the said appellants is that the decree of the lower appellate Court in so far as it was a decree passed in an appeal which was not properly constituted, the suit out of which the said appeal has arisen being one for rent and the decree from which that appeal was taken being a joint decree for rent in favour of all the plaintiffs, was a nullity inasmuch as one of the plaintiffs had died and his heirs had not been substituted in his place. The answer which the respondents give to this contention is that they were misled by the fact that the present appellants had instituted other suits for rent against them alleging that the interest of Raja Mia in the properties had vested in themselves only.

In order to understand the respective contentions of the parties it is necessary to give a few dates and facts. On 30th July 1925, that is to say when the appeal in the present case was pending before the lower appellate Court, the remaining plaintiffs instituted another suit for rent against the respondents in which they stated that Raja Mia having died, his interest had vested in his uncles, plaintiffs 4, 5 and 6 Abdul Hakim, Amir Hamja and Badsha Mia. The plaint in this suit was verified by all the plaintiffs in the suit including plaintiff 1 Barkat Ali Haji. This second appeal was filed in this Court on 21st June 1926 and the main ground of the appeal was the invalidity of the decree due to Raja Mia's death. On 22nd May 1928 the said Barkat Ali Haji swore to an affidavit in which he stated that Raja Mia had died on 8th August 1925 but that no application for substitution of his heirs had been made in the lower appellate Court and that Court made a decree against all the plaintiffs including Raja Mia who was dead. It will appear therefore that the date of Raja Mia's death as given in the said affidavit could not be correct, because though it was stated therein that Raja Mia died on 8th August 1925, in the plaint to which I have already referred which was filed on 30th July 1925 it was stated that Raja Mia had already died. After filing the appeal to this Court on 21st June 1926 accompanied with the aforesaid affidavit of Barkat Ali the said remaining plaintiffs, including the said Barkat Ali Haji instituted another suit for rent against the respondents on 16th September 1926 purporting to claim the entire rent and without making any mention of anybody else as the heir of the said Raja Mia.

The facts set out above speak for themselves. They show that while in one set of proceedings the appellants before this Court were instituting suits for rent and getting decrees therein on the footing of they themselves or at least some of them having acquired the interest of Raja Mia, in the appeal which they filed in this Court they have sought to make out that Raja Mia had left other persons, and on them Raja Mia's interest had devolved as heirs. The respondents contend that in view of the fact that representations were made by the appellants in the collateral proceedings, that is to say in the two suits for rent, it should be held that the said appellants are estopped from raising in the present appeal the contention that they are not the only heirs of Raja Mia. It seems to us that it would be whittling down the provisions of S. 115, Evidence Act, to allow the appellants to raise this contention. That section states:

"When one person has by his declaration, act or omission, intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true and to act upon such belief, neither he nor his representative shall be allowed, in any suit or proceeding between himself and such person or his representative, to deny the truth of that thing."

What is said on behalf of the appellants is that the representations contained in the plaint of 1925 were not intended to be acted upon by the defendants and that in point of fact the defendants knew that there were other persons who survived after the death of Raja Mia and that as defendants in the suit they were bound not to take the statements in the plaint as correct but to make further enquiries and ascertain whether the statements were correct or not. We may say at once that we entirely disagree with this contention. This contention overlooks the words "permitted another person to believe a thing" etc. Not merely may there be active inducement on the part of the declarant of a belief in the mind of another person, but it is enough if the declaration is such by which the declarant, in the ordinary course, permits somebody else to believe in the truth of the declaration and to act in that belief.

It is next said that there was no intention on the part of the remaining plaintiffs that the respondents would act on the representation and that the word

"intentionally" which appears in the section has not been satisfied. The answer to that is to be found in the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Sarat Chander Dev v. Gopal Chunder Laha (1). The word "intentionally" has been explained in that decision. In that decision what their Lordships have said is this:

"The law of this country gives no countenance to the doctrine that in order to create estoppel the person whose acts or declarations induced another to act in a particular way must have been under no mistake himself or must have acted with an intention to mislead or deceive. What the law and the Indian statute mainly regard is the position of the person who was induced to act, and the principle on which the law and the statute rest is, that it would be most inequitable and unjust to him that if another, by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation, has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement, to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it. It may in the result be unfortunate for him, but it would be unjust, even though he acted under error, to throw the consequences on the person who believed his statement and acted on it as it was intended he should do."

We are of opinion that so long as it cannot be said that there was any duty cast upon the defendants not to rely upon the statement made in the plaint but to make further enquiries, and in this case we are not in a position to hold that there was any such obligation on the part of the respondents, it cannot be said that the word "intentionally" as used in S. 115, Evidence Act, has not been satisfied. We may state that nothing has been shown to us which would even faintly suggest that the respondents had the least suspicion that the representation was not in fact true.

Then it is contended that the question as to whether the persons left out and not substituted were heirs or were not heirs of Raja Mia is a question of law and therefore it is not a "thing" within the meaning of the section. The representation that was made was that the interest of Raja Mia had devolved upon some of the plaintiffs. That, in our judgment is a "thing" within the meaning of the section, not being a question of law, but a mixed question of law and fact, because it may have been in various ways that the interest of Raja Mia had passed on to other persons and not merely by heirship.

The matter may be looked at from another point of view also. There is the fact of the omission on the part of the present appellants to bring to the notice of the lower appellate Court the fact of the death of Raja Mia and also the fact that he had other heirs. Now, omission also is one of the things that is mentioned in S. 115. If in addition to the active representation contained in the plaint of 1925 there was the omission on the part of the present appellants to allege before the lower appellate Court that the heirs of Raja Mia had not been substituted, it is only reasonable to hold that the respondents were confirmed in their belief as to the truth of the statement contained in the plaint, and it being confirmed in that belief they did not take any steps to make an application for getting an order for substitution the appellants in our opinion are doubly estopped by reason of the provisions of S. 115. We are clearly of opinion that the question that is sought to be raised by the appellants is one which they are not permitted to raise by reason of the provisions of S. 115.

We accordingly find against the contention that has been urged on behalf of the appellants and we dismiss the appeal with costs.

In a warrant case until the stage provided for in S. 256 is reached the accused has no right to cross-examine and consequently the evidence of a witness given before framing of the charge is not admissible under S. 33: 8 C. W. N. 388, Ref. [P 824 C 1]

When a rule of practice or prudence or whatever else it may be called conflicts with the law as laid down by the legislature the Judge is bound to follow the law: 41 Cal. 446, Ref. [P 824 C 1]

(c) Evidence Act, S. 114, Illus. (b)—“May” is not “must” and evidence of accomplice stands on same footing as other evidence.

Although S. 114, Illus. (b), provides that a Court may presume that the evidence of an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless corroborated, “may” is not “must” and no decision of Court can make it “must.” Therefore in spite of all that has been said to the contrary in law, the evidence of an accomplice stands on the same footing as any other evidence. The Court is not obliged to hold that he is unworthy of credit and must be corroborated. It is for the Court to consider after taking into consideration all the circumstances one of which being that he is an accomplice whether it does or does not rely on the evidence. To entirely rule out the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice might in many cases lead to miscarriage of justice. [P 824 C 1, 2]

Cuming, J.—This is a reference under S. 307, Criminal P. C. by the learned Additional Sessions Judge of 24-Parganas in the case of one C. A. Mathews. C. A. Mathews was tried by the learned Additional Sessions Judge of 24-Parganas sitting with a jury on a charge of conspiring with a number of other persons to dishonestly and fraudulently induce intending candidates for the post of travelling ticket checkers in the E. B. Ry. administration to deliver moneys to him by deceiving these persons into a belief that they would on such delivery receive appointments on a monthly pay of Rs. 30 and an allowance of Rs. 15. He was further charged with conspiring with the same persons to cheat a number of persons by obtaining from them moneys as gratification other than legal remuneration from intending candidates for the post of travelling ticket checkers in the said railway, after deceiving them into a belief that they after the delivery of the money would get appointments as stated in the first charge. The jury by a majority of three to two found the accused not guilty. The learned Additional Sessions Judge being of opinion that the accused was guilty under S. 120-B read with S. 161, I. P. C. has referred the case to this Court. It will be seen that originally Mathews was being tried by the Police Magistrate, Sealdah, jointly with a number of other persons who were alleged to be his co-conspirators. Mathews then claimed to be tried as a European British subject and hence he was committed to Sessions and has been tried alone.

The case for the prosecution is briefly this: The accused is a sub-officer of the E. B. Ry. and was in charge of the travelling ticket inspection section of the railways. He with a number of other persons who conspired with him induced a large number of persons to give him various sums of money on the pretext that they would be appointed as travelling ticket checkers. These persons worked for various periods of time on the railway and in the month of September 1927, their services were dispensed with. The case for the prosecution is that Mathews had no authority to make such appointments, that these persons were not properly speaking appointed at all by the railway and that Mathews took from these persons various sums of money as a consideration for giving them the appointments. The case of the defence as set forth by Mathews in his statement in the Sessions Court was that the appointments of almost all these persons had been sanctioned by the Chief Auditor and that he never took any money from them as a reason for their appointments in the railway. It is further suggested by the learned counsel for Mathews that these persons whom he appointed were unpaid probationers and that when their work was found unsatisfactory their services were dispensed with. I say advisedly that this was a case of counsel, because this portion of Mathew's case finds no place in his statement to the Court and is inconsistent with it. There is no suggestion in Mathews' statement in the Sessions Court that they were appointed as unpaid probationers.

I shall first of all deal with the two points of law that arise in this case. The first point deals with the admissibility of the evidence of Mr. W. F. Milne, the Chief Auditor. The facts are these: Mr. Milne was examined as a witness in the Court of the Police Magistrate at Sealdah. At that time apparently the case was being treated as a warrant case and Mathews had been tried together with the other accused. At the close of Mr. Milne's evidence the accused were called on to cross-examine him. This they refused to do. The reason for calling on them at that time to cross-examine Mr. Milne when the charge had not been framed was that Mr. Milne was very ill and was proceeding to England shortly, which he actually did on 2nd May. Subsequently Mathews made an application to be tried as a European British subject. This was allowed and the result was that he was committed to Sessions as I have already stated.

The prosecution now desire to put in as evidence under S. 33, Evidence Act, the statement of Mr. Milne before the Police Magistrate. S. 33 provides that in certain circumstances evidence given in one judicial proceeding is relevant in a subsequent judicial proceeding provided that the adverse party in the first proceedings had the right and opportunity to cross-examine. That the accused had the opportunity of cross-examining this witness, is I think, quite clear. He was asked to do so and he refused so to do. But I think it is also clear that at the stage at which the case had arrived he had no right to cross-examine. S. 252 provides that the Magistrate will take all evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution. S. 254 provides for the drawing up of the charges. S. 256 provides for the cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses which takes place after the charge. Now as far as I can see the accused in a warrant case has no right to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses until after the charge has been framed. The Magistrate may in his discretion allow him to do so, and probably if the accused requested would allow him to do so but the accused cannot claim as of right to cross-examine until the charge has been framed. S. 138, Evidence Act, on which the prosecution rely deals not with the rights of the party but only provides the order in which the proceedings are to be conducted: see the case of Ashirbad Muchi v. Maju Muchini (1) where it was held that the Magistrate should give the accused an opportunity to cross-examine even though the charge may not be framed. But that is not the same as saying that the Court must give him an opportunity. No doubt S. 256 does not prohibit cross-examination at a previous stage but that is not the same as saying that the accused has any right to cross-examine. I am of opinion that until the stage of the case provided for in S. 256 is reached the accused has no right to cross-examine. That being so in the present case the accused had no right to cross-examine and so the evidence of Mr. Milne is not admissible in evidence under S. 33.

The next point that has been argued is that the evidence of the principal witnesses who deposed to the accused taking money is the evidence of accomplices and so must be corroborated. S. 133, Evidence Act, provides the complete answer to this proposition, for it provides that a conviction is not illegal because it proceeds on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. No doubt there is a rule of prudence and practice to warn juries of the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice though at the same time it is open to the Court to hold that it is not illegal to do so. But it is not correct. I think, to say that the rules of prudence and practice or whatever else they may be called can have the force of law is to supersede the express provisions of the legislature. That might perhaps have some force where the law is what is known as Judge-made law. Here in India there is no Judge-made law, for the law is to be found in the Codes and the Judges can only apply the law and do not make the law. To hold otherwise is to substitute for the enactments of the legislature the opinions of the individual Judges. When a rule of practice or prudence or whatever else it may be called conflicts with the law as laid by the legislature I am obviously bound to follow the law. S. 114, Illus. (b) no doubt provides that a Court may presume that the evidence of an accomplice is unworthy of credit unless corroborated, but "may" is not "must" and no decision of the Court can make it "must." It seems to me, therefore, that in spite of all that has been said to the contrary in law the evidence of an accomplice stands on the same footing as any other evidence. The Court is not obliged to hold that he is unworthy of credit and must be corroborated. It is for the Court to consider after taking into consideration all the circumstances one of which being that he is an accomplice whether it does or does not rely on the evidence. To entirely rule out the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice might in many cases lead to a miscarriage of justice.

It is to be remembered that there are, it may be said, many grades of accomplices. They vary from the man who, for example, with his own hand committed a murder to the man who as in the present case it is alleged offered a bribe to another when the latter is being tried for taking the illegal gratification and to that extent aided the accused in committing his offence of taking an illegal gratification. For this man is not strictly speaking guilty of the offence of which the other is being tried and he certainly does not come strictly within the meaning of the term accomplice if we accept the definition of the term accomplice as given by Subrahmanya Ayyar, J. in the case of Ramasawmi Gounden v. Emperor (2) or by Glover, J. in the case of Queen v. Ram Sahoy (3) Subrahmanya Ayyar, J. held that the term accomplice signifies a guilty associate in crime or where the witness sustains such a relation to the criminal act that he could be jointly indicted with the accused. Glover, J. states:

"I understand an accomplice witness to be one who is either being jointly tried for the same offence and makes admissions which may be taken as evidence against a co-prisoner or who has received a conditional pardon on the understanding that he is to tell all he knows and who may at any moment be relegated to the dock."

The witnesses whom it is now sought to stigmatise as accomplice could not be tried for the offence with which the accused is now tried. They are, if anything, guilty of an entirely different offence, namely, of offering the bribe. They do not come within the definitions I have just referred to. However, it is not necessary to further pursue this point. The view which I take is that the evidence of an accomplice should be received on its own merits taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case and its truth or falsity tested by the usual tests which are applied. To hold otherwise is to hold something which is entirely contrary to the law. In India we have the Codes and by the Codes we are to be guided and it is not for the individual Judges or Courts to alter the express provisions of the Codes by what are termed rule of practice or prudence. That is for the legislature and that the legislature alone can do. As a very learned Judge of this Court the late Chief Justice Sir Lawrence Jenkins pointed out:

(2) [1904] 27 Mad. 271=14 M. L. J. 226.

(3) 20 W. R. Cr. 19.

"Not one jot or one tittle can be taken away from or added to the plain and express provisions of the Legislature by any decision of the Court": In re, An Attorney (4) (at p. 454).

The learned Judge was there dealing with S.-195, Criminal P. C. and pointed out that if all the various expressions of opinion are to be read as of universal application the enactment of the legislature would pass out of recognition. And I am equally prepared to say that if all the observations as to the necessity of corroboration and the amount of or what constitutes corroboration of an accomplice were to be read as law S. 133, Evidence Act, would equally pass out of existence. Like this learned Judge I prefer to take my stand on the sections themselves. If a jury may act on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice a Judge may certainly do so. If the evidence of an accomplice requires to be corroborated in all material particulars then obviously it is a waste of time to examine the accomplice at all for his testimony becomes unnecessary. (His Lordship then considered evidence and proceeded). To my mind all these facts go to prove beyond a shadow of doubt that Mathews, Bose, Huq, Mitter and others were all parties to a conspiracy to get illegal gratifications from the various victims who have been examined and others to procure them appointments.

There is a further fact that, as far as I can see there were really no appointments at any time for these men. No attempt has been made to prove that there were. Mathews contends that all these men were duly appointed by the Chief Auditor or their appointments were sanctioned by him. The witness who could have proved this was Mr. Milne, the Chief Auditor. This witness was examined by the prosecution in the Magistrate's Court. He was in a bad state of health and was about to leave for England. The accused had an opportunity to cross-examine him and refused to do so. They were well aware at that time that he had to leave for England and hence if they did not then cross-examine him they would probably have no other opportunity of so doing. They, however, deliberately refrained from so doing. That being so they can hardly complain that Mr. Milne's evidence is not available. It is to be remembered that even if they cross-examined Mr. Milne then they had a right to further cross-examine him after the charge has been framed. They could not have been prejudiced in any way if they had put necessary questions to Mr. Milne at that time even if he were not available for cross-examination later on. On Mathews' own showing these appointments had to be approved by the Chief Auditor. If that were so why did he refrain from cross-examining the Chief Auditor. None of these men's names ever appeared in any salary bill except one. No explanation has been given of this by Mathews. His counsel suggests that they were unpaid probationers. As I have already remarked Mathews never suggested any such thing.

I am therefore of the same opinion as the learned Additional Sessions Judge that Mathews was guilty of conspiracy to take bribes as charged. It is necessary for me in coming to this finding to take into consideration the verdict of the jury and the opinion of the Judge. In dealing with the opinion of the Judge and verdict of the jury it is to be remembered that these persons all of them saw the witness. The Judge and two of the jurors were of opinion that the accused was guilty and the remaining three jurors were of opinion that he was innocent. Little assistance, therefore, will be got from considering the opinion of the persons who actually saw the witnesses, they being equally divided—three believed the witnesses and three apparently disbelieved them.

It is not necessary for me to deal with the other charge, namely, that of cheating.

To my mind the fraud which has been perpetrated on these men was mean and cruel. They were, as far as evidence shows, young men in very poor circumstances, and felt some difficulty in raising the money. It may be said, no doubt, in one sense they were participators in the crime, because they offered bribes. After all they were really trying to get appointments. We accept the reference and sentence the accused C. A. Mathews to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months under S. 120-B read with S. 161, I. P. C.

Appeal No. 107 of 1926, Decided on 5th December 1928, from Original Decree of Special Land Acquisition Judge, 24-Parganas, D/- 2nd March 1926.

Land Acquisition Act (1 of 1894), S. 23—Damages for loss of business can be granted only when person pursuing business is compelled to give it up or carry it on elsewhere at loss but not in case where person was using corpus of land for business.

Loss of business means that a man pursuing some trade or business is compelled to give it up or to carry it on elsewhere, which would give him less profit than what he was making at the former place. It is only in this case that the claimant can lay claim to damages on account of loss of business. And a person is not entitled to claim damages for loss of business, which he was making at the former place by using the corpus, the result of which use would be to make the property altogether valueless after a lapse of time.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by claimant No. 5 against the award of the District Judge in a matter of land acquisition by which the learned District Judge varied the award of the Collector by increasing it to the extent of about Rs. 4,000. The land acquired is about 4 bighas in area which was divided in two plots by the Collector. Both the plots were divided into two belts and the total amount awarded by the Collector with the statutory allowance came up to Rs. 5,669-15-8. Before the Collector, the claimant asked for plot No. 2 at the rate of Rs. 7,000 per bigha and plot No. 3 at the rate of Rs. 5,000 per bigha, together with compensation for loss and damage to business to the extent of Rs. 10,000, altogether Rs. 39,775. In his application for reference, the claimant only claimed the same amount in a lump without specifying the amount he claimed separately, either as value of the land or for loss of business. The land acquired with other lands was purchased by the claimant by a kabala, dated 8th December 1919. The total area conveyed by that document was  $32\frac{1}{2}$  bighas and the price paid was Rs. 45,000. On 19th December 1919, the claimant purchased by a document which purported to sell a half share of 21 bighas 10 cottas for Rs. 10,000. It is urged on behalf of the claimant that this kabala included about 3 bighas of land included in the previous kabala. The claimant purchased another piece of land, 1 bigha  $17\frac{1}{2}$  cottas in area, for Rs. 2,250 on 15th December 1920. These three plots are apparently in the same locality. The declaration was made in December 1920. The learned Judge took an average of the price of these three purchases per bigha and came to the conclusion that the market value of the land would be a little under Rs. 1,200 per bigha. Calculating the price of the area acquired, he came to the conclusion that the actual value would be about Rs. 5,000. To that he added what he considered to be the loss to the business of the claimant and he allowed damages at Rs. 4,000. Adding these two figures with the statutory allowance he varied the award of the Collector to Rs. 10,400 which was reduced to Rs. 9,800 by correcting a mistake in the calculation and Appeal No. 72 of 1927 was preferred on account of this correction.

In the appeal on behalf of the claimant the same amount which was claimed in the Court below was claimed. The principal ground upon which the claim rested was that the Judge made a mistake in taking an average price of the three purchases stated above. The argument was that out of the lands purchased within the  $32\frac{1}{2}$  bighas area 14 bighas were in the possession of mokarari tenants paying Rs. 5 or Rs. 6 as rent and the value of that area could not by any means exceed Rs. 100. Therefore, the value of Rs. 45,000 should be calculated on about 22 bighas of land. This argument is answered on behalf of the Secretary of State by pointing out to us the recitals in the kabala itself by which the claimant purchased the property. The recitals are that only a small portion of the lands is in the possession of temporary thika tenants whom the claimant might eject at any time. The claimant himself has given evidence in this case. He is a business man and a person of education and position. From him we may naturally expect definite evidence with regard to matters of claim. He himself states that he does not know the lands which were in the possession of tenants nor does he know how many tenants there were on the lands. Apparently, there was no investigation on his part as regards the truth or otherwise of the statement that he made in his examination-in-chief, about 14 bighas being in the possession of mokarari tenants. There is no evidence whatsoever that between the date of purchase in 1919 of the 32½ bighas of land by the claimant and the date of the declaration land values had increased to any appreciable extent in that part of the locality. On the other hand, it appears from the claimant's own kabala of 15th December 1920, that the land values were about the same. Therefore, in calculating the market value of the lands acquired, it cannot be said that the learned Judge was wrong in taking an average of the price that was paid on account of the lands purchased by the claimant himself only a year before the acquisition. It is urged, however, that the Collector valued a portion of the land which was only 17 cottas in area at the rate of Rs. 2,000 per bigha and, therefore, the claimant was entitled to have the market value of the whole of the area acquired at the rate of Rs. 2,000 per bigha.

Now, if the claimant really accepts the valuation of the Collector who went to the locality and valued different portions of the land according to its character, then the value would be much less than he claims it to be. But even assuming that Rs. 2,000 per bigha would be the valuation of the land the total amount of the market value of the land would be only Rs. 8,000. Let us take that as the basis of valuation by accepting the entire contention on behalf of the claimant. The next thing that was urged on behalf of the claimant was that the learned Judge has given Rs. 4,000 for loss of business which ought to have been at least Rs. 10,000 as claimed in the petition of the claimant before the Collector, if not more. Evidence was given on behalf of the claimant that he intended to use 3 bighas of land for the purpose of making bricks and he examined an expert to show that by making an excavation of 15 feet on this land, the claimant could manufacture 64 lacs of brick. The first difficulty in accepting the evidence is that no boring was made on the land: nobody could tell whether there was any soil fit for making bricks down to the depth of 15 feet in the land. The claimant himself gives evidence that on the contiguous land he was making bricks and that it was exhausted after he had made six lacs of bricks. It is unnecessary to pursue that question, because in my opinion "loss of business" does not mean the profit you make by using the corpus, the result of which would be that after some lapse of time, the property would be altogether valueless:

"Loss of 'business' means that a man pursuing some trade or business is compelled to give it up or to carry it on elsewhere, which would give him less profit than what he was making at the former place."

In that case he would be entitled to compensation on that account. There is no evidence that the claimant cannot carry on the trade of brick-making on the other land that he has on account of the acquisition, nor is there any evidence that he could not obtain any other lands to carry on the trade of brick-making in the vicinity. To give the market value of the land and, in addition compensation for loss which, the claimant says, has happened to him for being prevented from taking the corpus of the land would really be giving the value of the land twice over. Under the circumstances, in my opinion, nothing could be claimed by the claimant for any loss of business. There is another remarkable thing which was not expected from the claimant of the position of the present appellant that no definite evidence has been given as to what his profits were before the acquisition and what loss he has suffered in his business after the acquisition. No account books have been filed, although we have been told that a mass of papers had been produced in the Court below.

The claimant himself says that from his account books profit and loss cannot be calculated. Under these circumstances, to claim anything for the loss of business on the ground as purported to have been proved by the so called expert is of no substance whatsoever. The appeal is dismissed with costs, as accepting the market value as urged by the appellant the total award is not below that amount.

Appeal No. 992 of 1929, Decided on 26th July 1929.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 40, R. 3—Receiver of debuttar property cannot grant lease without sanction of Court—Concealment and misrepresentation of material facts from Court—Authority to grant is vitiated.

A receiver appointed in respect of a debuttar property has no power to lease the debuttar property without the sanction of the Court and any misrepresentation or concealment of material facts from the Court in connexion with the proposed lease would vitiate the authority of the receiver to grant the lease.

(b) Civil P. C., O. 40, R. 3—Receiver of debuttar property—Lease—Concealment of relationship of receiver and lessee—But for concealment sanction doubtful—Unless lease disadvantageous and not for benefit of estate, it cannot be cancelled.

Where in a lease granted by the receiver of the debuttar property there is concealment of relations of lessee and receiver and it is possible that the Court might not have granted the sanction to the lease or at least scrutinized the terms of the lease more clearly if it were aware of the facts, unless it can be shown that the lease in any way was disadvantageous one and not to the benefit of the debuttar estate it cannot be cancelled.

(c) Civil P. C., O. 40, R. 3—Receiver of debuttar property granting lease—Reason to suspect fraud at inception not sufficient for cancellation.

In cases of lease by a receiver of the debuttar property the fact that there was reason to suspect fraud at its inception is not sufficient ground for the cancellation of the lease.

[P 829 C 1]

(d) Hindu Law—Religious endowment—Compromise to perform puja by rotation—Idol cannot be moved.

Where there are more than one shebait and it is compromised to worship and perform

Puja by each of them in turn it is not admissible to move the idol from place to place according to the convenience of co-shebait but it should be kept in a place where it can be conveniently worshipped in turn by parties.

Jack, J.—The appeal has arisen out of a dispute as to the rights of the parties in a debuttar estate. The only two questions arising in this appeal are: (1) whether a lease granted by a receiver appointed by the Court to defendant 2 has been rightly cancelled by the lower appellate Court: (2) whether the lower appellate Court was correct in holding that the plaintiffs as co-shebait with defendant 1 were entitled to remove the idol to their exclusive custody for seven and half months of the year. The appellants contend that the decision of the lower appellate Court on both these points is not justified in the circumstances of the case.

The lease was cancelled on the grounds: that (1) the receiver concealed from the Court the fact that the lessee was her own grandson and a brother of Sirish Chandra Banerjee the adopted son of Bama Sundari the previous shebait of the six annas share by virtue of a compromise with Promotho Nath Banerjee. The latter was the predecessor of the plaintiffs and shebait under the compromise of the ten annas share, in whose place the receiver was appointed by the Court. He died in 1924 and the receivership has been terminated by the Court.

The receiver has of course no power to lease the debuttar property without the sanction of the Court and the Court below has quite rightly held that any misrepresentation or concealment of material facts from the Court in connexion with a proposed lease would vitiate the authority of the receiver to grant the lease. In the present case there was such concealment and it is possible that the Court might not have granted sanction to the lease or at least might have scrutinized the terms more closely had it known of the relationship. Another objection is that in the lease an additional clause was introduced which was not contained in the terms proposed in the application for sanction, i. e., that if the lessee was not paid the price of any permanent structures as settled by an engineer appointed by both parties, he would not be bound to give up the property. According to the application (the terms proposed which were sanctioned by the Court) the shebait was to pay to the lessee the full value of all such structures erected by the lessee. That being so, if the value was not paid the lessee would certainly be entitled at least to a lien on the property, so that the added clause did not really add very much to the terms sanctioned.

The first objection is more serious and had it been shown that the lease was in any way a disadvantageous one and not for the benefit of the debuttar estate then I certainly think it should be cancelled. On the findings, however, arrived at by the Court of first instance which have not been upset by the learned appellate Judge it appears that the lease has been to the advantage of the estate and there seems every reason to think that its continuance will be for the advantage of the estate. In these circumstances it is doubtful if there was any fraud practised on the Court or intended when the lease was granted. No attempt has apparently been made to erect permanent structures and the clause entitling the lessee to continue in possession not having received the sanction of the Court would not be binding on the shebait and cannot be deleted from the lease. There seems to be some ground for the surmise of the trial Court that if the lease is cancelled it will lead to wastage of the property through disputes between the shebait and, in the circumstances, since the continuance of the existing lease (apart from the clause about retaining possession on the expiry of the lease) appears to be for the benefit of the estate, the fact that there is reason to suspect fraud at the time of its inception does not seem to be a good ground for cancelling it entirely. Ground 7 of the appeal indicates that the lessee wishes to continue the lease with the objectionable added clause deleted and we think that the order of the Court of appeal below should be modified accordingly.

The remaining point is regarding the removal of the idol. Under the terms of the compromise between Pramatha and Bamasundari, Pramatha was entitled to worship the deity at any place convenient to him during his pala or turn of worship. The trial Court, however, refused the prayer of the plaintiffs that they might move the idol holding that to do so would endanger the puja. The idol has been in a rented house in Kidderpore for the last 35 years but there is no specific temple for it and in the circumstances we think that the appellate Court was right in holding that the plaintiffs could not be refused their right under the terms of the compromise to have the idol during their seven and half months pala where they can worship it conveniently. The appellants, however, rightly object to the removal of the idol from place to place especially as the plaintiffs have no suitable place to keep it. In the circumstances we are inclined to favour the proposal referred to in the trial Court to construct a separate abode for the idol on a part of the debuttar estate where it could be conveniently worshipped in turn by the parties. This suggestion was discussed in our presence by the representatives of the parties and it was agreed that a suitable building should be erected, the expense being met from the land acquisition funds which are due to the estate. A receiver will be appointed under the direction of the Court (if possible some one who will act without expense to the parties) for this purpose. The defendants object to provision in the building for accommodation for the shebait and we think that this is not necessary. The trial Court will also decide when the time of worship of the parties will commence should there be any disagreement on this point.

The appeal is allowed accordingly. The lease will remain in force excluding the clause entitling the lessee to remain in possession after the termination of the lease—and a building will be erected as speedily as possible for the residence of the idol under the direction of the Court where the plaintiffs and defendants can worship it for seven and half and four and half months respectively.

The case will accordingly be remitted to the trial Court for the purposes indicated. The parties will pay their own costs.

on any allegations made in the proceedings.
[P 830 C 2, P 831 C 1]Birendra Kumar De—for Appellants.Biswa Nath Roy and Birendra Lal Das Chowdhury—for Respondents.Mitter, J. — This is an appeal by the plaintiffs and arises out of a suit brought by them on the allegation that the lands were originally held by one Dina Nath at a jama of Rs. 8-3-0 and that Dina Nath made a gift of the entire holding on 5th March 1327 B. S. to defendant 1 and that defendant 1 took possession of the jote on 13th November 1923 and that consequently there has been an abandonment by the old tenant of this holding which entitles the plaintiffs to re-enter. The defence of defendant 1 in substance was that the entire jote of Dina Nath was not transferred to him by the deed of gift and there has not been an abandonment of the jote by the heirs of the old tenant, Dina Nath having died since the execution of the deed of gift. The Court of first instance found that there has been a gift of the entire holding of Dina Nath and basing its decision on this finding decreed the plaintiffs' suit and declared the plaintiffs' maliki right to the lands in suitand directed that they do get khas possession therein after ejecting the defendants. Against this decision an appeal was taken to the Court of the second Subordinate Judge of Sylhet. The Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that there has not been a transfer by way of gift of the entire holding, that out of 27 keyars which is the area of the holding the deed of gift covers only 15 keyars and there has not been any abandonment as after the deed of gift the widow of Dina Nath, the original tenant, used to be in possession of the lands reserved by Dina Nath through bhagidar tenants. On this view the lower appellate Court reversed the decision of the Court of first instance and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. The plaintiffs have consequently brought this second appeal and the main contention before us on behalf of the plaintiffs appellants has been that there has not been a proper finding on the question of abandonment by the lower appellate Court and the case should be remitted to him in order that he may re-hear the appeal on the question of abandonment.The finding of the lower appellate Court that the widow of Dina Nath possessed a portion of the holding even after the deed of gift cannot be questioned in second appeal. Dina Nath died in 1329 B. S. and his widow Bisakha who succeeded him died in 1330
B. S. i. e. sometime in 1923. According to the finding of the lower appellate Court the widow was in possession till 1923 and the present suit was commenced on 12th June 1924. It has been argued by the learned advocate for the appellants that as no rent has been paid by Dina Nath's daughter who succeeded to Dina Nath's holding after the death of Bisakha the lower appellate Court should have inferred that there has been an abandonment of the holding. It has also been stated that in the written statement which had been filed by Dina Nath's daughter in Court in this case she has disclaimed any interest in this tenancy and it is said that that is sufficient to entitle the landlord to re-enter.
With reference to the written statement it is enough to state that no cause of action could be founded on any allegation made in the pleadings. The cause of action must be antecedent to the suit.
In order to entitle the landlord to re-enter, it must be shown that there has been transfer by way of gift either of the whole or part of the holding and repudiation or relinquishment or abandonment of the tenancy with reference to the remainder by either the original tenant or the heirs of the said tenant. The written statement which is filed in the course of the suit does not show that there has been a repudiation of the tenancy prior to the institution of the suit. It could not give rise to the cause of action for this suit. Neither do we think that the mere fact that for a very short period rent had not been paid by the heirs of Dina Nath can justify the landlord to consider that the holding has been abandoned by the old tenant. It would not be right having regard to the shortness of the period intervening between the cessation of the payment of the rent and the date when the suit was instituted to infer abandonment by the original tenant even assuming that the question of abandonment is a question to be inferred from the facts found. It has been pointed out in the Full Bench case of Dayamayi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (1) that the question as to whether there has been an abandonment depends on the circumstances of each case. We are not satisfied that the facts on which reliance has been placed by the learned advocate for the appellants constitute an abandonment.

The result is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Civil Revn. No. 701 of 1929, Decided on 15th August 1929, against order of Munsif, 2nd Court, Jhenidah (Jessore), D/- 4th March 1929.

(a) Civil P. C., Sch. 2, Para. 16—Objections against award must be taken in lower Court and cannot be taken for first time in revision.

Any objection or point against an award must be taken in the lower Court; a point, which could have been taken but was not taken in the lower Court cannot, for the first time, be allowed to be taken in revision.

[P 832 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C., Sch. 2, Para. 10—Case referred to three arbitrators—Only two arbitrators acting—To hold that only two arbitrators had full authority to act is to commit either error of law or of fact.

A case was referred to the arbitration of three gentlemen. Only two of these gentlemen acted and took evidence. The third arbitrator took no part in the arbitration.

Held: that the Munsif in holding that only two of the arbitrators had full authority to act and submit an award was guilty of either error of law or error of fact. [P 832 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C., S. 115—Error of law or fact is no ground for inference in revision.

The fact that a Court is guilty of error of law or error of fact is no ground for interfering with his decision in revision: 80 Cal. 337, Rel. on. [P 832 C 2]

Mukunda Behari Mullick—for Petitioners.

Chandra Sekhar Sen—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—The facts of the case out of which this rule has arisen are briefly these: The petitioners brought a suit in which they claimed a right of passage over two plots of land, dags Nos. 1665 and 1666, in order to have access to a certain tank. The case was referred to the arbitration of three gentlemen. It appears from the Munsif's finding that only two of these gentlemen acted and took evidence. Arbitrator 3 took no part in the arbitration. These two arbitrators submitted an award in which they gave the plaintiffs a right of way over another plot, dag No. 1670. The learned Munsif held that two of the arbitrators had full authority to act and submit a binding award; and, therefore, he gave a decree in terms of the award filed.

Ground 1 urged by the plaintiffs who have obtained this rule is that the arbitrators had given a path over a piece of land which was not the subject-matter of the suit, namely, plot 1670. The answer to this contention is that this point was never taken, as far as I can see, before the Munsif, and I am not prepared to allow the party to take in revision a point which he could have but did not take in the lower Court. The same remark applies to ground 2 which is that the plaintiffs, petitioners, were not given an opportunity of placing their case before the arbitrators. There is no suggestion in the judgment of the learned Munsif that any such objection whatsoever was taken by the petitioner.

The last ground taken is that the learned Munsif was not correct in holding that two of the arbitrators had full authority to act and submit a binding award. Now, as far as I can see from the terms of the reference it was all the three of the arbitrators who had to enquire into the matter although an award would be signed and submitted by only two. The learned Munsif in holding that only two of the arbitrators had full authority to act and submit an award is guilty of either error of law or error of fact. But the fact that the Court is guilty of error of law or error of fact is no ground for interfering with his decision in revision. The present case in many respects resemble the case of Kali Charan v. Sarat Chandra (1). I am, therefore, of opinion that it is not open to me in revision to interfere with the judgment of the learned Munsif even though it is passed upon an error of law or error of fact. It cannot be said that he had no jurisdiction to decide the matter or that he failed to exercise a jurisdiction which he had or that he had exercised his jurisdiction with material irregularity. Nor do I see that any injustice has been done to the petitioners. What he wanted is a right of way to a certain tank. That right he has got, although he did not get the right over the particular passage.

The rule is, therefore, discharged with costs. Hearing-fee one gold mohur.
